LOWER BURMA CHIEF COURT

A. I. R. 1918 Lower Burma 1 Full Bench

TWOMEY, C. J., ORMOND, MAUNG KIN AND RIGG, JJ.

Maung Hme—Plaintiff—Appellant.
v.

Ma Sein—Defendant—Respondent.

on 27th March 1918.

Buddhist Law (Burmese) — Divorce — Second marriage without consent is ground for divorce—First wife's right to divorce on this ground is subject to conditions—Partition in such case is same as in divorce by consent.

The chief wife of a Burmese Buddhist may object to her husband taking a second wife, and may claim a divorce if he does so without her consent. Her right however is subject to certain exceptions mentioned in Ss. 219, 232, 265-67 and 311 of the Digest, wherein the husband is allowed to take a second wife when the first wife is barren or has born only female children, or is suffering from certain diseases. [P 4 C1; P 5 C1 & 2]

In the case of such a divorce the property should be partitioned as in the case of divorce by mutual consent: (1872-92) L. B. R. 103 and 5 L. B. R. 87, Dis. from. [P 4 C1, 2; P 5 C12]

Rigg, J.—The question referred for decision in this case is whether the chief wife of a Burmese Buddhist is entitled to divorce her husband if he takes a lesser wife without her consent. It will be convenient first to examine the course of decisions on this point or related points. The earliest case is that of Ma In Than v. Maung Saw Hla (1), in which the Special Court held in 1881 that the chief wife had no right of objection. This ruling was declared to be still good law in 1909 in Ma Ein v. Te Naung (2), but doubts as to its correctness had been already expressed in various cases both in Upper and Lower Burma. In Maung Kauk v. Ma Han (3) Mr. Burgess said that before accepting the rule in Ma In Than's case (1) it would be necessary to examine the authorities, as there was much to be said on the other side. In 1893 the same learned Judge said in Ma Shwe Ma v. Ma Htarg (4):

"Polygamy is said to be lawful by Buddhist law, but it may be doubted whether this conveys a correct impression unless it is understood in a special or limited sense. The leading principle of Buddhism in this respect is monogamy rather than polygamy."

He went on to express the opinion that allusions to a plurality of wives in most of the Dhammathats referred to Hindu laws and customs rather than Buddhist law. The precise point in issue in this reference has however never been decided in Upper Burma. The decision in Ma In Than's case (1) has been questioned in three reported cases since the constitution of the Chief Court in 1900. In Ma San Shwe v. Po Thaik (5). Birks, J., discussed this ruling but did not come to any definite conclusion. In Ma Ka U v. Po Saw (6) a Full Bench of this Court held that a chief wife could refuse to live in the same house as a lesser wife. Hartnoll, J., dissented from the opinion expressed in Ma In Than's case (1), and said that a husband who took another wife without his first wife's consent committed a serious matrimonial fault against her; but he did not come to a finding whether this fault would justify a claim to divorce, as it was not necessary to the decision of the matter in issue. In Ma Wun Di v. Ma Kin (7) Adamson, J., said:

"The learned Advocate for respondents raised a question of Buddhist law, as to whether a Burman Buddhist can legally marry a second wife, during the lifetime of his first wife, without her consent. I regret. . . the question does not require a decision in this case. I may say however that the arguments of the learned Advocate, which he has embodied in a very interesting printed pamphlet, appear to me rather to throw doubt on the ruling of the Special Court in Ma In Than v. Maung Siew Hla (1). . . than to prove the broader proposition that a second marriage under these circumstances is null and void."

There is no doubt that polygamy is legal in Burma. In Ma In Than's case (1), Jardine, J. C., held that in spite of the existence of some texts of the religious law books, the custom of polygamy is so fully established that it lay upon the objector to show that this custom was limited in its application. He further said that even if the religious law was expressly opposed to polygamy, he would hesitate to suppress by judicial decision an institution which is part of the life of the people. He thought that the whole tenor of the Manugye was in accordance with the custom of polygamous marriages, and should not be set aside on account of the existence of isolated texts. There are indications, however, that the learned Judge was inclined subsequently to modify the decided opinion he had expressed in Ma In Than's case (1). After that decision the Manu Kunnapa was translated and at p. 30 of his note on Buddhist Law, Mr. Jardine observes that Ss. 173 and 182 throw some doubt on the right of polygamy. In para. 32 of his second note he says:

"Throughout the Dhammathat (Manugye) polygamy is treated as lawful but with a feeling that it is a grievance to the first wife."

Captain Forbes says:

"Even if polygamy is indulged in, the general feeling may be said to be against it. The suppression of the first by the second wife is a serious matter."

In Queen-Empress v. Nga Ne U (8) Mr. Jardine said:

"I am aware that some Burmans think that a man who has a wife may not marry a second time in her lifetime without her consent. Section 173 of the Wunnapa is in favour of this view, but it was not pointed out to the Special Court who held the contrary in Ma In Than's case (1)."

In Ma Wun Di's case (7) their Lordships of the Privy Council quoted with approval the following observations of the learned Chief Justice:

"It is not forbidden to a Burman Buddhist to have two wives at the same time, but it is universally conceded that the leading principle of Buddhism is monogamy rather than polygamy, that polygamy is rare and...is considered disrespectful."

There can be no doubt that in Lower Burma the position is that polygamy is tolerated but regarded with disfavour and that there has always been a body of opinion that it is only allowed if the first wife consents. Assuming that the Dhammathats only allow it under certain conditions, or penalties I am unable to see why the fact that these penalties have never been enforced in practice, or that it is not possible to point to instances of such enforcement, should preclude this Court from declaring that they exist and can be claimed by the wronged wife. The law to be administered is the Burmese Buddhist Law as laid down in the Dhammathats, unless such law has been clearly modified by custom or is repugnant to equity, justice or good conscience. In Bhagwan Singh v. Bhagwan Singh (9) their Lordships of the Privy Council pointed out that the judgment in the Collector of Madura v. Mootoo Ramalinga Sathupathy (10) gives no countenance to the conclusion that in order to bring a case under the rule of any law, laid down for Hindus generally, evidence must be given of actual events to show that in point of fact the people subject to that general law regulate their lives by it. At p. 423 of the same judgment their Lordships said that the general law should be ascertained by reference to the authoritative text books and judicial opinions, and that when the general law has been established any one living where such law prevails and is applicable must be taken to fall under the general law, unless he can show some valid local tribal or family custom to the contrary. The mere fact that the limitations to the license of having more than one wife have not been observed is insufficient to justify the Courts in holding that the law has been abrogated by custom, especially in a country like Burma, where, as Sir John Jardine himself observes (notes on Buddhist law 3), the system of compromise based on consent and acquiescence almost supersedes custom.

So far had this system of compromise been carried that when British Judges first attempted to ascertain what the Buddhist law was on any subject, they sometimes found great difficulty in obtaining any information on which a decision could properly be based. It appears to me, therefore, that there is no proof of any custom regarding polygamy which custom overrides the general awla id down in the Dhammathats or precludes us from examining that law with a view to ascertain its scope and provisions. It is true that in Hindu law, to which to some extent the Dhammathats are indebted for their rules, there is no restriction against polygamy and the rules enjoining monogamy have been held to be merely directory and not mandatory (Cowell's Lectures on Hindu Law part I, p. 164, Mayne, Hindu Law, para. 92, Sarkar's Lectures, p. 117). They seem to be of the nature of counsels of perfection rather than absolute prohibitions coupled with a penalty in case of disobedience. But whatever may be the extent to which the Dhammathats are indebted to Hindu Law, there can be no doubt that the Hindu law regarding marriage and divorce has been profoundly modified by Buddhism, although the compilers of the Dhammathats have in some cases not attempted to distinguish the two systems. Thus the division of the people into castes is recognized by the Dhammathats although a distinction is unknown to Burmans. The Courts have always endeavoured to interpret conflicting passages in the Dhammathats in such a manner as to conform with the existing sentiments and practice of Burmese society, so far as it is possible so to do without usurping the functions of the legislature. If on examination of the texts, it is found that there is a strong preponderance in favour of restrictions being placed on polygamy, we shall, I think, be taking a proper course in giving effect to those texts in harmony with the prevailing sentiments of the people. I do not attach much importance to the fact that polygamy is recognized in the Dhammathats and that much of their matter is occupied with rules for the division of property between various kinds of wives and their children. Such rules are necessary in view of the structure of society existing then and existing now. They are not necessarily inconsistent with rules tending to discourage polygamy.

their Lordships of the Privy Council said that where the Manuysa was not authoritative it should be followed. There is, however, no clear intimation in that Dhammathat on the subject of the chief wife's right to object to her husband taking a second wife without her consent. S. 43, Vol. 12 deals with the five kinds of wives whom he put away, but it is evident that putting away is only meant that the husband had the right to take another wife and his first wife was not entitled to object to him. S. 24, Vol. 3, relates to a right of separation when the wife has taken a paramour or the husband a lesser wife, the division of property is well stated, being made as in the case of divorce by mutual consent. In S. 17 of the same chapter a husband whose wife has left him is ordered to wait for one year before he takes another under penalty or loss of the property brought to him marriage and the joint property. But the right of the chief wife to demand a divorce is rather a matter of inference than a clear statement of the existence of such a right. Turning now to the third of the Dhammathats (I find that in S. 216, three Dhammathats are cited which lay down duties to the wife and one of the duties of a husband, but these texts are only directory. In the passage from the Dhammathat given under S. 214 there is a similar prohibition to husbands not to be unfaithful.

In two of the three Dhammathats cited in S. 230, a duty on the part of the husband is placed on the same level as a repellant disease and gives the wife a right of divorce. The most important section is No. 256, which contains extracts from eight Dhammathats and in no less than six of these a second marriage without the chief wife's consent gives the latter the right to divorce and to retain the whole of the property. These texts seem to me to be very clear and to admit of no doubt as to their construction. In the passage from the Manuysa cited in S. 303, divorce is permitted if cruelty is coupled with the taking of a lesser wife, but no argument against the right of a chief wife to obtain a divorce on the ground of a second marriage can be founded on this passage, as most of the other Dhammathats quoted in that section give her the right of divorce on the ground of cruelty alone, and this right has been affirmed in Maung Po Han v. Ma Ta Lok (12).

In S. 397 the penalty imposed on a husband for taking a lesser wife is expulsion from the house after being compelled to leave behind even his clothes. In S. 259 an extract is quoted from the Addasankepa Vanna of the rule relating to husbands and wives who have been previously married. Here too the wife is said to have the right of divorce if the husband takes a lesser wife and the husband forfeits all claim to the jointly acquired property. As against these authorities the learned Advocate for the appellant has been able to cite only S. 253, which is headed, "A man may marry as many wives as he pleases. But this section does not deal with the case of a man marrying when his first wife objects, and there is no doubt that if she consents, there is no impediment to his taking other wives. The other arguments addressed to us were founded on the existence of the custom of polygamy and its recognition in the Dhammathats in the shape of rules for the division of property between more than one wife. These arguments have already been considered in an earlier portion of this judgment. I think that it is clear that the general rule is that the chief wife may object to her husband taking a second wife and may claim a divorce if he does so, her rights is, however, subject to certain exceptions. These are found in Ss. 219, 232, 265-267 and 311 of the Digest.

The husband is allowed to take a second wife when the first wife is barren or has borne only female children or is suffering from certain diseases. In Burmese society a higher value is attached to the begetting of sons than daughters. There is also nothing unreasonable in the exception based on the first wife becoming insane or a leper, maimed, blind or paralysed and thus becoming unable to fulfil the duties of her position. I would therefore answer the reference as follows: Subject to exception of the kind mentioned in Ss. 219, 232, 265-267 and 311 of the Digest, if a Burmese Buddhist takes a second wife without his first wife's consent, she has a right to divorce him. I may add that if she decides to claim the right of divorce, I think that the division of property should, in the absence of any contract to the contrary, be made as if the divorce were one by mutual consent. This is the rule if the husband commits adultery (S. 230) and is the rule given in Manugye where the husband has not only taken a lesser wife but has been cruel (S. 303). In S. 256 a severe penalty is to be imposed according to some of the Dhammathats, which are, however not consistent regarding the penalty.

Twomey, C. J.—The question referred does not arise directly in the case which was before our learned colleague. But it does arise indirectly. Under the Special Court ruling in Ma In Than v. Maung Saw Hla (1) a head wife has no remedy if her husband takes a lesser wife without her consent. So long as this ruling is in force, it would be inconsistent to give effect to the provisions of Manukye, V, S. 17, and let a deserting wife claim a divorce on her husband re-marrying within a year. The learned Judges of the Special Court who decided Ma In Than's case (1) apparently considered that the provisions of the Manukye debar the Courts from sanctioning any restriction on polygamy among Burmese Buddhists. The pre eminent authority of the Dhammathat is still recognised, but its provisions have binding force only where they are free from ambiguity. As Rigg, J., points out, the Manukye in addition to the provisions which seem to contemplate unqualified polygamy contains also various passages from which it may reasonably be inferred that the Buddhist law recognises a head wife's right to demand a divorce if her husband takes another wife without her consent. We are therefore justified in turning for guidance to the other Dhammathats cited in the Kinwun Mingyi's Digest and to the same learned author's Atthathankepa, which is the most recent Dhammathat of all. These other Dhammathats are now shown to leave no room for doubt as to the head wife's right in question. Most of the texts became available only after Ma In Than's case (1) was decided.

The Special Court regarded the restriction on the taking of a lesser wife as a doctrine which was not shown to be "popularly accepted so as to extinguish the custom," i. e., the custom of polygamy. The existence of a custom of unrestricted polygamy was not shown in that case. The fuller investigation of the Dhammathats, which has now been carried out, makes it clear that the restriction in question is an incident of polygamy as established among the Burmese Buddhists and in these circumstances the question of popular acceptance does not appear to arise. The texts of the Buddhist law on the subject of polygamy are undoubtedly inconsistent. The Manukye contains various provisions cited in Ma In Than's case (1) which take for granted a plurality of wives, while other provisions clearly contemplate that a man should have but one wife at a time. The explanation is that the Burmese Buddhist law is largely of Hindu origin coming from a country in which polygamy flourished without restriction, the law had to be adapted to a non-Indian race which followed the Buddhist religion and in which the position of the wife was essentially different from that of the Hindu wife. Thus the texts in the Manukye and the other Dhammathats which deal with a plurality of wives are probably imported from the ancient Hindu law. Mr. Burgess in Ma Shwe Ma v. Ma Hlaing (4) remarked as follows:

"It is a remarkable thing that in S. 81 of the Chapter on inheritance, 10 of Manukye, the only provisions regarding contemporaneous wives and their children should be those in Ss. 37 and 38 which seem to have special reference to Hindu usage."

Ma In Than's case (1) has been the law in Lower Burma since 1881. But it has not been followed in Upper Burma; and it is doubtful whether in Lower Burma husbands have availed themselves to any large extent of the additional license given to them by the ruling of the Special Court. A plurality of wives is becoming more and more a rarity and is regarded socially with disfavour. The tendency towards monogamy has no doubt been accelerated by the annexation of Upper Burma. Before that event polygamy was encouraged by the example of the Burmese Kings and many of the higher officials. In expressing our dissent from the ruling in Ma In Than's case (1) and declaring the head wife's right to a divorce if her husband takes another wife without her consent, it is clear that we are only expounding an integral part of the Buddhist law as laid down in the Dhammathats and we need not fear that we are running counter to any cherished custom of the Burmese people. I concur in answering the reference in the terms proposed by my learned colleague Rigg, J.

I agree with him also in holding that the property should be partitioned as in the case of a divorce by mutual consent (in the absence of any contract to the contrary). It would be illogical to exact from the husband who takes a lesser wife a more severe penalty than is provided in the Dhammathats for a husband who commits adultery or who, in addition to taking a lesser wife, treats his head wife with cruelty.

Maung Kin, J.—I concur and have very little to add. Unlimited polygamy is expressly allowed only by three Dhammathats, namely, Kaingya, Kanda and Panam. See S. 253, O'Gale's Digest, Vol. 2. They are, however, not of much authority. Other Dhammathats speak of Polygamy being allowable under certain conditions and penalties and as regards Manukye in particular I agree with Mr. Jardine that, although it treats polygamy as lawful, it does so with a feeling that it is a grievance to the first wife. In addition to the six Dhammathats, cited in S. 256 of the above Digest, which lay down the rule that a second marriage without the first wife's consent gives the latter the right to divorce, we have extracts from three other Dhammathats, namely, Vilasa, Dhammathatkyaw and Manuvannana cited in S. 397 of the same Digest laying down the same rule. Those six Dhammathats and these three others are well known legal works. The other Dhammathats cited in S. 256 couple the taking of a lesser wife with habitual ill-treatment as ground for a divorce at the instance of the aggrieved first wife. The passage cited from Manukye in S. 303 of the Digest would appear to support these Dhammathats. But I do not think that in deciding the points under reference any importance can be attached to the fact that the taking of a lesser wife is thus coupled with cruelty, inasmuch as the Dhammathats agree in allowing a divorce on the ground of habitual cruelty alone. It seems clear that in the passage cited from Manukye in S. 303 of the Digest, the stress is on the husband's cruelty rather than on his incontinence. I am, therefore, of opinion that the taking of a lesser wife must be regarded as an additional ground for a divorce at the instance of the existing wife. As regards the question of partition of property, I would treat the divorce as if it were one by mutual consent for the reason stated by

Mahomed Backer Hamadance—Plaintiff—Respondent.

First Appeal No. 75 of 1916, Decided on 1st August 1917.

Principal and agent—Registered document is not necessary empowering agent to transfer immovable property worth more than Rs. 100.

There is nothing in the Transfer of Property Act or in the Registration Act to say that an agent to transfer an interest in immovable property worth more than Rs. 100 in value must be empowered by a registered document.

J. A. Maung Gyi—for Appellant.

J. H. Das—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The plaintiff obtained a mortgage decree against the defendant Ma Mo, who was sued through her agent Ma Thet Hnin, her adopted daughter. Ma Mo now appeals. Ma Mo was 81 years of age when she gave her evidence. The mortgage was executed by Ma Thet Hnin on behalf of Ma Mo as her attorney. It is doubtful whether the power of attorney authorised her to execute a mortgage. One of the issues raised was, whether Ma Mo ratified the mortgage by receiving the mortgage money. Mr. J. A. Maung Gyi contends that that issue should not have been raised because the plaintiff does not seek to recover from Ma Mo on the ground of ratification. The plaintiff alleges that the mortgage was made by Ma Mo through her attorney. The written statement denied that authority of Ma Thet Hnin and in consequence the issue was raised. In our opinion that was not altering the nature of the case set up by the plaintiff and was in issue rightly raised. The question then is—Did Ma Mo ratify the mortgage? Ma Thet Hnin and Mr. Thorpe, who was at the time staying in the house of Ma Mo, say that Rs. 15,000 consideration for the mortgage was received at the Registration Office by Ma Thet Hnin and taken by her to the house of Ma Mo and that the next day Rs. 10,400 was paid to U Kin and Ma Yin in payment of a promissory note which had been executed by Ma Mo, Ma Thet Hnin and her husband Maung Ba On, who died in 1912, the mortgage being dated 7th August 1913. Ma Mo admits that she had executed such a promissory note in favour of U Kin and Ma Yin, and she was unable to say whether these two creditors had been paid off when she gave her evidence.

There is also evidence to show that Rs. 3,000 was paid two days after the date of the mortgage to Ma Thwe in order to redeem a diamond necklace. Ma Mo admits that her debt to Ma Thwe was paid off, but she does not know from where the money came. Ma Thet Hnin says that the balance of the mortgage money, viz. Rs. 1,600 was spent in current expenses. Thus the evidence showed, and there is no reason to disbelieve it, that Rs. 13,400 was paid to creditors of Ma Mo within two days of the date of the mortgage. If so, the probability is that the money was raised on mortgage for that purpose at the instance of Ma Mo. Then there is the evidence of Po We, a broker, who says that in 1914 he was instructed by Ma Mo and Ma Thet Hnin to find a mortgagee who would take over the plaintiff's mortgage at a lower rate of interest. Po We says that Ma Mo told him if the Advocate Ba Thein approved of the document, she would sign it. Ba Thein gives evidence in corroboration and there is no doubt that Ma Mo knew and approved of this intended transfer. If the plaintiff's mortgage had been fraudulently made by Ma Thet Hnin, it is impossible to suppose that she would have brought in Ma Mo for the purpose of getting a fresh mortgage at a lower rate of interest. We are satisfied that the plaintiff's mortgage, executed by Ma Thet Hnin as the agent of Ma Mo, was ratified by Ma Mo. Mr. J. A. Maung Gyi contends that an agent who is only orally empowered is not sufficiently authorised to transfer an interest in immovable property of more than Rs. 100 in value. But there is nothing in the Transfer of Property Act or in the Registration Act to say that an agent for such a purpose must be empowered by a registered document. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

riety in his being called to account under S. 211 of the Penal Code in respect of each of such false charges. [P 7 C 2]Gaunt—for Applicant.Wiltshire and Bose—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—On 31st March 1916 respondent laid information at the police station that one Poonuswamy Nadar had caused hurt to him with a dah, and that applicant and others were present and abetted the causing of hurt. On 3rd April he filed a complaint to the same officer. Applicant and others appeared in Court and subsequently on 1st July applicant was discharged. On 10th July he applied for sanction to prosecute the respondent for falsely charging him with an offence under S. 211, I. P. C. On 21st July the applicant and respondent and their pleaders appeared and arguments were heard, and the case was adjourned for orders on 24th July. Orders were not ready then, and the case stood over still the 26th, when sanction to prosecute was granted. On the same day the Magistrate gave judgment acquitting the other persons accused in the hurt case and ordering respondent's prosecution for falsely charging them.

On 2nd August applicant instituted a prosecution on his sanction and the trial proceeded till 16th August. On 22nd August the respondent applied to the Sessions Court to revoke the sanction and on 6th October this was done. The applicant now seeks to have it restored.
The Sessions Judge's reasons for revoking the sanction were that the interests of justice will be sufficiently served by the prosecution of the respondent ordered by the Magistrate on 26th July and that to allow the sanction to stand would be unduly harassing the respondent in that he would be twice prosecuted for practically one offence, and that it was never intended by the legislature that Courts should be used for the purpose of gratifying people's own feelings against other persons. . . . I cannot agree with the Sessions Judge. It is not the case that respondent's allegation that he was cut with a dah is entirely false. Having been so cut he falsely accused Poonuswamy Nadar of cutting him and applicant and others of being present and abetting the cutting. It seems to me that to falsely charge one person with being implicated in a crime is not the same offence as to falsely charge another person with being implicated in the same offence. The circumstances under which and the motives from which such false charges are made may be totally different, and it appears to me that there is no impropriety in the offender being called to account for making each of such false charges. In the present instance it does appear that the alleged false charge as against the petitioner may have been in some respects on a different footing from those against the other five persons, and I do not consider that the prosecution in respect of the five constituted sufficient reason for disallowing a prosecution by the petitioner, though in the event of both prosecutions ending in conviction it might be proper to take the sentence in one into account in passing sentence in the other. I think there were not sufficient reasons for revoking the sanction and I restore it. The trial in Criminal Regular No. 177 of 1916 of the First Additional Magistrate of Insein will proceed.

the first issue. The case did not come up again till now for various reasons. Mr. Giles now urges that the decision on first issue be re-opened and that I must re-consider that issue. He relies on a ruling of a Bench of this Court, Ma Nyo v. Ma Yauk (1), which decides that the Judge deciding the case on the conclusion of all the evidence is not bound by the previous decision on certain issues and can decide them afresh. I am bound by this decision, with which I entirely agree. The only question is, whether the parties having consented to this course it is open to either of them to claim a fresh decision. The question covered by the issue is not an easy one, and it is now said that the translation of the will, the interpretation of which was involved, is incorrect. I feel that I should have to consider and come to a conclusion on this issue in any case, and, therefore, even if the parties were estopped, I should still desire the matter to be argued. I am not bound by the previous decision, but I do not think I should decide adversely to the previous decision if I should have to do so, without hearing Counsel. The whole case must, therefore, be started now on all the issues as amended by me.

Mg. Ba Thain—Opponent.

Civil Ref. No. 6 of 1917. Decided on 16th May 1918, made by Divil. Judge, Mandalay, in Civil Suit No. 2 of 1917.

Divorce Act (4 of 1869). S. 10—Wife having judicial separation can get divorce on further proof of adultery and cruelty.

A wife who has obtained judicial separation on the ground of her husband's adultery alone is entitled to a dissolution of marriage on proof that her husband has again committed adultery after the separation and has in addition been guilty of cruelty to her after the separation.

Shaw—for Applicant.

Twomey, C. J. and Ormond, J.—

The petitioner and the respondent are both American Baptist Christians. The petitioner Ma Thin Kyu applied in 1914 for dissolution of her marriage with the respondent Mg. Ba Thain alias Johnny Caraw on the ground of his adultery and desertion. Desertion was not proved, and the Court; therefore, granted only a decree for judicial separation. Subsequently the petitioner applied to the Magistrate for a maintenance order under the Criminal Procedure Code and the respondent was ordered to pay her Rs. 25 a month. She has received only Rs. 59 in all under that order. The petitioner's attempts to recover the amount due to her were thwarted by the respondent, who resigned the salaried post that he held. Not content with this, the respondent went repeatedly to the petitioner's house and abused her and threatened to kill her, his object being to prevent her from enforcing the maintenance order. The evidence shows that the respondent's conduct has seriously affected the petitioner's health and caused a nervous breakdown. In consequence of the respondent's conduct the petitioner applied again for a dissolution of her marriage on the ground of his continued adultery coupled with cruelty. It is shown that the respondent has continued to live in adultery with another woman since the time of the judicial separation, and as regards the alleged cruelty subsequent to the separation, the learned Judge's finding is that although no physical violence was used the respondent's behaviour amounted to legal cruelty. The Divisional Judge, therefore, has granted a decree for dissolution of the marriage and this decree now comes before us for consideration.

The respondent did not oppose the petition in the Divisional Court and he does not appear in this Court, though he has been served with notice. There is no reason to suspect collusion. We see no reason to differ from the conclusion of the Divisional Judge as regards the facts of the case. The continued adultery and the cruelty subsequent to the separation are well established. The only question that arises is one of law, namely, whether a wife who has obtained judicial separation on the ground of her husband's adultery alone, is entitled to a dissolution of marriage on proof that her husband has again committed adultery after the separation and has in addition been guilty of cruelty to her after the separation. The nearest English case that we can find is that of Green v. Green (1), in which a wife who had obtained a judicial separation on the ground of her husband's adultery obtained a decree nisi five years later on proof of further adultery subsequent to the judicial separation coupled with cruelty before the separation. The wife in her first petition in that case had not pleaded the cruelty and she asked only for a judicial separation in the first instance because she hoped that her husband would reform. Afterwards she abandoned the hope of his reformation, and asked for a dissolution of the marriage, and the Court then allowed her to revive the cruelty which she condoned in the first instance. Sir James Hannen remarked :

"The husband by his adultery subsequent to the former decree has committed a fresh matrimonial offence, (for the decree of judicial separation is not to be considered as a license to commit adultery for the future), and for this offence, aggravated by the previous cruelty the wife has had no redress. If the failure of the petitioner to charge her husband with cruelty be regarded as equivalent to a forgiveness of it, still cruelty condoned is revived by subsequent adultery and I can see no reason why the husband should be in a better position because he has already been guilty of a wrong which entitled the wife to relief."

The present case differs from the above inasmuch as there was no cruelty before the decree for judicial separation and it is open to argument that the cruelty contemplated in the Divorce law is cruelty committed while the wife is actually living with the husband and that cruelty cannot be regarded as a matrimonial offence when they are living apart from one another under a decree of judicial separation. There is, however, no express authority to this effect, and we are at liberty as in the English case above cited, to treat the cruelty of the husband after the judicial separation as an aggravation of the fresh matrimonial offence involved in the husband's continued adultery. We therefore confirm the decree of the Divisional Court under S. 17, Divorce Act, 1869.

Pratt, J.—I agree that the decree should be confirmed. It seems to me that the facts of the present case are even stronger than in Green v. Green (1). Here there is not merely continued adultery after judicial separation, but subsequent cruelty as well. I do not consider that adultery or cruelty on the part of the husband, when living away from his wife under judicial separation, can be held not to be a matrimonial offence.

To take this view would be practically to place the wife in a worse position, after she had obtained a decree of judicial separation on the ground of her husband's misconduct, than she was before.

Criminal Revn. No. 265-B of 1917, Decided on 16th November 1917.

Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 488(4)—Burmese Buddhist wife is entitled to maintenance on ground of husband's second marriage if not due to her refusal to live with him.

Ordinarily the fact that a Burmese Buddhist husband takes a second wife might be a good reason for the first wife declining to live with him, unless he provides her with a separate house. Where, however, husband marries a second wife owing to the refusal of his first wife to live with him, but is willing to take back the first wife, the latter is not entitled to maintenance under S. 488(4). [P 9 C 1; P 10 C 1]

Maung Ghi—for Applicant.

W. Po Thit—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—Applicant has been ordered to pay maintenance for his wife Ma Shwe Kin. His case was that there was a divorce but this was not proved. It is clear, however, that owing to incompatibility of temper or other cause they separated and the wife ceased to live under her husband's protection. About seven months after the separation applicant re-married. Respondent declines to return to live with applicant who is willing to take her back, unless he provides her with a separate establishment. Ordinarily the fact that the husband took a second wife might be a good reason for the first wife declining to live with him, unless he provides her with a separate house. In the present circumstances, however, I do not consider the claim is reasonable. Respondent chose to live separately from her husband and there is evidence that when asked to re-join him she declined. She was apparently willing to effect a divorce. By her conduct she could only expect that the natural result would be to force her husband into marrying again. In fact his re-marriage was the natural result of her refusing to live with him and separating from him for a number of months. Applicant is not a well-to-do man, and cannot afford to maintain two separate establishments.

His offer, therefore, to support his wife, if she will resume conjugal relations, is reasonable and I do not consider that she is entitled to maintenance because she elects to live apart from him. She must be prepared to accept the result of her own conduct. I set aside the order of the Magistrate for maintenance of Ma Shwe Kin.

Civil P. C. (1908), O. 40, R. 1—Defendant, original owner, in uninterrupted possession of property—Appointment of receiver is justified on strong grounds only.

In a case of disputed title where the defendant, admittedly the original owner of the property, claims to have been in uninterrupted possession of the property, the appointment of a receiver can be justified only if a strong case is made out. [U 10 C 2]

Keith—for Appellants.

Broadbent—for Respondent.

Judgment.—This is an appeal against an order appointing a receiver in a pending suit. The property in respect to which the receiver has been appointed is in dispute between two Chetty firms, the S. R. M. and S. N. N. firms. The parties in the S. N. N. firm are plaintiff and defendant 4, while the partners in the S. R. M. firm are defendants 1, 2, 3, and 6. It appears that the S. N. N. firm was expressly constituted in 1911 to take over the assets of the S. R. M. firm, which then consisted of defendants 1, 2 and 3. The assets of the S. R. M. firm were transferred by deed, the consideration for the transfer being stated in the deed to be a payment of Rs. 70,000. Subsequently, in 1913 the property in question or all that remained of it was re-transferred to the S. R. M. firm by registered deeds for an alleged consideration of Rs. 30,000 in all. Accordingly, as matters stand the S. R. M. firm have a legal title to the property in question. They alleged that the transfer of 1911 was merely a benami transaction carried out because they were in difficulties with their creditors, and that the subsequent re-transfers of 1913 merely restored the legal title in respect of their property, the actual possession and control of which they had retained all along. Some colour is given to this contention by the fact that the same person, namely, defendant 5, Ramasawmy Chetty, has been acting as attorney both for the S. R. M. firm and the S. N. N. firm, and it is alleged by the S. R. M. partners that their firm also retained the transfer deed of 1911 and that it was not made over to either of the S. N. N. partners. It is impossible at this stage to say that the documents which were in the possession of defendant 5 were held by him as agent of the S. N. N. firm rather than as agent of the S. R. M. firm.

In order to oust the S. R. M. partners the plaintiff will have to prove that the transfer of February 1911 was a bona fide transaction. It will also be for the plaintiff to prove his allegations of fraud and collusion in respect of the re-transfer of November 1913. The case is one of disputed title in which the S. R. M. firm, admittedly the original owners of the property, claim to have been in possession of the property uninterruptedly and deny altogether the interest of the plaintiff. In such a case the authorities show that the appointment of a receiver would be justified only if a strong case were made out.* The learned District Judge's order does not show any such grounds. The defendants alleged that the Government dues on the lands have all been paid and in that case there is no danger of the lands being sold up for arrears of revenue. It has not been shown that there is any danger of waste or alienation of the property. The actual suit has not proceeded beyond the filing of the plaint. Written statements have not yet been filed by the defendants. As the suit develops sufficient grounds may appear for appointing a receiver, but as the case now stands, we are satisfied that the appointment is not called for. The order of the District Court appointing a receiver is set aside with costs. Advocate's fees three gold mohurs.

Order set aside.

TWOMEY, C. J. AND ORMOND, J.

U Zayanta—Plaintiff—Appellant.

v.

U Naga—Respondent.

Transfer of Property Act (4 of 1882), S. 123 — S. 123 applies to religious gifts by Burmese Buddhist.

Burmese Buddhist religious gifts are not exempted from the operation of S. 123, T. P. Act. Therefore a gift or dedication of a Kyaung is not valid unless registered. (P. 12 C 2)

May Ung—for Appellant.Villa—for Respondent.

Twomey, C. J.—This was a suit for possession of a certain pucca Kyaung and site forming part of a Kyaungtaik at Moulmein. In para. 1 of the plaint the plaintiff claimed that the whole Kyaungtaik within the specified boundaries, known as Dammayon Kyaungtaik, belonged to him according to the Buddhist Ecclesiastical law, in other words, he claimed the property as presiding Pongyi Taik-ok or Kyaung-ding in succession to the former Pongyi U Eindasara who is referred to in the proceedings as the Ieper Pongyi. U Eindasara died from 7 to 12 years before the suit, which was filed in July 1915. The plaintiff was a pupil of Eindasara and states that in 1263 B. E., that is about 1901, U Eindasara went through the ceremony known as dwithantaka with him. The effect of this ceremony was to admit the plaintiff to joint ownership of the Kyaungtaik with U Eindasara, so that on U Eindasara's death the plaintiff would become the sole Taik-ok. The plaintiff states that after he had succeeded U Eindasara on the latter's death he in turn admitted another Pongyi U Wunna to joint ownership with him by the dawithantaka method. He afterwards left U Wunna in sole charge and went to Rangoon to study. During his absence the pucca Kyaung building which had been begun in Eindasara's time was completed by the lay donors and these laymen dedicated it to U Wunna in the plaintiff's absence. Subsequently while the plaintiff was still absent from Moulmein, U Wunna discarded the yellow robe and went into the world, but just before doing so he made over the newly built pucca Kyaung to another Pongyi, namely, his uncle U Naga, the defendant. When the plaintiff came back and tried to eject U

Naga, the latter instituted proceedings under the Criminal Procedure Code and successfully resisted the plaintiff, who thereupon brought this suit against him for possession of the brick Kyaung.

P. W. 1, U Ahaba gives evidence as to the dwithantaka ceremony between Eindasara and the plaintiff Zayanta. Witnesses 2 and 3 give evidence as to the latter dwithantaka ceremony between Zayanta and Wunna. The evidence shows that Eindasara presided over the Kyaungtaik up to his death. The actual Myatung that he occupied, first by himself and afterwards with Zayanta, was a wooden building on the site of the pucca building now in dispute and this wooden building has been removed and re-erected at another spot within the Kyaungtaik. The plaintiff says that this wooden building had been given to Eindasara by another Pongyi by a document, but there is no other evidence on this point. Ma Hlaing, P. W. 4, an aged woman who was one of the supporters of the Kyaungtaik, states that when Eindasara died, the supporters telegraphed to Zayanta the plaintiff, who was then absent in Mandalay; that Zayanta then came and presided over the Kyaungtaik in succession to Eindasara and that no one raised any objection but as Zayanta wanted to go away temporarily to continue his studies he invited another Pongyi Wunna to take charge of the Kyaungtaik in his absence. The defendant Naga's witness U Zarita also says that Eindasara was head Pongyi, i. e., Taik-ok, and that afterwards the plaintiff invited Wunna to come to the small Kyaung, i. e., the old wooden Kyaung and then went away."

Subsequently when the brick Kyaung was about to be dedicated,

"U Wunna went to Rangoon to call the plaintiff i. e., presumably for the purpose of receiving the dedication, but he refused to come."

This witness admits having heard that Eindasara and the plaintiff had performed the dwithantaka ceremony and D. W. 3 Mg. Po Te also states that Eindasara presided in the Kyaungtaik and that plaintiff presided after Eindasara's death. The evidence as to the dwithantaka ceremony between Eindasara and Zayanta is not rebutted and there is no reason to disbelieve it, except that it was not relied upon by Zayanta or mentioned by him in the criminal proceedings under

S. 145, Civil P. C. But even part from that alleged ceremony the fact that Zayanta succeeded Eindasara as presiding Pongyi of the Kyaungtaik appears even from the evidence of the defendant's own witnesses. It is shown by this evidence also that the defendant Naga's donor Wunna had originally come to the Kyaungtaik on the invitation of the plaintiff Zayanta and there is therefore all the more reason for believing the statements of the plaintiff and his witnesses as to the dwithantaka ceremony between Zayanta and Wunna.

It is proved that the brick building was dedicated to Wunna during Zayanta's absence without a registered document. The defendant Naga's claim rests on an unregistered document of transfer written by Wunna on the day he discarded the yellow robe. The transfer was invalid for want of a registered document. But though Naga's title is defective he is in possession and cannot be ejected unless the plaintiff is held to have proved his title. It is clear however that the plaintiff has proved it. Whatever may have been the effect of the two dwithantaka ceremonies, the evidence establishes that Zayanta became presiding Pongyi or Taik-ok in succession to Eindasara and in that capacity he obtained control over the whole Kyaungtaik. The brick Kyaung built within the Kyaungtaik was dedicated to Wunna but Wunna was either subordinate to Zayanta as Taik-ok or else he was joint owner with Zayanta by virtue of the dwithantaka ceremony. Wunna on discarding the yellow robe disappeared and his evidence was not forthcoming. Even if we assume that Wunna himself, in whose name the brick Kyaung was dedicated, could have registered a claim by Zayanta for possession, it must be held that the defendant Naga who merely claims under an invalid transfer from this ex-Pongyi has no title to oppose to the plaintiff's claim as presiding Pongyi of the whole Kyaungtaik. But it must be observed that the gift of the brick Kyaung to Wunna by the lay builders also appears to have been inoperative for want of a registered instrument under S. 123, T. P. Act, which was in force in Moulmein at the time of the dedication.

The District Judge confused dwithantaka with withathagaha which have nothing in common except that they are both Pali words. He also lost sight of the fact that the plaintiff was claiming as presiding Pongyi of the whole Kyaungtaik and he therefore attached undue importance to the fact that neither the plaintiff nor his predecessor Eindasara had ever lived in the new brick building in suit. He treated the gift of the brick Kyaung to Wunna and the transfer by Wunna to the defendant Naga as valid transfers overlooking the absence in each case of a registered instrument. The District Court's decision is clearly wrong and I will set it aside and grant the plaintiff a decree for possession as prayed, with costs in both Courts. The defendant should be ordered to pay to Government Rs. 630, namely, the amount of court-fees which would have been paid by the plaintiff-appellant if he had not been permitted to sue and to appeal as a pauper.

Ormond, J.—The evidence shows that the plaintiff was the head monk of the monastery after U Eindasara's death in 1907 or 1908. The Kyaung in dispute was completed in 1908 or 1909, after the death of Eindasara, and was dedicated to U Wunna who was then acting as head monk during the plaintiff's absence in Rangoon, and who was joint head monk with the plaintiff. The plaintiff claims possession of the Kyaung by virtue of being the head monk and also under a dwithantaka made between himself and U Wunna. The defendant's title rests upon a gift of the Kyaung made to him by U Wunna in 1911 or 1912. No gift of the Kyaung could be made until the Kyaung had been built. It was not completed until 1908 or 1909, i. e., after S. 123, T. P. Act had been extended to Moulmein. Burmese Buddhist religious gifts are not excepted from the operation of that section and as none of the alleged gifts of this Kyaung were effected by a registered document, each of these gifts was void; namely, the gift or dedication of the Kyaung in favour of U Wunna by the lay donors, the gift of a joint share in the Kyaung by U Wunna to the plaintiff under dwithantaka and the gift of the Kyaung by U Wunna to the defendant.

U Wunna therefore acquired no title to the Kyaung, except as joint head monk with the plaintiff; and U Wunna had no right to hand over the Kyaung to the defendant without the plaintiff's consent. The Kyaung, having been built on monastery land, must be taken to be an addition to the monastery property and the plaintiff as head monk of the monastery is entitled to possession. I concur in the order passed by the learned Chief Judge.

Maund Aung Myat and others—Appellants.

Maung Sin and others—Respondents.

First Appeal No. 9 of 1916, Decided on 31st July 1917.

Administration Suit — Pendency of—Suit by assignee of portion for declaration of his title is maintainable.

An assignee of a portion of the estate of a deceased person can sue a third person for a declaration of his title while a suit for the administration of the estate of the deceased is pending: 10 Cal. 713, Dist. [P 13 C 2]

Ormiston—for Appellants.

Wiltshire—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The plaintiffs in this suit sued for a declaration of their title to their share in the Shamrock Hotel, which they had derived from the administrator of the estate of Ma Sabe. Ma Sabe was entitled to a half share in this Hotel. She died in 1905 and her property was inherited by her sister, Ma Seik, who died in 1908. The plaintiffs filed a suit for the administration of Ma Seik's estate as had not been already administered. That suit is still pending and the District Judge dismissed the present suit on the ground that the plaintiffs' remedy was by filing an application in that administration suit for leave directing either a suit to be brought in the name of the legal representative or appointing a Receiver to sue. The learned Judge relied upon the case of Oriental Bank Corporation v. Gobinlol Seal (1). That case lays down the procedure where persons interested in the estate of a testator or deceased, not being the legal personal representatives, seek to recover some portion of the estate. The plaintiffs in the present suit do not claim anything of the kind. The assignments to the plaintiffs were impugned in the administration suit and have been held to be good. The plaintiffs in the present suit did not claim to recover any portion of the estate of Ma Seik or Ma

Sabe, and the fact that the property in question once formed part of this estate does not prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining a declaration of their title. The decree is set aside and the case is remanded to be determined on the merits. There will be a certificate of refund of the Court-fees on this appeal under S. 13, Court-fees Act, and the appellants will have five gold mohurs, costs of this appeal, against the first two respondents.

Civil Misc. Appeal No. 150 of 1917, Decided on 30th May 1918, against decree of Dist. Judge, Pegu, in Civil Misc. No. 1 of 1917.

Probate and Administration Act (5 of 1818). S. 23—Rival claimants—One having greatest interest is to be preferred.

The ordinary rule is that the grant of Letters of Administration should follow the interest and where the interest of the applicants are unequal, Letters should be granted to applicant whose interest is the greater. [P 14 C 2]

Lentaigne—for Appellant.

Robertson and May Oung—for Respondents.

Judgment.—In this case three applications were made for Letters of Administration to the estate of Ma Shwe Ge, deceased. Two of the applicants Ma Sein Tin and Ma Pwa claimed to be adopted daughters of the deceased and her husband U Maung, who predeceased her; the third applicant Maung Po Kin is the younger step-brother of the deceased. Ma Sein Tin claimed to be sole adopted daughter, but Ma Pwa claimed that both she and Ma Sein Tin had been adopted by Ma Shwe Ge and U Maung. Letters of Administration were granted to Po Kin, the District Judge having found that neither Ma Sein Tin nor Ma Pwa was a keittima adopted daughter of the deceased. As regards Ma Pwa the District Judge's finding is that she was not an adopted child at all. In the case of Ma Sein Tin he found that when her grandmother who had been bringing her up was about to die, she gave Ma Sein Tin unconditionally to U Maung who agreed to take her into his family as a daughter but that nothing was said at the time about her being taken as a keittima daughter with full rights of inheritance. The following facts were not disputed by Maung Po Kin, namely: that Ma Sein Tin at the age of 4 or 5 was given by her grandmother Ma Min So to Ma Shwe Ge (sister of Ma Min So) with the express consent of her husband U Maung and their son Po Thin, who was then grown up, that Ma Sein Tin lived with U Maung and Ma Shwe Ge up to the time of Ma Shwe Ge's death in 1916, when she was about 18 years old, that she was always treated as a daughter in the family and that she was given jewels and treated in all respects as a rich man's daughter would be treated. It is also admitted that about a year before Ma Shwe Ge's death she erected a bridge near her village and on this bridge she caused a tablet to be affixed stating that it was the work of merit of her husband, herself, her son Po Thin and her grandchildren (* * *) Ma Nyun Thin and Ma Sein Tin. (The Burmese word "Mye" signifies grandnephew and grandniece as well as grandchild. Ma Nyun Thin was a grandchild of Ma Shwe Ge, being the daughter of Po Thin). At the time that this tablet was put up, the persons mentioned in the inscription of Daw Shwe herself and Ma Sein Tin were dead. The admitted facts are sufficient to show that Ma Sein Tin had the status at least of an apatitha child in Ma Shwe Ge's family and that her status was higher than that of the 6th class of children, who are "not entitled to inherit" and mentioned in Manugye, Book, X, S. 81 (vide also Kin-wunmingyi's Digest, S. 17), viz.,

"destitute and hunger-stricken children fed and brought up in the family and known as chata-bhatta parattases."

The claimant Ma Pwa was related as grandniece to U Maung while Ma Sein Tin was a grandniece of Ma Shwe Ge, but there was a marked difference in the position of these two claimants. It is beyond dispute that Ma Pwa was taken into the family when she was 11 or 12 years old in order that she might nurse Ma Shwe Ge, who then lost her sight. She stayed in the family house up to the death of U Maung (about 1913) and then went back to her natural father and having lived with him for a year during which she got married, she went to live in a house next door to Ma Shwe Ge's. This house was occupied by Ma Pwa's mother-in-law Ma Kin. Her name was not mentioned in the commemorative tablet which Ma Shwe Ge caused to be put up on her bridge at Ywathit.

Neither of the two claimants Ma Pwa and Ma Sein Tin set up a claim to be an apatitha adopted child, but on the undisputed facts as given in the judgment it must be taken that Ma Sein Tin was at least an apatitha child of the deceased Ma Shwe Ge while it is equally clear that Ma Pwa was not. The learned Judge did not consider Ma Sein Tin's position as an apatitha child because no argument was addressed to him on this point. The only question considered by the Judge was whether she was a keittima child or not. But if she was an apatitha child she would clearly be entitled to one-half of the estate as such, there being no natural or keittima children. In that case the claimant Po Kin to whom the Letters of Administration were granted would be entitled to a smaller share than Ma Sein Tin, for he is not the only collateral. The ordinary rule in cases of this kind is that the grant should follow the interest and Letters are granted to the applicant whose interest is the greater. Letters should therefore have been given to Ma Sein Tin in preference to Po Kin.

As regards Ma Pwa's appeal we have declined to hear her counsel Mr. Robertson on the facts. In doing so we have followed the principle laid down in Ma Tok v. Ma Thi (1). The District Court has found that Ma Pwa was not adopted. Mr. Robertson contends that Ma Pwa was treated by the old couple in exactly the same way as Ma Sein Tin and that Ma Pwa's status must be regarded as the same as Ma Sein Tin's. We are unable to agree in this view. There is no finding in Ma Pwa's case that she was brought up as a daughter, and it is not open to us to say of Ma Pwa as we have said of Ma Sein Tin that, on the undisputed facts as found by the District Court she was at least an apatitha child. The legal effect of the undisputed facts as found by the District Court is that Ma Sein Tin is an apatitha child of the deceased Ma Shwe Ge while Ma Pwa was not. It follows that Ma Sein Tin had a better right to the Letters of Administration than Ma Pwa. We have already dealt with Ma Sein Tin's preferential right as regards the other claimant Po Kin. On these grounds we dismiss Ma Pwa's appeal with costs, Ma Sein Tin's appeal is allowed. The Letters of Administration granted to Po Kin will be cancelled and Letters will be granted to Ma Sein Tin on her furnishing security to the amount required by the District Court. In Ma Sein Tin's appeal we consider that each party should bear his own costs of the appeal and in the District Court.

MAUNG KIN AND RIGG, JJ.

Kathleen Maud Kerwick—Appellant.

Fred. James Rupert Kerwick—Respondent.

First Appeal No. 3 of 1918, Decided on 19th June 1918.

Trusts Act(1882), Ss. 81 and 82—Property purchased by husband in name of wife—Rule of advancement of English law applies to persons of British nationality resident in India—Advancement.

The rule of English law that when a husband buys property in the name of his wife he should be presumed to have done so for the benefit of the wife, applies to persons of British nationality resident in India, and the mere fact that after the purchase the husband continues to manage the property and collect rents is not sufficient to rebut the presumption. [1916 C 1]

Giles—for Appellant.

Higinbotham—for Respondent.

Rigg, J.—The parties in this case were married in 1901. They have two children, Dagmar aged about 14 and Terence aged about 10. The husband is an Assistant Engineer in the Public Works Department, whose pay with allowances does not now exceed Rs. 500 a month. In 1907 he bought a piece of land from Dr. Pedley for Rs. 10,000, and built a house, which he called Kildare, on it at a cost of about Rs. 16,000. He made out a cheque for Rs. 9,000 to his wife who endorsed it over to the vender. The deed of sale of the land was registered in her name. In 1908, he again bought another piece of land built Kerry on it. This land was similarly registered in his wife's name. In 1915, the parties separated after a quarrel. The question for decision in this suit is whether these two houses and pieces of land were intended as a gift to the wife, or whether there is a resulting trust in favour of the husband on the ground that they were merely placed in her name benami in order to evade a supposed rule prohibiting Government servants from speculating in landed property. The learned Judge on the Original Side found that there was no advancement and decreed the plaintiff's suit for a declaration that the properties were his and should be transferred to his name. The first point for consideration is whether the English law relating to the presumption to be made from the investment of property by a husband in his wife's name is to be applied to the parties or not. The trial Judge describes the parties as English, but thought that because they had spent most of their lives in India, the presumption that would be made by an English Court should not be drawn in view of the fact that the husband paid for the property, managed it and took the receipts. He treated the case on the same footing as a purchase by a Hindu or Mahomedan, and presumed that the transaction in the circumstances was a benami one. Mr. Higinbotham states that he is not prepared either to affirm or deny that the parties are English, but I am of opinion that there is not the slightest reason for supposing that they are not of British nationality. It is inconceivable that if they were not, plaintiff would not have said so and thereby cut away at once one of the main foundations of the defendant's case. By virtue of S. 13 (2), Burma Laws Act, the law to be administered on the Original Side of this Court is the same as would be administered by the Calcutta High Court, and in the present case that would be the common law of England. Mr. Higinbotham contends that Ss. 81 and 82, Trusts Act, 1882 (which is in force in Rangoon), governs the case. He admits that the burden of proof lay on his client in the first instance, as the tenor of the documents was adverse to his claim. But he contends that as soon as he proved the source of the funds for the purchase of the property, and his client's receipt of the rents, the burden shifts. S. 81, Trusts Act, is as follows:

"Where the owner of property transfers or bequeaths it and it cannot be inferred, consistently with the attendant circumstances, that he intended to dispose of the beneficial interest therein, the transferee or legatee must hold such property for the benefit of the owner or his legal representative."

Illustration (d) to that section deals with the case of a gift from a husband to a wife, and says that the presumption in such a case is that she takes the beneficial interest. The presumption is an inference from the relationship of the parties. I do not think that the enactment of this section was intended to abolish any presumption arising from the personal law of the parties. The question still remains whether the attendant or surrounding circumstances of the case are inconsistent with such a presumption.

In Gopeekrist Gosain v. Gungapersaud Gosain (1) their Lordships of the Privy Council declined to import the presumption that a purchase of property by a Hindu father in favour of his son was an advancement, but they did not do so on the ground that such a presumption could in no case be made in India but that it was one that could not properly be applied to Hindus, and that its incorporation would be foreign to and objectionable in a system of law that recognizes the purchase by one man in the name of another, to be for the benefit of the real purchaser. For similar reasons their Lordships have declined to import the English presumption in the case of gifts by Mahomedans. On the other hand the English doctrine of advancement was recognised in Kishen Koomar Moitra v. Mrs. M. S. Stevenson (2). The learned Judges said:

"As between the father and daughter, both of English extraction and living under the English law, why should the doctrine of advancement not be considered applicable? If by English law certain rights are secured to a child by the doctrine of advancement, why should the child by living with its parents in this country be deprived of that right? Had litigation arisen between French and his daughter that would have been governed by English law and the doctrine of advancement might have been effectually pleaded by the daughter."

The doctrine was assumed to apply in the case of Mc Gregor v. McGregor (3), which was decided by the Recorder of Rangoon in 1898. In S. 39, T. P. Act, there is a reference to a provision for advancement and such an expression could only apply to persons of British nationality. The mere fact that the parties have been educated or have chiefly resided in India cannot affect their personal law and, in my opinion, the burden of proving that the registration of the land on which Kerry and Kildare are built in the name of Mrs. Kerwick was not intended as an advancement lies upon the plaintiff. The parties lived happily together until January 1915. With the exception of the evidence of the parties themselves, there is very little evidence of facts antecedent to or contemporaneous with the purchase to show whether the intention of the plaintiff was to create a trust or an advancement. Mrs. Kerwick says that she and her husband were on very good terms and that he told her he intended to make provision for her. In para 5 of the plaint Kerwick states that he purchased the properties with the object of making provision for his children. In cross-examination he said that he wished the property to benefit his children not after their death but to help in their education and that he intended to give them to them when they reached a reasonable age. He took out 3 insurance policies one of which was intended for Terence, and in 1912 he bought Kenmare which he admits was intended for Dagmar. Apart, therefore, from Kildare and Kerry, he did make provision for his children which makes it the less unlikely that he made some provision for his wife and the more probable that the property in her name was intended for that purpose.

It is argued that if Kerwick's intention was to benefit his wife he would not have entered into so wild a speculation as house building on borrowed capital. But the same argument would apply with reference to his intention to benefit his children, and it is clear from his own statements that he did not make the purchases as a speculation but as provision for his family. It is also urged that it is improbable that he would borrow money from his sister to benefit his wife.

There is, however, no more improbability in his borrowing from a wealthy sister to benefit his wife than to benefit his children who were very young at the time. On any view of the case Kerwick's financial proceedings are somewhat remarkable. The learned Judge, after reviewing the financial resources of Kerwick, says that it is very unlikely that a man possessed of Rs. 8,000 would borrow Rs. 50,000 to make a present to his wife. He remarks that it is significant that between 1907 and 1912 Kerwick could or at any rate did only repay Balthazar and Son Rs. 4,500, and that at the time of separation his wife did not contend that he had any other sources of income except his salary. I do not think that this passage correctly represents the financial position and dealings of Kerwick. Kerwick admits that he had a banking account with Messrs. Thos. Cook and Son only. In his letter to his wife, Ex. 6, dealing with his financial position and the burden of debts, he says that his salary (inclusive of profits from the houses) is Rs. 515 and that after making certain payments, he will only have Rs. 185 on which to live. He continues:

"The other source from which I sometimes derived a little is at an end, after your and Lend-say's bloodthirsty plans and threats at Father Colombo's house."

Such is his own account of his financial position, but his passbook exhibits a most extraordinary situation. Credits to the amount of Rs. 1,87,000 odd were placed to his account from 1907—15 and vary from Rs. 5,000 in 1909 to Rs. 42,000 odd in 1914. The loans from Balthazar will not account for much of this money. In 1905, the credits are only about Rs. 1,800; the next year they are Rs. 3,200 but when building begins in 1907, they leap up to Rs. 18,000. His banking account does not show that he had Rs. 8,000 in 1907. The money may have been elsewhere but if so, there was no necessity for him to borrow Rs. 8,000 from a sister, or Rs. 12,000 from Balthazar. It is not necessary to enter into Kerwick's financial dealings generally, as they are not really relevant to the case, nor are there the materials on the record for such an examination; but I think it may be said that Kerwick must have thought it possible to raise considerable sums of money, before he commenced building, or he would not have undertaken the ventures. Before he paid off what was due on Kildare and Kerry, Kerwick bought Kenmare in November 1912 for Rs. 17,000 for his daughter, and in the same month he writes to his wife in England and suggests that she should send him a power-of-attorney to enable him to deposit the title deeds of Kerry to help her father. In March 1913, he borrowed Rs. 12,000 for his father-in-law and appears to have taken no security from him for the loan. Mrs. Kerwick admits that her husband treated her generously, and the loan to the father-in-law was certainly a very generous proceeding on the part of a man with such small ostensible means. This loan and the character of his financial proceedings generally are, I think, a sufficient answer to the contention that a man of his means would not buy two houses for his wife. The parties were on very good terms at the time, and there was no idea that they were likely to separate. So long as they lived together, the rents from the property were their mutual benefit. In these circumstances, it is no more unlikely that Kerwick intended an advancement for his wife when he purchased Kildare and Kerry, than that he would lend her father Rs. 12,000.

It is common ground that Kerwick managed the properties, collected the rents and paid them into his own banking account. This, however, may have been merely an arrangement to suit the convenience of the parties. Mrs. Kerwick was in England much longer periods than her husband, who remitted her £20 a month for the expenses of herself, the two children and a niece. In Grey v. Grey (4) the fact that a father received the profits of an estate for his adult son for 20 years, built much and provided materials for buildings, and treated for the sale of an estate, was not held sufficient to rebut the presumption of an advancement arising from the purchase of the property in the son's name.

In the case of English people resident in India, the arrangement made would probably be determined to some extent by considerations of convenience, and I do not think the management of the estate by Kerwick is conclusive evidence that the registration of it in his wife's name was a trust only. The houses were in the name of Kerwick in the Municipal Office at the time of the filing of the suit, but how long they had stood in his name is not clear. Kerwick says that so far as he knew of recent years the tax bills have been made out in his name, and explains that he means for the last two or three years. It would have been easy for him to produce evidence to show that they had always stood in his name. The same considerations as to convenience would apply, if the arrangement was that he should manage them on behalf of his wife. Kerwick explains that the reason why the land was registered in the Registration Office in his wife's name was his belief that he was not allowed to speculate in land, but that in 1912 he found out that there was no rule forbidding officers to buy a house for themselves to live in but they were only prohibited from buying from natives of India. Cl. 9, of the Government Servants Conduct Rules, 1904 (as corrected up to 1912), allows any Government servant to buy immovable property for residential purposes, and allows members of the Provincial or Subordinate Civil Services to acquire immovable property by purchase with the sanction of the Local Government or the Head of a Department specially empowered to grant such sanction. Kerwick is a member of the Provincial Service. There is no absolute prohibition in the rules against a purchase of house property from a native of India; report of the intention of the officer making the purchase must be made to the Commissioner for his orders. Had Kerwick really consulted the rules (1912), he would have found that he could not purchase Kenmare without permission. Moreover, if his intention was to conceal his operations from his superior officials, why were not the houses also put in his wife's name in the Municipal Office? Until he came into Court, Kerwick never suggested that the houses had been registered benami in order to evade the rules. On 18th November 1912 he wrote to his wife as follows:

"Now, dear, Pa to get on with his business wants some security in the bank and I let him have the house paper of Kerney house, which are now free from debt, to deposit in the Chartered Bank. . . Well as the house is in your name the bank have refused Pa I wanted to draw up a stamped paper for a power-of-attorney giving me full power to sell, borrow money on or to register any transfer of your property. . ."

Further on in the same letter he tells her that he is buying Kenmare and says: "I cannot put this house in your name as you are not here, so see what you have lost." He explains that he was merely joking. The pleasantry is very weak and does not explain the use of the expression "your property." In reply to this letter she sent him a power-of-attorney. Now at the time this letter was written, Kerwick had found out that he was not prohibited from holding property, if his story is to be believed. It is difficult to understand why instead of asking for a power-of-attorney to sell her or borrow on property, he did not ask her for once to re-transfer the houses to his name which would have saved much trouble. He did not make any attempt to have the houses transferred back to his name, but suggested that if she had been in India the new purchase would have been put in her name also. If the old transactions were benami, the expression "see what you have lost" is meaningless. On receiving the power-of-attorney, he seems first of all to have borrowed Rs. 12 000 on the security of life insurances and then to have repaid the sum by a loan from Balthazar (see Exs. C and Z). The promissory note Ex. C, was signed by him, "Mrs. K. M. Kerwick by her attorney." He says that he borrowed the money from Balthazar on the security of Kerry. The way in which the promissory note, Ex. C, was signed appears to indicate an intention of holding his wife responsible, which is not a very intelligible proceeding if she had no property to meet the debt. In my opinion, Kerwick's contention that he put Kidare and Kerry into his wife's name benami is not even plausible.

In January 1915 the parties quarrelled but decline to disclose the reasons for the estrangement. Mrs. Kerwick's parents had been staying with them at Kerry in 1911 and left the house owing to a quarrel with Kerwick. It is urged that Mrs. Kerwick would not have permitted her husband to send them away if the house had been her own. This however depends on whether she decided to side with her husband or not—either they or her husband had to leave Kerry, and unless she intended to break with him the natural course of events was for the parents to quit. I am unable to see in what way this incident tends to show that she was not the owner of Kerry. Mrs. Kerwick says that when she quarrelled with her husband she threatened to go home and asked him how the house stood. He then gave her Ex. 7, which is a statement of the debt on Kidare and Kerry, the taxes due, insurances, the names of the tenants and the rents. Apparently he is also alleged to have given her Ex. 8, a statement of her father's debt. Kerwick states that he does not remember giving these two papers to her and with reference to the former, he is unable to suggest any reason why he drew it up if it was not for his wife. He thinks he drew up Ex. 8 to assist his memory. If Ex. 7 was intended as a mere aid to his memory, it is difficult to understand why it commences with the information that the papers are with Balthazar (a fact he could not have forgotten) or why there is no mention of Kenmare. Ex. 8 begins, "Pa's loan from Gasper Rupees 6,000." Gasper was the insurance agent. On 1st April Kerwick repaid Balthazar Rs. 12,000 which was made up of Rupees 6,000 repaid by "Pa" and another Rupees 6,000 borrowed from Gasper. It is argued that the words at the end of Ex. 8 "Pa paid Kathleen £ 20" indicate that the note was one for his private information, as, if it was intended for her, the expression would have been "Pa paid you." There is some force in this contention, but it is not conclusive, as he may have made out the account in the more formal manner of inserting the name of the recipient. On the whole, I think the balance of probability is in favour of Mrs. Kerwick's version.

The parties were unable to come to an understanding and on 1st March 1911, a deed of separation was drawn up by a priest. It provides that Kerwick shall pay his wife £ 8 monthly out of his income, and also more if possible, that the father is to keep Terence at school and have him with him during the vacations, a similar arrangement, mutatis mutandis, being made for Dagmar. Mrs. Kerwick was to leave for England at once and her husband was to pay her passage. The defendant contends that she accepted so small a sum of £ 8 because it was understood that she was the owner of Kildare and Kerry. She is supported in her contention by Father Colombo, whose evidence, however, has been rejected by the learned trial Judge on the ground that it is probable that Father Colombo's memory is at fault. This conclusion is reached by the learned Judge after consideration of the subsequent conduct of the parties. This portion of the case has been argued very elaborately at the Bar. Both parties admit that something was said about the houses. Kerwick's version of the conversation is that nothing was said about his wife receiving the income from the Rangoon houses, but that Father Colombo did say that £ 8 was too small an allowance, and that when she called attention to the income from the houses he explained that they were heavily mortgaged and brought in very little. There is no mention about the income from the houses in the deed itself, and the omission is noteworthy. The argument to be drawn from it would have been still more forcible if the deed had been drawn up by conveyancer instead of by a young

Italian priest. There is no evidence to show whether the expression "and more if possible" had any allusion to the houses which Kerwick said were heavily mortgaged. Father Colombo says he thinks Kerwick said the property belonged to his wife and that this was the idea he gave him. In answer to interrogatory No. 10, which was as follows:

"Is it not a fact that at the said interview the plaintiff proposed to make the defendant an allowance of £ 8, that you suggested an allowance of £ 12; that the defendant then remarked that the plaintiff had properties in Rangoon which brought the plaintiff an additional income; that the plaintiff then said that after paying taxes and rates and interest on mortgages he got about Rs. 10 a month out of his properties and that he was keeping those properties for the benefit of his children and that if the income from the properties was to be further discussed the plaintiff would break off the discussion?"

Father Colombo replied, "In this particular meeting of which mention is made there was no discussion about any house property. It was only at a subsequent meeting when the deed was signed that a mention was made of the property and it is referred to in answer to No. 11, examination-in-chief."

In answer to the 12th and 13th interrogatories by plaintiff the witness would not swear that there was any claim by defendant to the property or admission by the plaintiff on the subject, but in answer to the 14th question he again said Mrs. Kerwick laid claim to the property. Turning now to Ex. II, written by plaintiff on 15th November, I find the following passage:

"I have remitted to you monthly the sum of Rs. 120 as stipulated in the priestly agreement, and I am remitting Rs. 50 a month as interest on your father's loan of Rs. 6,000 to the money-lender in Rangoon, which ordinarily should go to you to make your monthly allowance, i.e., Rs. 170 (120 plus 50)."

Kerwick explains that this statement means that if he had not had to send the money to the money-lender he would have sent it to her, if she had not claimed the house and her father had paid the debt; and in cross examination he says that he had promised to give her more than £ 8 if possible and intended to carry this out. I do not think on this evidence that the passage in Ex. II read with the 10th interrogatory can be construed into an admission on the part of Kerwick that he was bound to pay her Rs. 50 out of the income from the houses. Father Colombo's memory as to the details of the conversation seems defective. It seems to me most probable that Mrs. Kerwick was dissatisfied with the allowance, and pointed to the house property income and made some claim to it, whereupon Kerwick said they were very heavily mortgaged and the payments on them absorbed nearly the whole of the income, but that if possible he would pay her more than the £8. Father Colombo's evidence does not amount to much more than that he carried away the impression that Kerwick had settled the property on his wife, an impression that might arise from Kerwick undertaking to allow her more if the interest on her father's loan was paid him, and the houses were let, but Colombo will not swear positively that there was any definite admission or claim as to the ownership. Objection has been taken to the admission of oral evidence at the trial as to the contents of certain letters sent by Kerwick, but not asked for by him, to be produced at the trial.

The Judge ruled that Mrs. Kerwick could be asked her recollection as to the contents of the letters. We are of opinion that the evidence on p. 49 of the record about the contents of these letters is inadmissible, Ss. 32, 65 and 66, Evidence Act, and ruled accordingly at the hearing. In enacting S. 22, Indian legislature followed the rule laid down in Lawless v. Queale (5) in preference to that in Statler v. Pooley (6). This portion of the evidence was used by the trial Judge to discredit Father Colombo, the trustworthiness of whose evidence I have already discussed. When the deed of separation was drawn up, Dagmar was in England and Terence was sent to school at Mussoorie where he fell ill. Mrs. Kerwick promptly cancelled her power-of-attorney and informed Balthazar of her action. In August Kerwick agreed to Terence being taken to England but refused to allow him to see his mother's parents. Negotiations broke down owing to this restriction, which Mrs. Kerwick regarded as ridiculous. According to the deed of separation Mrs. Kerwick was to go home at once, but her husband seems to have been unable to meet the necessary expenditure (see Ex. 6). In September he wrote to her detailing his difficulties and asking her to leave him a free hand in respect to the houses.

In October (Ex. G) she replied and asked him to sell Kildare and transfer Kerry to her free of debt. In his reply (Ex. H) he did not repudiate her claim to the houses, although in his cross-examination he stated that he considered the claim an impudent one. He discussed the debts due on the houses and said that Rs. 12,000 had been raised on the mortgage of Kerry for her father. He did not mention the fact that Balthazar had been repaid. Kerry is apparently free from debt to Balthazar. It is clear that whether Kerwick denied his wife's claim subsequently to the separation or not she did not abandon it. It is suggested that she used it merely as a means for bringing pressure to bear on him to let her have Terence. She admits that the real contest was over the boy, and even after the suit had been filed she wrote to her husband and said that "the houses never troubled her." But the argument is a two edged weapon. It is equally open to the defendant to argue that the plaintiff used his right of custody of the boy, to induce her to abandon her claim to the houses. They had been represented to her as being heavily mortgaged and as bringing in a very small income. Her father owed Kerwick money. In these circumstances she was probably willing to waive her rights in the Rangoon property, if an arrangement satisfactory to her was reached about Tenance. I do not think the argument from pressure gives real assistance to either party in this case. No arrangement was reached and in December Mrs. Kerwick's Advocates wrote to Kerwick. The subsequent correspondence between the parties' Advocates throws no light on Kerwick's intention when he bought the property in 1907 and 1908.

The evidence relating to Kerwick's intention is somewhat meagre, but the onus of proof lay upon him and in my judgment he failed to discharge it. I think that the probability is that he intended to make provision for Mrs. Kerwick, just as he was making provision for his children. The letter, Ex. 1, from which the most reasonable inference would be that it was written to the owner of the property, cannot be explained away as a mere jeu d'esprit. It is not until the deed of separation has been signed that Kerwick suggested that the property was not Mrs. Kerwick's and then so far as admissible evidence on the record goes, not until the suit is about to be filed. I have already stated my reasons for believing that Kerwick's explanation that the property was transferred to his wife benami is untrue. There is practically nothing left in plaintiff's favour, except his management of the property, and this is inconclusive evidence of ownership in a case such as this. I would allow the appeal and dismiss the plaintiff's suit with costs in both Courts.

Maung Kin, J.—I concur in holding that the onus is on the plaintiff of rebutting the presumption that the purchases were by way of advancement in favour of his wife, the defendant. The Indian law on the subject of advancement is contained in S. 82, Trusts Act, which has been made applicable to Rangoon. The section provides:

"Where property is transferred to one person for a consideration paid or provided by another person, and it appears that such other person did not intend to pay or provide such consideration for the benefit of the transferee, the transferee must hold the property for the benefit of the person paying or providing the consideration."

It will be seen that on the subject of any presumption arising in the case of the transferee being the wife or the child of the person paying the consideration, nothing is stated in the section. The question of advancement or no advancement is left as one of intention, which will have to be proved according to the law of evidence. The same is the case in English law. So in this case the question would be:

"Did the husband intend that his wife should hold the property purchased as trustee for him or that she was to have the beneficial interest therein?"

On whom, then does the onus lie as to the intention of the husband? In England it is easy to answer the question, because a presumption in favour of an advancement to the wife is allowed. In India there is at first sight some difficulty, for we have decisions between Hindus as well as between Mahomedans to the effect that the English presumption of advancement cannot be recognised. The reason assigned in the case of Hindus is their inveterate practice of holding land in the name of another. The principle of the decisions in Hindu cases has been extended to those of Mahomedans, because as observed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Moulvie Sayyud Ushur Ali v. Mt. Bebee Ulfat Fatima (7), though:

"we cannot apply to the decision of a case between Mahomedans . . . any reasons . . . drawn exclusively from the Hindu law. . . it is perfectly clear that in so far as the practice of holding lands and buying lands in the name of another exists, that practice exists in India as much among the Mahomedans as among the Hindus."

And as regards the Burmans we have the case of Mecyappa Chetty v. Maung Ba Bu (8), where the principle was extended by a Bench composed of Sir Charles Fox, C. J., and Parlett, J. The learned Chief Judge observed in his judgment:

"Neither Court had in mind the long line of decisions referred to at pp. 561 and 627 of Ameer Ali and Woodroffe's Evidence Act as to the presumption to be made in India when a person purchases property and takes a conveyance in the name of a relation. As far back as 1854 it was decided by the Privy Council that the presumption made in English law that the purchase in such a case was for the benefit and advancement of the person to whom the conveyance is made, does not apply in India, and that the presumption in India is that the purchase is benami and that the burden lies on the person to whom the conveyance has been made of proving that he is entitled to and beneficially interested in the property."

It does not appear that the learned Chief Judge grounds his decision on the same reason as did the Privy Council in the Mahomedan case above cited. It has now come to be stated in text books and judicial decisions that in India a purchase by a husband in his wife's name creates no presumption of gift to her or of advancement for her benefit. I venture to think that the proposition stated in this form is far too wide and embraces cases of persons who were not in view, when the judicial decisions against the presumption of advancement were given. The case of persons of British nationality was clearly never under consideration. The presumption allowed by English law is not a presumption juris et de jure but is one of fact and I consider that this presumption is made in English law, not only because the wife is found to be invested with one of the principal incidents of ownership, but also because the husband in putting the property in her name must have had some intention regarding the transaction and the probabilities are that the intention is to confer a benefit upon the wife. I am unable to see why such a presumption cannot be drawn in the present case. Under S. 114, Evidence Act, Courts may presume the existence of any fact which it thinks likely to have happened, regard being had to the common course of natural events, human conduct and public and private business. in their relation to the facts of the particular case. There can be no doubt that in the case of persons of British nationality residing in India it cannot be said that they have the inveterate habit of holding property in the name of others. I would, therefore, hold that the English presumption of advancement should in this case be drawn in favour of the defendant. As regards the facts also I am entirely of the same opinion as my learned colleague.

Civil Ref. No. 2 of 1917, Decided on 7th August 1917, made by Divl. Judge, Meiktila, D/. 9th January 1917.

Under S. 16 a decree nisi can be pronounced only by a High Court. [P 23 C 1]

Judgment.—On 8th July 1916 in the Divisional Court, Meiktila, Ma Waing obtained a decree nisi for the dissolution of her marriage with Ebrahim, which decree has now come to this Court for confirmation. The parties were married as Native Christians on 11th March 1910 at the A. B. Mission, Myingyan, by the Rev. E. Tribolent. Three months before this case the respondent, having become a Mahomedan, married a Mahomedan woman. There is no reason to suppose there was any collusion or connivance. The decree for the dissolution of the marriage is confirmed. The Divisional Judge's procedure was incorrect and has resulted in great delay in affording the petitioner her relief. He should under S. 14, Act 4 of 1869 have pronounced a decree declaring marriage dissolved on 8th July 1916 and have at once submitted his proceedings to this Court under S. 17, and the decree might have been confirmed in January 1917. A decree nisi can be pronounced only by a High Court under S. 16.

Criminal Appeal No. 315 of 1916, Decided on 29th May 1916.

(a) Criminal P. C. (5 of 1898), S. 309 (2) — Judge, after delivery of opinions by assessors, cannot view scene of offence.

Under S. 309 (2) a Sessions Judge is bound to give judgment after the assessors have given their opinions and he is not competent to take into account his observations of the locality where the crime was committed and which is visited by him alone after the assessors have given their opinions. [P 23 C 1]

(b) Oaths Act (10 of 1813), S. 13—Omission of oath intentional—Section does not apply.

Section 13 does not extend to cases where the omission of the oath or affirmation has been intentional. [P 24 C 1]

P. D. Patel—for Appellant.

Parlett, J.—The appellant Deya was tried before the Sessions Judge with assessors on charges of having murdered her mother-in-law and of having attempted to murder her sister-in-law by pushing them both into a well. The assessors considered neither charge proved, but the Sessions Judge disagreeing with them convicted her of murder and sentenced her to transportation for life, but stayed the trial of the other charge under S. 240, Criminal P. C.

One of the grounds of appeal is that the Sessions Judge erred in visiting the scene of crime after the assessors had given their opinion and without notice to and in the absence of accused and her counsel. The hearing of the case was concluded and the assessors' opinion was taken on 21st March 1916. In his judgment delivered on 23rd March the Sessions Judge states that on 22nd he visited the locality alone with the record of the case and the plans filed in it but without notice to any one. One of the witnesses in the case happened to be there and pointed out one of several wells there as the one in which the deceased's body was found, and from the plans and the evidence the Judge was satisfied that it was the one. He made certain observations on the condition of the sides of the well, its surroundings and the vegetation growing there, and drew conclusions therefrom adverse to some of the evidence for the defence. In the first place there are admittedly many wells in the neighbourhood, and there is no proof that the well which the Sessions Judge inspected is in fact the one in which the deceased's body was found. In the next place, the tragedy occurred on 11th December 1915 after recent rain, when the condition of the ground and vegetation would be very different from that on 22nd March after several months' drought. Finally it was not competent to the Sessions Judge to take into account any observations of the locality made by him alone after the assessors had given their opinions. If at an earlier stage he thought that the assessors should view the place, he should have made an order under S. 293, Criminal P. C. and he might himself have accompanied them. But once they gave their opinions it only remained for the Judge to give judgment under S. 309, sub.S. (2). He had no power to do anything further. In my opinion, therefore, that part of the judgment dealing with the Sessions Judge's visit to the spot and his conclusions from what he saw there must be entirely eliminated, and the case must be considered solely on the admissible evidence on the record.

Another ground of appeal is that the Sessions Judge refused to allow appellant's counsel to put leading questions in cross examination to one of the witnesses. The refusal to allow a question to be put in cross-examination merely because it was in form a leading question would be improper, as the Judge cannot abrogate S. 143, Evidence Act. But there is no allegation before us that any such question was in fact disallowed, or what that question was. If that had occurred counsel doubtless would have asked for his question and the order disallowing it to be recorded, but this was not done. All that appears in the record is a note by the Judge at the end of the deposition of this witness, a little girl of eight or nine years of age, in which he says,

"It has been a matter of great time and patience to question her in such a way as not to suggest the answer she might be expected to give and to be sure that she understood the question and meant to say what her answer implied. So far as I am aware, no question which might suggest the answer has been put, and on the whole I am of opinion that the girl understood the questions and at the time when she gave the answers meant to say what she is recorded as having said."

An answer is usually of far less evidentiary value if given in reply to a leading question and the Judge was clearly anxious to avoid any suggestive questions being put to her even in examination-in-chief. She was cross-examined at great length on two days, and in the absence of any record of a question being disallowed and any specific allegation of that having been done, there appears to me to be no ground for supposing that the cross-examination of this witness was hampered by the Court. The remaining grounds of appeal deal with the evidence in the case, and the chief matter for consideration is the statement of the little girl Sadiya, the only eye-witness of the occurrence. She is a Hindu about eight or nine years of age, and at the conclusion of her examination the Judge noted as follows:

"She was not put on oath, as I am of opinion that she is not of an age to understand the nature of an oath."

Being a Hindu S. 6, Oaths Act, forbade her being put upon oath at all, and the Judge can only have meant that she made no affirmation. The printed heading of her statement shows the word "sworn" crossed out and the word "affirmed" left. This was evidently done by a clerk before she was examined by the Judge, and in view of the Judge's subsequent note I have no doubt that the girl made no affirmation. The Judge quotes S. 13, Oaths Act, as making her statement admissible in evidence. The point is mentioned in the ground of appeal, and though it was not argued at the hearing, I think it must be considered. In Queen v. Sewa Bhogta (1) four out of five Judges held that the word "omission" in S. 13 Act 10 of 1873 includes any omission and is not limited to accidental or negligent omissions. This was followed in Queen Empress v. Shava (2) by one of two Judges, the other deciding the case without expressing an opinion on that point. In Queen Empress v. Viraperumal (3) the two Judges composing the Bench disagreed on the point. There are two Allahabad cases to the contrary effect, Queen-Empress v. Mara (4), the decision of a single Judge, and Queen-Empress v. Lal Sihal (5) by a Bench of two Judges. In Burma I can only find one decision on the point, Dwa Nyung v. King-Emperor (6), in which a statement made designedly without oath or affirmation was held to be admissible.

I find considerable difficulty in following the reasoning in that judgment. In the first place, the head-note is misleading, as it shows Queen v. Sewa Bhogta (1) and Queen-Empress v. Shava (2) as dissented from, whereas they are in fact followed. Next, the learned Judge refers to the latter ruling as dissenting from the former, whereas the one Judge who decided the question expressly concurred with the Calcutta case and differed from the Allahabad case (see p. 366). Again the learned Judge of this Court expresses his concurrence with a passage from the Bombay case which, if read alone, would imply that the deliberate omission to administer an oath or affirmation to a witness is not curable by S. 13, Oaths Act. Moreover, the point is expressly said not to be very material, as there was other reliable evidence of undoubted admissibility sufficient for a decision in the case. Under these circumstances it appears to me that Pwa Nyun's case (6) cannot be regarded as a very weighty authority. In my opinion the reasons given in the Allahabad rulings and by Sir Arthur Collins, C. J. in the Madras ruling for not extending S. 13 to cases where the omission of the oath or affirmation was intentional are sound and that the view of the dissenting Judge in Queen v. Sewa Bhogta (1) is correct. If the decision of the majority of that Bench were carried to its logical conclusion, it would give rise to a proposition which a Full Bench of the same High Court has more recently described as "at once novel and startling," Nundo Lal Bose v. Nistarini Dasi (7).

I am of opinion that the statement of Sadiya recorded at the Sessions trial is not admissible in evidence and it is necessary that her evidence in the case should be taken under S. 428, Criminal P. C., and I would direct the Sessions Judge to summon her before him and after causing her to make an affirmation under S. 6, Oaths Act, to take her evidence in the presence of appellant's counsel. It is desirable that she should be asked to describe as exactly as possible the relative positions and the attitude of herself, her mother and the accused before and at the time of the acts which she alleges against the accused, and also to describe the precise manner in which the accused did

v.

U Gyaw—Convict.

Criminal Reven. No. 267-A of 1917, Decided on 24th November 1917.

Burma Forest Act (4 of 1902), S. 31—Rule under, Rr. 22, 98—Licensee to fell timber is liable, on breach of conditions, for acts of his servants.

A licensee or other person permitted to fell timber in accordance with certain conditions under rules framed under the Forest Act is liable to be punished under those rules for the acts of his servants, whether authorised by him or not, and even if the acts are in contravention of his instructions, provided that those servants were acting within the scope of their master's authority and unless the master can show that he acted in good faith and did all that could be reasonably expected of him to prevent the breach of the conditions under which he is permitted to fell the timber. [P 25 C 2]

Gaunt—for the Crown.

Judgment.—U Gyaw has been convicted under R. 98, read with R. 22 of the Burma Forest Act for having felled undersized kamaung trees in contravention of a license issued in the joint names of U Mra Tha Tun and himself. The case was tried summarily and the facts are not as clearly stated as is desirable. They have not, however, been challenged, and the only point argued is whether on the Magistrate's finding, the accused is liable to be convicted of any offence. The Magistrate found that three undersized kamaung logs were cut by coolies employed by the accused; that the accused did not remove the logs (possibly because he had already been fined for a similar offence) and that in any case, whether the cutting was authorised by the accused or not, he was responsible and liable to the punishment prescribed by R. 98.

Rule 22 is as follows:

"No person shall fell cut, girdle, mark, lop, tap or injure by fire or otherwise . . . any teak tree or any other tree of the kinds specified in the Appendix 1 and within the areas therein specified . . . save under and in accordance with the condition of a special agreement with Government or a license, etc. . . ."

This Rule is framed under the powers conferred on the Local Government by S. 31 of the Act. S. 31, is in Ch. 3, which is headed "General Protection of Forests and Forest Produce." The object of the Forest Act is to enable the Local Government to control the administration of forest areas by declaring some areas to be reserved forest, by regulating the felling of trees and the extracting of forest produce, and by imposing duty to be paid for privileges granted to individuals to trade and work within areas under forest. To secure this control, rules have been framed, and licenses are issued. It is well known that licensees seldom fell trees themselves and employ coolies for such work. The accused probably held a license under Form 3, the 8th condition of which is that any breach of the conditions of the license will render him liable to lose his license and to the punishment prescribed in the Act or the rules made thereunder. In Shin Gyi v. Emperor (1) a Full Bench of this Court held that a licensee of liquor shop whose agent or servant permits drunkenness is punishable under the provisions of S. 50, Excise Act. The principle on which the decision in that case proceeded is that the object of the Excise Act would be defeated if a licensee was permitted to excuse himself on the ground that his servants had disobeyed his orders, provided that the servants were acting within the scope of their authority. This principle is very clearly stated in the Metro-polition Police Commissioner v. Cartman (2) by Lord Russell, C. J., in the following passage:

"How do they (the licensees) carry on their business? From the nature of the case it must be largely carried on by others. . . . It is true that sometimes the licensee keeps in his own hands the direct control over his own business, but in the great majority of cases it is not so, the actual direct control being deputed to other persons; are the licensees in these cases to be liable for the acts of others. In my opinion they are, subject to this qualification, that the acts of the servant must be within the scope of his employment. . . . It makes no difference for the purposes of this section that the licensee has given private orders to his manager not to sell to drunken persons; were it otherwise, the object of the section would be . . . defeated."

A similar principle was applied in Strutt v. Cliff (3), which was a case under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, in which case the appellant was held liable for the unauthorised act of his bailiff in bringing back his family from the station in a milk cart and using the milk cart thus without a license. It seems to me that having regard to the objects of the Forest Act a similar responsibility must be attached to persons felling timber by coolies, otherwise the provisions of that Act would be rendered nugatory. The correct rule seems to be as follows: A licensee or other person permitted to fell timber in accordance with certain conditions under rules framed under the Forest Act is liable to be punished under those rules for the acts of his servants, whether authorised by him or not, and even if the acts are in contravention of his instructions, provided that these servants were acting within scope of their master's authority, and unless the master can show that he acted in good faith and did all that could be reasonably expected of him to prevent the breach of the conditions under which he is permitted to fell the timber.

There is no reason for interference with the conviction in the present case, and the proceedings are returned.

FACTS appear from the following judgment of the Sub-Divisional Judge:

"This suit is instituted by the plaintiff Maung Sein Bu, who bases his claim on a registered deed of assignment. The defendant not only opposes the claim but denies the validity of the assignment. On 14th January 1916, the Advocates on both sides argued the matter. It is issue 6 in the case. Act; Pragi Lal v. Fateh Chand (1) and Abu Mahomed v. S. C. Chunder (2).

The pleader for plaintiff contended that S. 6 T. P. Act, is not applicable to this District (see para. 748, Lower Burma Courts Manual. The question of validity of the assignment is between assignor and assignee, between whom consideration had passed. The Court reserved orders for 18th January 1916. On 15th January 1916, plaintiff applied to amend his plaint by the addition of the assignor Maung Sein Nyun as a co plaintiff. Counsel for defendant opposed the application and further arguments were heard. The application to amend was made in accordance with O. 1, R. 10 (1), (2), Civil P. C., O. 6, R. 17, and with reference to Ma Gyi v. Ma Yeik (3), Gonal Dass Agrawallah v. Budree Dass Sureka (4), Krishna Bai v. Collector and Government Agent, Tanjore (5), Seshamma v. Chennappa (6). Two authorities were quoted by defendant, viz., Bhanu Tukaram Shet v. Koshinath Pandshet (7), Sayad Abdul Hak v. Gulam Jilani (8). Also Swrie v. Redman (9) and Walcott v. Lyons (10), but these are very old and at any rate it is unnecessary to fall back on English cases when there are sufficient rulings of the Indian Courts. The authorities cited by plaintiff are very clear and the application for amendment is allowed. Under the circumstances, Maung Sein Nyun (the assignor) is added as a co plaintiff and the hearing of the suit will proceed."

Judgment.—Interlocutory orders will not be interfered with in revision unless for the most cogent reasons, and in order to prevent otherwise irremediable injury [V. V. M. Chetty Firm v. R. M. A. R. Arunachallum Chetty (11)]. In this case I consider neither consideration existed, for it is stated that the merits of the case are not affected by the addition of the party which is complained of. Anklesaria—for Appellants.

Doctor—for Respondents.

Judgment.—By a registered deed of 8th December 1915 the defendant conveyed to the plaintiff the land in suit for Rs. 5,450. The land was let out to tenants. The plaintiff sued for possession and for a declaration that he was the absolute owner. The defence was that the transaction of 8th December 1915 was a benami transaction entered into in order to defeat creditors of the defendant and that the defendant was entitled to rely upon that defence inasmuch as the fraud was not carried out.

Plaintiff in his plaint states that the consideration for this sale consisted of an undertaking to redeem a certain mortgage of Rs. 2,000 on this land, a payment of Rs. 1,620 made to the defendant personally on 14th November 1915, two payments of Rs. 900, Rs. 630 respectively both made on 2nd December 1915 at the request of the defendant to two judgment-creditors of his, and a payment of Rs. 300 on 7th December in respect of interest due on the above mortgage, making in all Rs. 5,450. The payments of Rs. 900, Rs. 630 and Rs. 300 are admitted but the defendant states that he re-paid the Rs. 900 in the following Tabodwe through his tenants, one of whom says he gave 600 baskets to the plaintiff's son and the other 300 baskets. An issue was raised as to whether these items forming the consideration for the purchase were actually paid by the plaintiff. The District Judge found that Rs. 1,620 had not been paid. He also found that the defendant had not re-paid the Rs. 900. We agree with the District Judge in those findings. The evidence as to the re payment of the Rs. 900 is extremely scanty and if the transaction of 8th December 1915 was in fact a mortgage, as the District Judge seems to think, it is improbable that the defendant would re-pay so soon after the mortgage was taken. On the other hand, if it was an outright sale there would be no debt to be re-paid. The document being in the form of an outright sale, the defendant is precluded from showing that it was in fact a mortgage, but he is entitled to show that the consideration has not been paid. The plaintiff states that the Rs. 1,620 was paid on 14th November at a time when the defendant appears to have been under arrest for a debt, in which case the money could not have been paid at the plaintiff's house. The plaintiff says that on 14th November the price of the land was arranged; he was to redeem the mortgage and to pay only the balance to the defendant and he paid this curious sum of Rs. 1,620 on that date, i.e., long before he could possibly know the amounts that would be due under the decrees that he subsequently paid off for the defendant. The plaintiff took no receipt from the defendant for this alleged payment of Rs. 1,620 but he took the trouble to call three witnesses to testify to the payment. We think it very improbable that the plaintiff would have paid so large a sum without taking a receipt so long before the document was executed, and we agree with the District Judge in his comment as to the absence of the Thugyi and other respectable witnesses at the time of the alleged payment. We find as a fact that that payment was not made. The question then arises, should we in this appeal grant the plaintiff a decree postponing possession until he has paid the balance of the consideration.

Two cases have been cited as authorities to show that the seller is entitled to retain possession until the consideration is paid. These are Umsidal Motiram v. Dado bin Dhondiba (1) and Subrahmanya Ayyar v. Pooran (2). It is true that defendant did not raise this question as an alternative defence but he does so in the memorandum of appeal. An issue was raised and determined as to whether these items forming the consideration had been paid, and seeing that those facts have been fully gone into and determined we think we should give such relief as is warranted by the facts proved. The decree of the lower Court is modified and there will be a decree for the plaintiff for possession upon his paying Rs. 1,620 to the credit of the defendant into Court (District Court) within three months from this date. The defendant did not raise the point in the lower Court on which his appeal has succeeded and, therefore, he is not entitled to costs on that account. On the other hand the respondent has been successful in this appeal on the question of the transaction being benami. The respondent is, therefore, entitled to his costs to that extent in this appeal, i.e., the difference between the value of the appeal and Rs. 1,620. The order as to the costs in the District Court will stand good.

Judgment.—Appellant sued for a divorce on account of her husband's cruelty and obtained a decree in the Township Court. In the District Court the decree was reversed, the District Judge holding that the conduct of the defendant-respondent did not amount to cruelty and relying on Mi Pa Du v. Maung Shwe Bank (1). That there was cruelty is abundantly clear. The husband admitted kicking her on the back and when appellant made her complaint to the Thugyi, her cheeks were red from the injuries she received. I fail to understand how the Additional Judge of the District Court found there was no cruelty. In Maung Po Han v. Ma Ta Lok (2) Twomey, J., held that under Burmese Criminal Revn. No. 261-B of 1916, Decided on 27th September 1916, from order of Second Addl. Mag. Rangoon, D/- 10th August 1916, in Criminal Misc. Trial No. 56 of 1916.

Criminal P. C. (5 of 1898), Ss. 488, 489—Maintenance order in favour of daughters can be cancelled when they are able to maintain themselves.

Where a father is ordered to make an allowance for the maintenance of his daughters, but it is subsequently found that the daughters have become qualified to maintain themselves, the order may be discharged notwithstanding that the daughters are desirous of continuing their education or are reluctant to work for their living.

Order.—There were two applications before the Magistrate under S. 489, Criminal P. C.. The present petitioner had obtained an order under S. 488 in 1909 that respondent should pay Rs. 35 per mensem as maintenance for his wife and two daughters. She applied on 18th May 1916 that the amount be raised to Rs. 147-3-0 per mensem. Respondent applied on 4th July 1916 that the maintenance for petitioner be reduced to Rs. 15 per mensem and that the order for maintenance of his two daughters be revoked on the ground that they were no longer unable to maintain themselves. Both applications were decided by one order, revision of which is now sought. The Magistrate ordered respondent to pay Rs. 35 per mensem for his wife. He held respondent need not pay any maintenance for his daughters. The sole question is whether they are within the meaning of the expression in S. 488 "unable to maintain themselves." Mr. Hamlyn urges that there is no proof that they are able and he goes so far as to urge that even if they are able but desire instead to continue their education or if they are not willing to maintain themselves they are unable to do so. Further that if they are able but cannot get work they are "unable." These young ladies are 16 and 18 years old nearly now. Their mother deposes to their educational qualifications. She states her younger daughter wants to read up to the B. A. and go on for medical work and that she does not want to work in any department or shop, but that if she works now she could earn Rs. 30 or 40 a month. She stated her elder girl was "reluctant to work." She wants to give her a high education before she begins to work. "She can now earn Rs. 20 or 25 per mensem if she now works." Evidence has been given that girls of these ages are taken in some firms and I have no doubt that if they chose, these two could earn money and support themselves. I cannot accept Mr. Hamlyn's view of the meaning of the section and no ground of revision has been made out. The application is dismissed.

Judgment.—The appeal in this case has been argued with the appeals in cases Nos. 57 and 58. Aung Min sold the appellant some land on which the respondents in these appeals have houses, and the appellant sued for ejectment. The question for decision in each case is whether the land used for house sites was so used by permission of Aung Min who claims it as owner. The only evidence that Aung Min owned the land and gave permission to the respondents to occupy it is his own statement, coupled with the survey map, which shows the land as Aung Min's property. With reference to survey maps, their Lordships of the Privy Council said in Jagadindra Nath Roy v. Secy. of State (1) that they were

"Official documents prepared by competent persons, and with such publicity and notice to persons interested as to be admissible and valuable evidence of the state of things at the time they were prepared. They are not conclusive and may be shown to be wrong; but in the absence of evidence to the contrary, they may be judicially received in evidence as correct when made."

In the present case a reference to the map shows that the houses have been built at the apex of a holding shown as Aung Min's, where a P. W. D. road begins to cross the railway line. There is evidence to show that the respondents have encroached on that road. The total area in dispute only amounts to a fraction of an acre in extent, and it would be very easy for a mistake to occur in a map dealing with a holding which terminates in the manner Aung Min's does. On the other hand, there is the evidence of aged and respectable elders which goes to show that the disputed sites have been occupied by various persons for years and were originally waste land. There is not the slightest evidence that Aung Min was paid any rent for the sites. In the circumstances, I have no doubt that the judgment appealed against was correct. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Where a person, who holds certain property partly in his personal and partly in a representative capacity as an administrator, becomes an insolvent, his personal share in the property vests in the Official Assignee and the latter, as trustee for the creditors of the insolvent, is en-

[P2001]

Cowasjee and A. B. Banerji—for Appellant.

Giles—for Respondent.

Order.—This is an application by the Official Assignee for the appointment of a receiver to collect the rents and profits and take charge of a certain property until further orders. The property in question is at present being held by the respondent partly in his personal and partly in a representative capacity as administrator de bonis non. In his personal capacity the respondent is an insolvent, and, therefore, his personal share vests in the Official Assignee, who sued the insolvent as heir and as administrator for the determination of his share and its delivery to him. The Official Assignee obtained a decree on the 23rd August 1917. The insolvent has appealed and by consent the taking of the accounts has been stayed pending the hearing of the appeal without prejudice to this application for a Receiver. The insolvent states that he is keeping accounts and this is not denied, nor is any mismanagement alleged. The suit was filed at the end of 1915 and no decree was passed for nearly two years. During the whole of this time the Official Assignee was content to leave the management of the property in the hands of the administrator and never applied for a receiver. The respondent has been in possession for nearly forty years, and so far as the papers before me show, has managed it without giving cause for complaint; and none of the persons or bodies for whom he is administering join in the application. The Official Assignee is joint tenant with the administrator to the extent of the insolvent's personal share. As such he is entitled to be protected from waste, but none is alleged. The sole ground for the application appears to be his insolvency.

Johnson, In re, Steele v. Cobham (1). shows how loth the Court is to allow an insolvent to manage another's estate. It was an administration action brought by a creditor against an administrator who subsequently became in his personal capacity insolvent. A receiver was appointed apparently as a matter of course, on the ground that the Court could have no confidence in the insolvent. There, however, the administrator became insolvent on the 18th January 1866, and the plaintiff in the administration suit took out a summons at once. Here the insolvent was adjudicated on the 7th August 1912, and no application was made till the 21st December 1917, and though the Official Assignee sued in 1915, to have the insolvent's share defined and partitioned and prayed for a receiver, no application was ever made in the suit till now. Hopkins, In re, Dowd v. Hawtin (1), is an authority to the same effect, but there also action was taken as soon as the administrator became insolvent. If similarly prompt action had been taken by the Official Assignee my course would have been plainer, but when the beneficiaries have been content with his administration for nearly forty years, are content with it still despite his insolvency, and when his creditors as represented by the Official Assignee have despite the same fact, been content with his management for nearly six years, the same matter is less easy. On the whole, however, I do not see I can allow him to continue managing a property, an undefined portion of which belongs to his creditors except with their consent. He manages for the Official Assignee who is a trustee for the creditors and is, therefore, a trustee for them himself and as lessor. Master of the Rolls, said in Hopkins, In re, Dowd v. Hawtin (2), it is not fit that a man who is a bankrupt should continue to be a trustee without the consent of the cestuique trust. These did consent up till now, but do not consent any longer and there is nothing more to be said. They are entitled to have their share protected; what their share is it is impossible to determine at present. Till it is determined, they have rights over the whole and there must, therefore, be a receiver of the whole despite the fact that the charities and other bodies for whom the respondent holds as administrator are content to leave their shares in his hands. The application must, therefore, be allowed with costs, two gold mohurs.

Civil P. C. (1908), Sr. 11 and 13—Res judicata—Foreign judgment is subject to same condition as one of Court in British India.

A foreign judgment is subject to the same conditions as to res judicata as a judgment of a Court of British India and, therefore, such a judgment in order to be res judicata in a subsequent suit must be the judgment of a Court which is competent to try the subsequent suit: 6 Bom. L. R. 98 Rel. on. — [P 31 C 2]

J. R. Das—for Appellant.

Lentaigue and Chari—for Respondent.

Judgment—The plaintiffs sued in the District Court of Pegu for partition of a money-lending business which their father, defendant 1, carried on in that district as being joint family property. The father claims it as his own business. Defendant 2 is a son of defendant 1 and defendant 3 is a grandson. The parties are, therefore, the sons and grandsons of defendant 1. The District Judge gave the plaintiffs a decree and the father now appeals. The parties have their domicile in Konapet in the Pudukottai State, and previous to this suit the plaintiffs had obtained a decree in the Chief Court of Pudukkottai declaring that these parties formed a joint Hindu family, a decree for partition of the properties in Pudukkottai and a declaration that this money-lending business in Pegu was also joint family property and that the plaintiffs were entitled to partition of this business; but the Pudukkottai Court held that it had no jurisdiction to make the partition of property in Pegu. The District Court held that the finding of the Pudukkottai Court that the family was a joint Hindu family and the finding that there was joint family property in Pudukkottai was res judicata, but that the finding that this business was a family business was not res judicata. The District Court found as a fact that this money-lending business was part of the joint family property. The father was precluded from giving evidence to show that the family was not a joint family.

Funds for this money-lending business were obtained from an "Oor" account, which means literally 'big house' and probably means "home" account, and funds from business were also remitted to that account. The funds of that account are family property. If the finding of that Court as to this is res judicata in the present case, there can be no doubt that this money-lending business also forms part of the joint family property. The question, therefore, is whether the finding of the foreign Court is res judicata in the present suit. S. 11 of the Code which deals with res judicata says that the first Court, the decision of which is sought to be res judicata in a subsequent suit, must be a Court competent to try such subsequent suit. The judgment of the Puddukottai Court is a foreign judgment. S. 13 of the Code, which deals with the conclusiveness of a foreign judgment, says:

"A foreign judgment shall be conclusive as to any matter thereby directly adjudicated upon between the same parties or between parties under whom they or any of them claim litigating under the same title."

except in certain specified circumstances. The case of Pruthisingji Devisingji v. Umedisingji Sangaji (1) shows that a foreign judgment is subject to the same conditions as to res judicata as a judgment of a Court of British India, and therefore, must be the judgment of a Court which is competent to try the subsequent suit. In the case of Moghal Fatima v. Amir Hasan Khan (2) this question was raised under the new Code. In that case the Judges of the High Court of Allahabad held that the decision of a Court, to be res judicata in a subsequent suit, must be the decision of a Court that was competent to try the subsequent suit, and that the question of the effect of a foreign judgment can only properly be raised in proceedings based upon the foreign judgment—i. e., that S. 13 applied only to such proceedings. Upon appeal to the Privy Council their Lordships did not see their way to reverse the decision and dismissed the appeal without giving reasons. The Puddukottai Court was not competent to try the present suit which related to property in Pegu. In my opinion, S. 13 of the new Code has not altered the law. The words, "a foreign judgment shall be conclusive," mean that a foreign judgment shall be taken to be a final and conclusive judgment, i. e., the findings shall not be called in question in any other proceedings as not having been properly made in the foreign suit. It is a final and conclusive judgment for all purposes, whether for bringing a suit upon the foreign judgment or for the purposes of res judicata but the word "conclusive" does not render a foreign judgment of greater effect than a final and conclusive judgment of a Court in British India. I would set aside the decrees and remand the case to be re-tried; the evidence already taken to be evidence in the case and award, ten gold mohurs, to the appellant in accordance with the result.

Judgment.—The first point to consider is whether the defendant's deed of sale, Ex. 1, gives valid title to the land he now claims. The document describes the land sold to the defendant as containing two plots of certain holdings. Dimensions are given but no boundaries; the map referred to in the document is not filed and none was presented for registration. Such a document cannot be registered under S. 21 (1) and (4), Registration Act, and although the document was as a fact registered I would hold, following the majority of the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Baij Nath Tewari v. Sheo Sahay Bhagut (1), that no registration of it has been effected within the provisions of that Act. The document therefore gives the defendant no title to the land he claims under it. That result follows by reason of the operation of S. 54, T. P. Act. Furthermore, even if it could be held that the defect is a mere error in procedure which is saved by S. 87, Registration Act, all that can be held is that the defendant got under it so much land out of the holdings concerned, but we shall be at a loss to find where the land begins and where it ends. Therefore no survey made with the document as the basis will serve any useful purpose. I am therefore of opinion that the evidence of Maung Po E, witness 1 for the defendant, who merely ascertained the area of the land fenced in by the defendant, is of no value. But the plaintiff cannot succeed on the weakness of the defendant's case but must depend upon the strength of his own. I think that the lower appellate Court was right in relying on the evidence of Maung Shwe Zin who is a competent surveyor. The witness measured out the ground in the presence of a Land Record Inspector and his evidence shows that he had some tangible basis to go on in preparing the map he produced showing the encroachment as alleged. As pertinently remarked by the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court, the accuracy of the map was a matter exceedingly easy to check. Moreover, there is nothing to contradict Maung Shwe Zin's evidence. As I said before, Po E's evidence is useless. In my judgment the plaintiff has succeeded in proving his case. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Scope of enquiry stated.

Order 21, Rr. 60 and 61, lay down the lines on which the investigation of claims preferred to properties under attachment should proceed. The Court should consider whether at the time of attachment the property was in the possession of the judgment-debtor as his own property, and not on account of any other person or in trust for him. If this entails a consideration of the bona fides of a sale in his favour set up by the objector or the legal effect of the deed of conveyance including the circumstances of its registration, such matters should be gone into.

*Mac Donnell—for Applicant.Ormiston—for Respondents.Hartnoll, Offg. C. J.—The respondents had many decrees against the Chetty firm of K. P., and in execution of such decrees attached certain immovable properties. The applicant firm applied for removal of the attachments, alleging that they had purchased the properties by registered deed of 23rd June 1912 and since then had been in possession. Respondents contested the application and alleged that the sale was a bogus one. The District Judge would not in his judgment consider whether the sale was a genuine one, nor did he come to any definite finding as to who was in possession at the time of the attachments. He said:

"It is quite possible that it may ultimately be found that at the time of the attachment some of the properties were in the possession of the K. P. firm and some were not."

He went on to say:

"It seems to me quite possible that the K. P. firm may have had some attachable interest in at any rate some of the properties, if not in all of them."

He refused to remove the attachments and considered that a regular suit should be brought. It seems to me that the District Judge has not dealt with the case according to law. O. 21, Rr. 60 and 61, lay down the lines on which his decision should have been based. He should have considered whether at the time of the attachments the K. P. firm was in possession of the properties or any of them as its own property and not on account of any other person, or whether the properties, or any of them when attached, were not in possession of the firm, or that being in possession of the K. P. firm, they were in its possession not on its own account or as its own property but on account of or in trust for the appellant firm. If this entailed a consideration of the bona fides of the sale, or the legal effect of the deed of conveyance including the circumstances of the registration of it, such matters should have been gone into. I would set aside the order of the District Court and remand the case back to it to deal with it according to law, namely, on the lines set out by me. I allow applicants the cost of this application—three gold mohurs. I set aside the order passed by the Court as to costs. Costs in that Court will abide the result of the further investigation now ordered.

Judgment.—The appellants sued to recover 700 baskets of paddy or its value, Rs. 875, due as rent from their tenants Maung Lu Gale and Ma Hsin Zi, and obtained a decree against them against which there was no appeal. They joined the present respondents as defendants, because they alleged that they had removed respectively 100, 500, 50 and 50 baskets of paddy from the tenants land knowing that appellants had a charge upon the whole crop until their rent of 700 baskets had been paid. The Court of first instance found on the evidence that the respondents had removed these quantities of paddy with notice that appellants claim a charge upon it, and granted decrees against them for these quantities of paddy or their values Rs. 125, Rs. 625, Rs. 62-8-0 and Rs. 62 8-0, respectively. These decrees were reversed upon appeal and the appellants now ask for their restoration. The respondents have contended that they had no notice of appellants' charge on the paddy, and further that as far as respondent 2 Po Lun is concerned, the proceeds of the paddy he took have been paid to appellants 1 and 3 in satisfaction of a decree of theirs against their tenants, defendants 1 and 2 in this suit. As regards the first point there is no room for doubt that appellant 3 took his lease to the land and warred the respondents against removing the crop as he had a charge thereon for rent.

As regards the second, it appears that appellants 1 and 3 got a decree against Lu Gale and Ma Hsin Zi in another suit, in which they had attached certain of their property before judgment, and respondent 2 Po Lun gave a security bond for the due payment of the decrees and costs in order to obtain release of the property from attachment, and he subsequently paid up the amount of the decrees and costs. This no doubt gives him a right to sue Mg. Lu Gale and Ma Hsin Zi for the money he paid, but it is no defence to the present action. We come now to the main points in the case. The District Judge held that inasmuch as plaintiffs admitted that after the respondents had removed the paddy some 100 to 500 baskets still remained on the land, there could be no claim against respondents for a greater quantity of paddy than the difference between the rent due, 700 baskets, and the quantity remaining, viz., 100 to 500 baskets. In my opinion this view is correct and the respondents cannot in the aggregate be held liable for more than 200 baskets of paddy, the difference between 700 and 500 baskets. Apportioned between them according to the gross amounts they took the quantities for which each is liable are the following: 1st respondent 29 baskets; 2nd respondent 113 baskets; 3rd respondent 14 baskets; 4th respondent 14 baskets.

The Divisional Judge however held that under the document sued upon plaintiffs could in no case recover more than Rs. 320, and as the paddy remaining after respondents had removed what they took was admittedly worth this sum or more, plaintiffs could recover nothing from the respondents. The document sued upon is a lease for nine months at a rental of 700 baskets of paddy for that period. So far as it is a lease it is exempt from stamp duty under exemption (a), Art. 35, Sch. 1, Stamp Act 1899, the tenants being cultivators. The document, however, gave the appellants the sole right over the whole crop until the rent was paid, and the tenants agreed not to alienate or otherwise do away with the crops without appellants' consent until the rent was paid. It was therefore, an instrument evidencing an agreement relating to the hypothecation of moveable property by way of security for the repayment of a future debt, and as such was liable to the duty chargeable on a bill of exchange under Art. 13 (b), Sch. 1, Stamp Act, 1839; see Entry No. 80 in Government of India Finance Department Notification No. 3616, Ex. C, dated 16th July 1909, (Burma Stamp Manual, Part 14, p. 9). Now the document actually bears an eight annas stamp and under the article referred to above this would have been sufficient to cover a sum of Rs. 600, and under S. 26, Stamp Act, no more than that sum is claimable under it. The value of the 200 baskets of paddy for which the respondents are liable is, however, only Rs. 250, and that amount is recoverable under the document. I, therefore, reverse the decree of the Divisional Court and instead grant appellants decrees as follows, with costs in all Courts, against San Dun for 29 baskets of paddy or Rs. 36-4-0; against Po Lun for 143 baskets of paddy or Rs. 178-12-0; against Young Zaung for 14 baskets of paddy or Rs. 17-8-0; and against Maung Ba U for 14 baskets of paddy or Rs. 17-8-0. The respondents will get 2 gold mohurs advocate's fee in this Court.

Second Appeal No. 20 of 1918, Decided on 28th June 1918, from decision of Dist. Judge, Henzada, in Appeal No. 140 of 1917.

* Buddhist Law (Burmese) — Divorce — No judicial separation — But order under S. 488, Criminal P. C. operates as such — Child born after maintenance order — Burden of proof of access is on wife — Presumption under S. 112 is inapplicable — Evidence Act (1 of 1872), S. 112—Criminal P.C. (5 of 1898), S. 488—Effect.

In Buddhist Law there is no such thing as a judicial separation, but an order under S. 488, Criminal P. C., until it is rescinded, is for all practical purposes the same thing as an order for judicial separation and if, while the order is in force, a child is born to the wife the onus is shifted on to her of proving access. The rule laid down in S. 112, Evidence Act, is inapplicable to such a case, inasmuch as the order under S. 488, Criminal P. C., practically puts an end to the continuance of a valid marriage. [P 35 C 1, 2]

Halkar—for Appellant.Sin Hla Aung—for Respondent.

Judgment.—Mg. Shwe Ban sued his wife Ma Mya for divorce on the ground of adultery. Both the lower Courts found adultery proved. Ma Mya was enclave at the time of the institution of the suit. The Judge of the trial Court held that as Ma Mya was living separately from her husband at the time the child was conceived, the onus lay upon her to prove that the child was legitimate. The District Judge did not deal directly with the question of onus of proof, but found it was not proved that Mg Shwe Ban had had access to his wife since their separation, and thought that the circumstances of the case were such as to remove the legal presumption of access during marriage. Both Courts have concurred in disbelieving almost all the evidence produced by the parties to show on the one side that adultery had taken place, and on the other that Shwe Ban had had access to his wife under circumstances that led to a strong presumption that they had resumed cohabitation. The history of the case previous to the present proceedings is briefly as follows. The parties were married in 1912, and in October a child was born. There were disagreements between them in 1913, but they were patched up and it was not until January 1914 that she finally left him. In May she applied for maintenance for herself and child and was successful. She alleged cruelty and neglect and the case was fought out with considerable ill feeling. Orders were passed by this Court in August 1914. Shwe Ban next prosecuted her for bigamy, and was again unsuccessful. In the meantime he had taken another wife. Mya left Henzada and lived at Ingabu, which I am informed is about 5 hours by launch from Henzada. Her case is that she came to Henzada each month to get the maintenance ordered and that on some of these visits, Shwe Ban had sexual intercourse with her. It is argued that whether the evidence about her meeting him on these occasions is believed or not, the presumption arising out of the continuance of the marriage must prevail, unless Shwe Ban can show that the parties had no access to each other at any time when the child could have been begotten. S. 112, Evidence Act, is as follows:

"The fact that any person was born during the continuance of a valid marriage between his mother and any man... shall be conclusive proof that he is the legitimate son of that man, unless it can be shown that the parties to the marriage had no access to each other at any time when he could have been begotten."

In English Law the presumption in favour of legitimacy prevails even if the parties are living apart, unless they have been divorced or a judicial separation has taken place. In Hetherington v. Hetherington (1) the facts were that the husband had been convicted of an aggravated assault on his wife who obtained an order from the Justices of the Chester Ward Division of the County of Durham that she should no longer be bound to cohabit with him, that he should pay her ten shillings a week and that she should have the custody of the children. Sir James Hannan, in delivering judgment on an appeal against the order on the Justices refusing to vary the order on the ground of the wife's subsequent adultery said:

"There is no doubt that from the time that such an order is made—which is equivalent to a judicial separation and the ancient divorce a mensa et thoro—the parties are authorized to live apart, and from that moment all the presumptions which exist in the case of married persons as to access and the legitimacy of children are reversed. If a child is born more than nine months after the separation, it is presumed to be illegitimate unless it be shown as a matter of evidence that the husband and wife have come together again."

An order passed under S. 488, Criminal P. C., entitled the wife to live apart from her husband, and in the present case there was never an attempt to set aside that order since 1914. The parties in this case are Buddhists and in Buddhist Law there is no such thing as a judicial separation, but an order under S. 488, Criminal P. C., until it is rescinded, is for all practical purposes the same thing as an order for judicial separation. Ma Mya could not be compelled to live with Shwe Ban unless he filed a suit for resumption of conjugal rights. In the circumstances, I think that there was really no continuance of a valid marriage, the parties were at arms' length and were living separately with the sanction of an order of the Court. The onus then shifts on Ma Mya to prove access and both Courts have held that she has failed to prove it. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—It is agreed in this case that the decrees of the lower Court must be set aside and that the case must be remanded to the District Court in view of the decision of the Full Bench in Civil Reference No. 1 of 1916. According to that decision it is clear that question of Buddhist Ecclesiastical Law which came before the Civil Court must be determined not merely by the canonical text of the Vinaya, i. e., the Pāṭiśaw, but that the Atthagatha and other commentaries must also be considered and the provisions of the Dhammathats should also be taken into account as throwing a valuable light on the established custom of the country. The Upper Burma ruling Nga Po Thin v. U Thi Hla (1), on which the judgments of the lower Courts are based, proceeded entirely on the canonical texts, and the decision of the learned Additional Judicial Commissioner as to a gift by a monk of a monastery and site requires reconsideration in the light of Civil Reference No. 1 of 1916. The decrees of the lower Courts are set aside and the suit is remanded to the District Court for disposal in accordance with the above remarks under O. 41, R. 23. Criminal Revn. No. 204 of 1917, Decided on 28th October 1917, against order of 1st Add. Magistrate, Rangoon, D/- 6th July 1917.

(a) Workman's Breach of Contract Act (13 of 1859), S. 1—Workman cannot be compelled to make thumb-impression in Court for identification of impression on agreement.

Cases under the Workman's Breach of Contract Act are judicial proceedings and the workman is in the position of an accused. He cannot therefore be compelled to make a thumb-impression in Court, for the purpose of identifying his thumb-impression on the agreement. [P 36 C 1]

(b) Workmen's Breach of Contract Act (13 of 1859), S. 1—Person undertaking to supply coolies and work with them is workman.

A person who undertakes to supply coolies and to work along with them is a "workman" whether the meaning of S. 1, Workmen's Breach of Contract Act, and the fact that he is under similar contracts with other people during the same period does not take him out of the definition of "workman."

Order.—The Magistrate erred in requiring the accused to make his thumb-impressions in Court when his advocate objected. Cases under the Workmen's Breach of Contract Act are judicial proceedings and the workman is in the position of an accused. The remarks of Parlett, J., in Maung Po Nyun v. Mutu Kurpen Chetty (1) apply mutatis mutandis to this case also. The finger expert's evidence must therefore be disregarded as inadmissible. But, apart from the finger print evidence, I think Ex. A was proved by the complainant's sworn statement taken together with the admissions of the accused that he did borrow money from the complainant and did sign such a document, though he contends that it was at an earlier date than the date of Ex. A. The document, Ex. A, bears date 5th May 1916. The accused says he borrowed Rs. 750 in 1914 and that the balance which remained due out of this sum was paid off for him in 1915 by Subramonian and his clerk. But the receipt, Ex. 1, does not show what money was paid off by Subramonian and the signature on it is denied by the complainant. The genuineness of the receipt has not been established beyond doubt. Subramonian and his clerk say the original documents signed by the accused and the other persons mentioned in Ex. 1 were not given up at the time, as the complainant professed to have lost them. The Magistrate was justified in rejecting this explanation, not only because it is prima facie improbable but also because Subramonian's cross-examination showed him to be anything but an impartial witness and the document Ex. 2 which he produced showed that the accused is heavily indebted to him. I cannot find that the Magistrate was wrong in deciding that the accused really took Rs. 700 as an advance in May 1916 and that he then executed Ex. A.

Nor can I accept the view that accused does not fall within the category of workman in the Act. The terms of the two contracts, Exs. A and 1, indicate that he was to work himself with the coolies that he undertook to supply. The fact that he was under two similar contracts during the same period is not sufficient to take him out of the category of workman. The application is dismissed.

Judgment.—Criminal Appeal No. 88 of 1917.—The defamatory matter complained of is contained in a leading article which appeared in its issue of 20th October 1916 in the Rangoon Vartaman, a Tamil bi-weekly newspaper published in Rangoon, of which the accused, C. S. Appa, is the Proprietor, Editor, Printer and Publisher. The article purports to be an essay on "Donations." It is in reference to the the war gifts made by Indians, Hindus, Mahomedans and other races. It states that the donors have many objects in view but that loyalty is generally the object. Then comes a short dissertation as to how gifts should be made. The writer splashes about with such a platitude as that relating to the right hand not knowing what the left does. Then the writer proceeds to say:

"1. Now as the gifts made by our people are all made in connexion with the war, let us consider if they are made with the full consciousness that they are made only with a consideration for charity and without hoping thereby for any personal profit thereafter. It will be seen that in these, three-fourths are with a desire for some self-advantage. 2. We have also heard that some having collected money from many people for the Government make the gifts in the shape of money or otherwise in their own names without publishing the names of those who paid the money to them. What is the reason of this? Is it not better to give what they can instead of their getting fame and name from the Government with other's property? Government does not ask us to give what we cannot bear. They ask their subjects to contribute according to their means of their own freewill and not otherwise. 3. This being so, some with the object of getting a name that they have made gifts for the war take their photographs and give them for exhibition in bioscopes. It will be clearly seen that this is also for getting a name and not out of any loyalty. These gifts are not made with a consideration for charity as mentioned above."

The numbering of the paragraphs in the above extract is by me. The question is whether it contains any defamatory matter. Regarding para. 1 the question may be put thus: If you say of A that he makes gifts to the War Funds not out of charity but for some self advantage, can your words be said to be defamatory? The answer will depend upon what we understand to be the opinion of the people regarding a person who does such a thing. I venture to think that the people would look upon him with contempt and would hold him up to ridicule. If that is a right conclusion, the words are defamatory. In my opinion, therefore, para. 1 contains defamatory words and if they can be taken as referring to the complainants, the accused would be liable to be punished. As to para. 2, we shall have to settle first what it means. Mr. Ginwalla contends that it means that some persons collect subscriptions and send the whole amount collected without giving the individual subscribers. If he is right, then there is no imputation which might be taken exception to. But Mr. Lentaigne argues that in the words:

"make the gifts in the shape of money or otherwise in their own names without publishing the names of those who paid the money to them," the words "make the gift" are important and serve as a guide as to what the whole passage means. Moreover, the words he says are preceded by the other words, "some having collected, etc.," so that the passage means that some, having collected moneys from others, make gifts of them in their own names without disclosing the fact that they have been collected from others and thus making it appear that they are the donors. I think counsel for the prosecution is right. I can see nothing equivocal in the meaning of the passage.

If this view is correct there is no dispute that the passage contains defamatory words for, there can be none more despicable than a person who collects money from other people and then makes a gift of it in his name in order to lead people to believe that the money given is his. Such person is guilty of a false pretence of a most contemptible character. Para. 3 also bears, in my opinion, a defamatory meaning. Mr. Ginwalla contends to the contrary. He says all that the passage can be taken to convey is that those who exhibit their photographs on the cinema screen are vain people, who thereby make a boast of their charitable acts, whereas gifts should be made in such a way that the left does not know what the right hand does. If the passage conveys only this, there may be nothing to complain of. But in my judgment it means more. It means that these vain people (if that is the innuendo intended) make the gifts in order to gain name and fame but "not out of any loyalty." The emphasis is on "not out of any loyalty." I think the exhibitors are thus held up to ridicule. I do not say that the readers will take it that the loyalty of these people is doubted, but I do say this that the meaning is that, whereas at the present time it is considered right and proper to make contributions to the War Funds and thereby express loyalty to the Government, these men (the exhibitors) are attempting to get name and fame under the cloak of loyalty. The exhibitors are thus brought into contempt and rendered ridiculous. I think it right to say in passing that the writer of the article will not be justified in saying that they are vain people, unless they were responsible for the exhibition. The next question to consider is, what do all these passages taken together mean? It is contended by Mr. Ginwalla that those who make gifts in connexion with the war for self-advantage referred to in para. 1 are not the same as those who exhibit their pictures on the cinema screen and who are referred to in para. 3 as those who make gifts towards the war not out of loyalty but in order to get name and fame.

Nor is the second passage, which deals with those who collect money from others and send it in as their own, in any way connected with the 3rd passage. On the other hand, Mr. Lentaigne contends that the whole of the paragraph means that the exhibitors had made gifts towards the war for self-advantage, such as name and fame and not out of loyalty and that they for that end had given other people's money as if it were their own. What Mr. Ginwalla means by this contention is that there are some who make gifts for self-advantage, others who give other people's money as their own and again others who are vain enough to boast of their gifts by showing their pictures on the cinema screen, the motive of these being not loyalty but the getting of name and fame. The controversy centres round the words: "This being so" at the beginning of para. 3. Mr. Ginwalla says that they refer to the immediately preceding sentences in para. 2 and not to the other preceding sentences, while, on the other hand, Mr. Lentaigne contends that the words refer to the two preceding sentences in para. 2. I think there again counsel for the prosecution is right. Before we come to the words, "this being so," we find the writer has been directing his attention against those who strut in borrowed feathers and after saying that there are such people in para. 2 gives his own opinion of how gifts should be made by asking a question (which is the first of the two sentences referred to by Mr. Lentaigne):

"Is it not better to give what they can instead of their getting fame and name from the Government with other people's property?"

He then gives his reason for the idea involved in the question, by saying that the Government does not ask people to give what they cannot. After that he goes on, "this being so, etc." If the paragraph beginning with the words, "this being so," is read as referring only to the preceding sentence, the reader will be at a loss to find any logical connection between the sentence and the paragraph. But if the reader takes the words as referring to the two preceding sentences, the logical connection between them and the paragraph becomes absolutely clear. The meaning of the writer in that case is this:

"It is not right for people to give other's property as if it was their own for the Government does not want the people to give more than they can, yet there are some people who will do this sort of thing in order to get name and fame. This being so, that is, what I have said as to the existence of such people being correct, I find some of them exhibiting their pictures on the cinema screen."

I have thus shown the connection between the paragraphs in the above extract. I think an additional reason is afforded by the words near the end of the article, which are contained in the statement that if these gifts were made out of charity, they would be made without vain and pomp and without getting fame and name out of others' charities. This statement shows the cloven foot. It makes it clear and beyond all doubt that the writer directs his attention against the men who exhibited their pictures on the screen posing themselves as men who had made war gifts, while the truth was their gifts were of other people's money. The next question is, who are the individuals referred to? The prosecution says that M. P. Maricar and Syed Ibrahim were the persons referred to. In deciding this question all the circumstances of the case, the occasion of the writing, the relationship between the parties, the people for whom the article was written and the like must be taken into consideration. As stated before, the article appeared in the issue of the Rangoon Varthaman dated 20th October 1916. In July it was announced that His Excellency the Viceroy of India would visit Burma in the following December and a committee was formed at Rangoon to collect money to provide funds for welcoming His Excellency; M. P. Maricar and Syed Ibrahim who are Chulias were authorized to collect money from their community and they did so. M. P. Maricar had by 20th October collected Rupees 1,071 including Rs. 501, his own contribution, and he had sent to the bank that sum to the credit of the Viceroy's Reception Fund with a list of the subscribers attached and had written to say:

"some of my subscribers who have promised have not as yet paid. I shall send the balance collection as soon as I get from them with another list for same."

The list he sent to the Bank was not published in any of the local newspapers. On 21st September 1916, M. P. Maricar and D. K. Syed Ibrahim formally handed over to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor a motor ambulance with. Major Kirkwood through whom these gifts were made, suggested to the donors that they should have their photographs taken and put in as an inset to the photographs of the ambulances and that the whole should be made into a lanternslide for the purpose of exhibiting the pictures at a coming cinema show in aid of the Red Cross. Major Kirkwood says that he made the suggestion because he thought it might encourage other philanthropists to do likewise. The photographs were screened at a Red Cross performance at the Empire on 4th October and also at the Elphinstone on 18th October, where there was a performance in aid of the Burma War Fund. On 4th October 1916, Syed Ibrahim sent Rs. 1,151 to the Bank to the credit of the Viceroy's Reception Fund together with a list of the subscribers. Syed Ibrahim says that there was a balance of the subscriptions to the Viceroy's Reception Fund, but at the request of the subscribers he kept it with him for the purpose of contributing it to one of the War Funds and that on the night of 18th October in front of the Elphinstone he spoke to Major Kirkwood about it. He is corroborated in this by the Major and on 20th, the day the article complained of appeared, he sent Rs. 2,599 to the Major for the purpose of the Red Cross. The evidence establishes beyond all doubt that the only pictures of donors to the War Funds exhibited at any of the cinemas in Rangoon up to the 20th October were those of Maricar and Syed Ibrahim.

Now the article refers at the beginning to the gifts made "by Indians, Hindus, Mahomedans and other races," and after a little homily about the right hand and the left hand in the matter of charity descends from the general to the particular in the passage beginning with the words: "Now as the gifts came by our people." The learned Magistrate held that "our people" meant the Tamil Chulia community. I do not think it is right to go so far as that. But I think that, as the paper is in Tamil language and is meant to be read by the Tamil-speaking communities, the words may fairly be said to refer to the Tamil speaking races and we may take the gifts dealt with as those made by the members of the Tamil speaking communities. I have held that the passage which are complained of as containing defamatory matters are all connected and are directed against those contributors who had their photographs screened at the cinema. Maricar and Syed Ibrahim are members of a Tamil speaking community, and as it is certain that no contributors' pictures other than those of Maricar and Syed Ibrahim had been screened at any of the cinemas at Rangoon, the vain and pompous persons referred to in the article are Maricar and Syed Ibrahim. The accused's defence is that the article is true and was written in good faith for the public good without any malice whatsoever; it was not directly or indirectly aimed at either Maricar or Syed Ibrahim in any wise or at all. It was only a warning conveyed to the public and to those who collect moneys and do not account for the same.

Now at first sight this defence clearly shows a confusion of ideas but on a careful consideration it appears to be as explained by Mr. Ginwalla before me. Mr. Ginwalla explains his defence as being based upon the following matters: (1). The subscription lists for the Viceroy's Reception Fund were to be returned on the 15th August. (2). Up to the date of the article no list of subscribers had been published in any newspaper, though it was the usual practice in Rangoon to publish lists of subscribers with the amounts they subscribed. (3). The accused did not believe that the collectors he had in his mind when he wrote the article, could have misappropriated the sums they had collected; and upon these matters, he came to certain opinions and he expressed them bona fide believing them to be correct. The accused inferred from these facts that the moneys which must have been collected by the time the article was written had been given without publishing the names of the subscribers in any newspaper. He stated what he honestly thought must have happened. Whether his opinion is correct or not is immaterial. The defence is in fact a fair comment upon matters of public interest. The limits of fair comment on matters of public interest may be gathered from the observations of two of the learned Judges who took part in the decision of the case of Merivale v. Carson (1). Lord Esher, M. R., observed:

"Every latitude must be given to opinion and to prejudice, and then an ordinary set of men with ordinary judgment must say whether any fair man would have made such a comment . . . mere exaggeration or even gross exaggeration would not make the comment unfair. However wrong the opinion expressed may be in point of truth, or however prejudiced the writer, it may still be within the prescribed limit. The question with the Jury must consider is this: would any fair man, however prejudiced he may be however exaggerated or obstinate his views, have said that which this criticism has said?"

Bowen L. J., observed as follows:

"It must be assumed that a man is entitled to entertain any opinion he pleases, however wrong, exaggerated, or violent it may be, and it must be left to the jury to say whether the mode of expression exceeds the reasonable limits of fair criticism. . . . The writer would be travelling out of the region of fair criticism . . . if he imputes to the author that he has written something which in fact he has not written."

We may quote other Judges also. It is not because a public writer

"fancies that the conduct of a public man is open to the suspicion of dishonesty, he is, therefore, justified in assailing his character as dishonest: Per Cockburn, C. J., in Campbell v. Spottiswoode (2)."

"A comment cannot be fair which is built upon facts which are not truly stated." Per Kennedy, J., in Joynt v. Cycle Trade Publishing Co. (3).

"A personal attack may form part of a fair comment upon given facts truly stated, if it be warranted by those facts, in other words, in my view, if it be a reasonable inference from those facts: Per Lord Atkinson in Dakhye v. Labouchere (4), quoted with approval by Cozens-Hardy, M. R., and Fletcher Moulton, L. J., in Hunt v. Star Newspaper Co. Ltd. (5)."

"It (a fair comment) does not mean that a man may invent facts, and comment on the facts so invented in what would be a fair and bona fide manner on the supposition that the facts were true If the facts as a comment upon which the publication is sought to be excused do not exist, the foundation of the plea fails: Per Cur. in Lefroy v. Burnside (6), quoted in Fraser's Torts, 7th Edn. p. 128".

I think I have shown sufficiently that a fair comment must be based upon facts and that the writer cannot invent facts and express his opinions upon such invented facts. Nor can the conduct of a public man or of a person in his public character be assailed as dishonest, simply because the writer fancies such conduct is open to suspicion.

What have we in this case?

The accused says that the subscription lists had not been published at the time of the article although they should have been before 15th August, but he believed that the collectors could not have misappropriated the moneys which he thought must have been collected by the date of the article. So he thought that the moneys collected must have been sent in but from the fact that he had not seen any lists published in the newspapers, he came to the conclusion that the collectors must have sent in the moneys in their own names without letting the public know who the subscribers were. On the slender foundation that the subscription lists had not been published up to 15th August when it was notified the moneys must be sent in, he built up all his fancies and it is plain to me that none of these fancies are warranted by the facts he went on. I do not think that any reasonable man would have said what the accused said in the article, simply because he finds that the subscription lists which were due on 15th August had not been published by that date. Moreover, we find it proved that Maricar and Syed Ibrahim had sent in subscription lists for part of their collections long before the date of the article. It is, therefore, highly probable that the accused went on rumours circulated by irresponsible persons without ascertaining whether they were true. If he had made any attempt to verify the rumours by going to the Treasurer of the Viceroy's Reception Fund, he would have received information showing that the rumours were not wholly, if at all, true. I am unable to find any evidence on the record to show that he had from any one at all any information about the doings of Maricar and Syed Ibrahim, upon which he acted. In my opinion he had, from a slender foundation drawn an inference from which his wild fancies led him to other inferences, wholly unjustifiable, of sordid motives attributed to the two generous donors. For these reasons I think the defence put forward by Mr. Ginwalla fails.

Mr. Ginwalla affirms that his client's defence was not justification and that the learned Magistrate has grievously erred in thinking that to be the defence. There is abundant authority for saying that an accused justifying his libel cannot both deny as well as justify it: he could not be heard to say: "I am charged with calling B a knave; I say I never said it, but if I did I was right." Notwithstanding this and notwithstanding the fact that the accused's case as made out by him in his examination by the Magistrate and his written statement that he did not directly aim at either Maricar or Syed Ibrahim in any wise or at all, the cross-examination was directed to show that they were guilty of dishonest motives which justify the accused's condemnation of them. The accused may say that he is not responsible for the way in which the defence was conducted on his behalf and that all that he could do was to instruct his advocate as to the facts of his case and leave it to the advocate to do what he thought necessary with a view to secure an acquittal for his client. That may or may not be so, but he is certainly responsible for the facts he supplied and the calling of witnesses. He called witnesses to show that the charges were true, if applicable to Maricar and Syed Ibrahim. There were at least two witnesses by whom an attempt was made to show that Maricar received certain amounts but that he had not accounted for them. If the article was not intended to aim at Maricar, what was the object of bringing forward such witnesses? Again where was the necessity for, or the relevancy of, the cross-examination to show that the complainants were not men deserving of public esteem? Facts upon which such a cross examination was based must have been supplied by the accused. Again, what was the reason for calling for the records of the case in which Maricar figured in other Courts? Was it to annoy and harass him or was it to shame him before the cansile who thronged the precincts of the Magistrate's Court, whenever the case came up for hearing, as remarked by the Magistrate? I will say nothing about the form of the apology, for it is only fair to say in regard to it that it must be held to be the work of his legal advisers.

I think the accused's conduct in regard to his defence aggravates his original offence. As regards Syed Ebrahim the fact that the sum of Rs. 2,999 was sent after the article appeared was made much of and when a witness gave evidence about the subscription list Ebrahim sent in on the 4th October, a question was asked as to whether the list bore any date as much as to say that if it bore no date, there was no guarantee that it was sent in before 20th October, the date of the article. This question was put in spite of the fact that the receipt was granted for the amount of the list before the date, 3th October. I am satisfied that Syed Ebrahim did not send the balance, namely, Rs. 2,999 to Major Kirkwood for the benefit of the Red Cross, because the charge made in the article being true, he wished to get out of it. He had intended, as requested by some of the subscribers, to send it to some War Fund and on 18th October, two days before the article, he had consulted Major Kirkwood as to the best way of disposing of it. I shall now deal with the article which appeared in the same paper on 23rd September, about a month before the article herein complained of. On that article the writer praised the complainants to the skies for making the gifts of motor ambulances. The learned Magistrate rightly describes the expressions used as being amusingly fulsome. Now any reasonable person would naturally ask the question, what is the reason of the Editor for changing his views about the complainants and attacking them what had happened between the Editor and his victims during the interval? The learned Magistrate thinks that the accused is open to the gravest suspicions as to his motives. What does Maricar say? He says that the accused had, during the said interval, been trying to get money from him but did not succeed, hence the attack. To meet this accused says:

"Ob, he is saying all this to give colour to his case against me. I was not at Rangoon on one of the dates he says I saw him".

The accused produced a witness to show that he was away. I think the witness need not be taken serious notice of. There is on the record a letter (Ex. 1) written by accused to Maricar. It reads like that of a man who by means of it makes an appointment with the addressee in order to knock something out of him. There appears to me a studied attempt about it to hide the real object of the writer. Until some satisfactory explanation is forthcoming as to the change of attitude on the part of the accused towards the complainants, and there is none, I must hold under the circumstances that the accused was actuated by unworthy motives in writing the article complained of. An Editor found guilty of such unworthy motives ought not to be treated with leniency, especially when he shows on his being brought to account a savage and cruel desire to bring more shame on the heads of his victims. For these reasons I decline to interfere with the conviction. The sentence passed by the learned Magistrate was six months simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 500. Considering that in respect of the same article the accused was also awarded in the case brought by Syed Ebrahim a similar punishment of which the imprisonment must take effect after the expiration of the term of imprisonment in this case, I am of opinion that the sentence of imprisonment is excessive. I shall, therefore, reduce the sentence of imprisonment to three months simple imprisonment and let the fine stand with all the directions made by the Magistrate in regard thereto. The appeal is dismissed with the variation in the sentence of imprisonment as stated above. I should not have passed a sentence of imprisonment, if it was not for the sordid motives with which the article was written.

In Criminal Appeal No. 89 of 1917.

This appeal was heard along with Criminal Appeal No. 88 of 1917. For the reasons stated in my judgment in the latter appeal I find that the article complained of was defamatory of Syed Ebrahim and that the accused was rightly convicted of defamation. I reduce the sentence to three months' simple imprisonment and let the fine stand with all the directions of the Magistrate thereto.

Judgment.—The plaintiff is the Receiver of the Estate of Ashan Ali who died in December 1908. Ashan Ali was the promoter and Chairman of the Bengal Steam Navigation Company. The defendants were three of the Directors of the Company. On 1st July 1908 Ashan Ali and the 3 defendants executed Ex. N, a pro-note for Rs. 75,000 in favour of a Chetty. The Chetty obtained a decree for the balance due on that pro-note, which was Rs. 50,000 (Rs. 40,000 principal and Rs. 10,000 interest), against Ashan Ali and other 3 defendants. He realised from the estate of Ashan Ali Rs. 32,000-10-3 and the plaintiff now sues the 3 defendants for $\frac{2}{3}$ ths of that sum by way of contribution. His case is that the pro-note was executed on behalf of the Company which has no assets. The defendants' case is that they executed Ex. N as sureties for Ashan Ali. The plaintiff obtained a decree on the Original Side of this Court, and the defendants now appeal.

Ashan Ali was a banker and financed the Company under an agreement with Company, which was very beneficial to himself. On 3rd April 1906 he borrowed from the Chetty under a pro-note Ex. 1 Rs. 10,000 and on 12th April 1906 he borrowed from the Chetty upon a pro-note Ex. 2 Rs. 70,000; and that Rs. 80,000 was used for the purposes of the Company. On 1st January 1907 Ashan Ali by his pro-note Ex. 3 in favour of the Chetty renewed the two pro-notes Ex. 1 and 2. In the Company's books there are entries of 7th January 1907 which would show that the Company received on that date Rs. 80,000 from the Chetty and that the Company had paid Rs. 80,000 to Ashan Ali. On 4th March 1907 a Director wrote to Ashan Ali on behalf of the Company asking him to pay this Rs. 80,000 debt owing by the Company to the Chetty as he had sufficient funds of the Company in his hands to do so, and on 18th May 1907 the request was repeated. On 21st April 1908 the Company paid off Rs. 5,000 of this debt to the Chetty. On 1st July 1908 Ex. N was executed because the Chetty required payment from Ashan Ali; and in the Company's books entries in an account with the Chetty on that date would show that the amount borrowed on the pro-note in 1st January 1907 was paid in full and that Rs. 75,000 was borrowed by the Company on a pro-note from the Chetty. After the death of Ashan Ali between 23rd March 1909 and 7th July 1909 the Company paid to the Chetty Rs. 35,000 on account of principal owing under Ex. N.

It is clear that before Ex. N, Ashan Ali was alone personally liable to the Chetty for the money borrowed by him. The Chetty was never a creditor of the Company and he never agreed to accept the Company as his debtor. The entries in the Company's books are to that extent misleading. The defendants, no doubt, know of the entries in the Company's books of 7th January 1907, but there is nothing to show that they did not realize the actual position, viz, that the Company was not in fact liable to the Chetty but that the Company had agreed with Ashan Ali to pay, on his behalf to the Chetty direct, the amount owing on his pro-note. It would be doubtful, after the Company's letters of 4th March and 18th May 1907, whether Ashan Ali, if he had paid the Chetty, could have claimed to be repaid by the Company. But assuming that he could have done so, the fact that the Company had promised Ashan Ali to pay this debt of his to the Chetty, and the fact that the defendants with Ashan Ali jointly executed Ex. N in favour of the Chetty, would not show, in the absence of an express agreement to that effect, that the defendants undertook to share with Ashan Ali his ultimate loss in the event of his paying his debt to the Chetty and not being able to recover it from the Company. When the defendants executed Ex. N they promised the Chetty to pay Ashan Ali's debt. The Company's debt to Ashan Ali was a separate and distinct matter, and there is nothing to show that the defendants, by agreement with Ashan Ali signed Ex. N as if it were the renewal of a debt due by the Company to the Chetty when Ex. N was executed. Ashan Ali was a wealthy man whereas the Company was in a moribund condition.

The defendants, although they were some of the Directors of the Company, had a personal liability for the debt for the renewal of which the pro-note was executed. There was little risk in standing surety for Ashan Ali, but an almost certain loss if they undertook personal liability on behalf of the Company. The renewal of the old debt was at the instance of the Chetty to whom Ashan Ali was alone liable. Prima facie the defendants would merely be sureties to the Chetty for Ashan Ali's debt; and the entries in the Company's books are not sufficient to show that the defendants executed this pro-note on behalf of the Company. The entries in the Company's books of 1st July 1908 do not carry the case any further for the plaintiff. It is clear that the Company's method of book-keeping was that when a pro-note was renewed it was entered as if the old debt was paid off and a fresh sum borrowed. The effect of those entries would merely be this: that the Company, having undertaken to pay the debt on behalf of Ashan Ali to the Chetty direct under the old pro-note, undertook to do the same under the renewed pro-note. And the payment of Rs. 35,000 by the Company to the Chetty in 1909 would be in pursuance of that agreement. We allow the appeal and dismiss the plaintiff's claim with costs in both Courts.

TWOHEY, C. J. AND MAUNG KIN, J.

Bank of Bengal, Akyab—Plaintiff—Appellant.

v.

Aung Tha Hla and others—Defendants—Respondents.

First Appeal No. 111 of 1917, Decided on 6th May 1918, against decree of Dist. Judge, Akyab, in C. S. No. 276 of 1916.

Transfer of Property Act (4 of 1882), Ss. 78 and 79—Failure of 1st mortgagee to retain title deeds does not give priority to subsequent mortgagee—Registration is notice.

A subsequent mortgagee who has wilfully abstained from the obvious course of searching in the registration office cannot obtain priority over an earlier registered mortgage merely on the ground that the latter did not call for the title-deeds and retain them in his control.

Judgment.—In July 1910 the defendant respondent Mg Tha Baw deposited the title-deeds of certain agricultural lands with the Bank of Bengal, Akyab, as security for advances made to him by the Bank from time to time. His indebtedness to the Bank fluctuated from month to month. On 29th April 1914, he cleared his account with the Bank by two payments of Rs. 5,000 each but he allowed his title-deeds to remain in the possession of the Bank and on 23rd May 1914, he took a fresh advance of Rs. 10,000. From that time onward his indebtedness to the Bank continued up to the date of the suit, the amount fluctuating between Rs. 10,000 and Rs. 62,500. The Bank admittedly during the whole period of their dealings with Mg. Tha Baw up to May 1916 made no enquiries as to the freedom of the property from encumbrances either at the Akyab Registration Office or at the Sub-Registration Office of the sub-district in which the lands were situated. It therefore entirely escaped the notice of the Bank that on 21st May 1914, i. e., during the period when he was temporarily free from debt to the Bank, Mg. Tha Baw executed jointly with his wife a mortgage of certain of his lands to Rai Gyaw Thu and Co., a firm of money-lenders at Akyab, and that this mortgage was duly registered at the Sub-Registration Office at Myohoung where Tha Baw lives. This registered mortgage included some of the lands of which the title-deeds were with the Bank. The principal money secured by this registered mortgage was Rs. 30,000 but of this amount only Rs. 4,000 or Rs. 5,000 consisted of new money, the remainder representing sums due on a previous mortgage of 1911 to Rai Gyaw Thu & Co and on certain promissory notes. When taking this mortgage the company did not call for the title deeds of the lands but were satisfied with the production of some tax receipts and with the mortgagor's assurance that the property mortgaged by him was free from encumbrances, as in truth it was.

The Bank sued Tha Baw in this suit, 276 of 1916, for Rs. 20,557 due on two promissory notes, and in the four connected suits Nos. 277, 278, 279 and 281 they sued him for various sums due on other promissory notes; and in each of these five cases the bank prayed for a mortgage decree against the property of which they hold the title deeds. Rai Gyaw Thu & Co. as subsequent mortgagees were joined as co-defendants in all these suits. Mortgage decrees have been granted in favour of the bank but the District Court has ordered in each case that as regards the property mortgaged to the bank on 21st May 1914 the mortgage of the bank shall rank after the registered mortgage. The bank appeals on the question of priority. The District Court after referring to the authorities has held on the one hand that the registration of the company's mortgage was not tantamount to notice to the Bank of the Company's mortgage, but the Court decided on the other hand that the company had failed to do all that a reasonable and prudent man would have done in omitting to call for the title-deeds. But the Court also decided that the bank had been wanting in prudence in abstaining from enquiry as to encumbrances before starting the fresh series of advances to Tha Baw, i. e., on 23rd May 1914. And the learned Judge's conclusion is that:

"As neither of the two creditors can be said to have done all that a reasonable and prudent man would have done to secure his position things must lie as they fall and as regards the items of lands in dispute between the bank and the company the company has priority."

The learned counsel for the appellant supports the District Court's decision that registration is not tantamount to notice, but argues that the latter part of the judgment is in the nature of non sequitur for it imputes blame to the bank for omitting to do what the earlier part of the judgment shows to be unnecessary. We are asked to hold also that Rai Gyaw Thu and Co. were guilty of gross neglect within the meaning of S. 78, T. P. Act, in not demanding and looking after the title deeds, as their omission to do so left the mortgagor in a position to hold himself out as unencumbered owner of the property. Mr. Cowasjee for the respondent Company contends that S. 78, T. P. Act, does not apply and that the Court should be guided only by the provisions of Ss. 79 and 80. S. 80 prevents the bank from acquiring priority in respect of advances except in the case provided for in S. 79, and that the section is clearly inapplicable because no maximum was expressed to be secured by Tha Baw's mortgage by deposit of the title deeds with the bank. But S. 80 does not override S. 78. S. 80 merely prevents the bank from getting priority by tacking its subsequent advances to any prior advance. It does not prevent the bank from getting priority for its subsequent advances by showing that it was induced to make such subsequent advances through the fraud, misrepresentation or gross neglect of the prior registered mortgagee. No question of fraud or misrepresentation has been raised in this case. The question to be decided is whether in the circumstances described above the Court should impute gross neglect to Rai Gyaw Thu & Co. and whether such neglect on their part was a proximate cause of the bank's action in advancing money to Tha Baw from 23rd May 1914, onwards.

In England in former times a mortgagee who left the title deeds with the mortgagor was liable to forfeit his priority even if there was no imputation of negligence. But this is not the present state of the law. In Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co. v. Whipp (1), a much less rigorous rule is laid down. According to that case the Court will not postpone the prior legal estate to the subsequent equitable estate on the ground of any mere carelessness or want of prudence on the part of the legal owner. Fry, L. J., remarked that the omission to use ordinary care in enquiring after or keeping title deeds may be, and in some cases has been, held to be sufficient evidence that the owner of the legal estate has assisted in or connived at the fraud which has led to the creation of a subsequent equitable estate without notice of the prior legal estate. But it appears that the English Law now imposes no duty to be careful as between an earlier and a later mortgagee and that the priority of the former can be displaced only where he has assisted in or connived at the fraud committed on the latter. It is obvious that in a country where compulsory registration of assurances is universal, the possession of title deeds is of less importance as a badge of title than in England where registration is enforced only in certain limited areas. It would be unreasonable, therefore, to construe S. 78, T. P. Act, as involving a more stringent rule than that now enforced in England. Moreover, what may in England amount to gross neglect sufficient to render the first mortgagee responsible for the fraud committed on the second mortgagee, should not necessarily be regarded in the same light where the first mortgage is registered under a system of compulsory public registration. Mortgages are frequently effected in this country without production of title deeds, the mortgagees depending on the words of their mortgagors as to freedom from previous encumbrances and trusting to registration of their mortgages to protect them as regards future encumbrances.

The bank in this case acted as if there was no Registration Act in force in this country and as if the mere possession of the title deeds conferred an impregnable title on the bank. The bank continued to advance large sums of money month after month to Tha Baw without ever attempting to ascertain whether any encumbrance on the property was registered. On the question whether registration of a mortgage is notice thereof to the whole world the Indian High Courts are not unanimous. The Bombay High Court has held that registration is notice: see Balmakundas v. Moti (2). The Allahabad High Court in Churaman v. Balli (3) held that where a deed of sale had been registered, a subsequent mortgagee who failed to search the register was guilty of gross negligence in not so doing and could not be treated as a bona fide mortgagee without notice. The Madras High Court until recently held that registration was not notice: vide Damodara v. Soma- sunāra (1), Shan Maun Mull v. Madras Building Co. (5) and Madras Building Co. v. Rowlandson (6), but the later judgment in Rangasami v. Annamalai (7) shows a marked change of opinion on the subject. It was held in that case that the failure of a prior mortgagee to obtain the title deeds from his mortgagor did not in the circumstances of the case amount to gross negligence within the meaning of S. 78, T. P. Act, and that in considering what amounts to gross negligence on the part of the prior mortgagee one of the circumstances to be taken into account in this country is that a universal system of registration is established by law. The decision of Jenkins, J., in the Calcutta case of Manindra Chandra Nandy v. Troyluckho Nath Burat (8) contains an expression of opinion showing that the learned Judge was in favour of the Bombay practice, by which registration is regarded as notice. He said:

"The existence of gross negligence must be determined according to the circumstances of each case, and one of the circumstances to be taken into consideration here is the fact that in this country a universal system of registration exists. Registration is prescribed by Statute, and he, who registers his deed promptly, reaps the reward of life, ease, and diligence in the security and priority he thereby gains."

He also cited the remarks of Lord Cairns in Agra Bank Ltd v. Barry (9) beginning with the words:

"This has never been decided with regard to a Registration Act such as that prevailing in Ireland that negligence in not asking for the title deeds or not taking up the title deeds shall postpone... security?"

Jenkins, J., said that though the circumstances of that case differed from those with which he had to deal, the Lord Chancellor was enunciating a general principle which furnished a useful guide on the point which called for his decision. It was a case in which, as in the present case, the subsequent mortgagee had neglected to search for prior encumbrances in the Registration Office. This case has not been followed by the Calcutta High Court in the later case of Nanda Lal Roy v. Abdul Aziz (10), in which that Court reaffirmed the rule which had hitherto been followed in the Calcutta High Court that registration is not per se notice. It is clear, however, that there is now a preponderance of authority in the Indian High Courts in favour of the view that a subsequent mortgagee who has wilfully abstained from the obvious course of searching in the Registration Office cannot obtain priority to an earlier registered mortgagee merely on the ground that the latter did not call for the title deeds and retain them in his control. The appeal is, therefore, dismissed with costs. The decision in Civil First Appeal No. 111 of 1917 governs also Civil First Appeals Nos. 112, 113, 114 and 115. These four appeals are, therefore, also dismissed with costs.

Civil Regular No 190 of 1916, Decided on 23rd March 1917.

* Contract—C. I. F.—Contract of sale of good with German Firm before war—Delivery of bill of lading and insurance note after outbreak of war—Trading prohibited—Ship seized—Contract is rendered void and dissolve—Documents are not valid and effective and buyer is not bound to pay—Contract Act (9 of 1872). S. 65.

Sometime before the outbreak of war A entered into a contract with B, at Rangoon. Under the contract A was (i) to buy certain goods in Germany; (ii) to obtain a contract of affreightment to Rangoon; (iii) to take out a policy of insurance; and (iv) to ship the goods in July 1914. B, on his part agreed to buy these goods from A for a price which was fixed c. i. f. Rangoon. A performed his part of the contract and on 12th August 1914 caused to be presented to B for acceptance a bill of exchange covering the price, etc., of the goods and payable 90 days after sight. Along with the bill of exchange were tendered the bill of lading, invoice and insurance note. B refused to accept the bill of exchange as well as the documents of title, (inasmuch as the war having broken out on 4th August the ship containing the goods was seized by the Belgian Government and trade with Germany was prohibited by the Royal Proclamation, dated 5th August 1914:

Held: that the Royal Proclamation rendered the contract abortive and illegal and so void; (2) that the effect of the outbreak of the war was that the contract of affreightment was dissolved; (3) that A was bound to tender and B was entitled to get valid and effective documents by which B could recover what might be lawfully recovered under such documents, but as A did not and could not tender such documents in respect of the contract of affreightment B was entitled to refuse to pay against them.

Clifton—for Plaintiff.

Mhta—for Defendant.

Judgment.—Plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract whereby plaintiff bought 18 tons of German tool or faggot steel. The price was fixed per ton c. i. f. Rangoon, shipment to be in July 1914. Plaintiff obtained a contract of affreightment by the SS. "Schildturn," whereby the goods were to be shipped and carried from Bremen to Rangoon and the goods were so shipped. Plaintiff also arranged a contract of insurance. In accordance with the contract plaintiff drew a bill of exchange on defendant payable 90 days after sight with interest added. On 12th August 1914 plaintiff caused the bill of exchange to be duly presented to the defendant for acceptance through the Mercantile Bank of India, Limited, and with it were tendered the bill of lading invoice and insurance note. Defendant refused to accept the bill of exchange and plaintiff now sues him for the price of the goods, etc. War having broken out on 4th August 1914, the SS. "Schildturn" was seized by the Belgian Government at Antwerp. Defendant pleads the Royal Proclamation on 5th August 1914 and urges that as the bill of lading was a German bill to plaintiff's order the contract has become void. It is not denied that the bill of lading is a German bill of lading. The contract of affreightment was with a German firm. Plaintiff urges that he has done all that he had to do under the contract, that the outbreak of war would only affect an executory contract and that the goods, though in a German ship, were to be delivered to a British subject at a British port. He says that the risk thus became the defendant's risk and that he is entitled to be paid.

I have tried the issue as a preliminary issue. I have been referred to certain recent authorities, Duncan, Fox & Co. v. Schrempf & Bonke (1). The decision was affirmed on appeal, Duncan, Fox & Co. v. Schrempf & Bonke (2). The goods in this case were to be delivered in Germany and further performance of the contract would have involved a trading in goods destined for the German empire in violation of the Royal Proclamation of 5th August 1914. This authority need not be referred to further. The next case is that of Arnold Karberg & Co. v. Blythe, Green, Jourdan & Co. (3). This involved two contracts for the sale of beans to be shipped from Chinese ports to Naples and Rouen. Payment was to be net cash in London on arrival of the goods at port or discharge in exchange for bills of lading and policies of insurance, but not later than three months from date of bills of lading. The beans were shipped in July 1914 on German vessels which on the outbreak of the war entered ports of refuge in the east. At the expiration of the three months the sellers tendered to the buyers, the shipping documents, in one case a German bill of lading and an English policy of insurance, in the other both the bill of lading and the policy of insurance were German. The buyers refused the tender and were held entitled to do so. This decision was affirmed, Arnold Karberg & Co. v. Blythe Green, Jourdan & Co. (4).

This decision was followed by Mr. Beaman J., in Marshall & Co. v. Naginchand Phulechand (5). Lastly in Cama & Co. v. K. S. Shah (6) of this Court Sir Charles Fox, C. J., took the same view. Having regard to this mass of authority I need only briefly record my findings, full authority for which can be found in the cases referred to above and in the rulings referred to in them. By the contract entered into plaintiff undertook to buy the goods, to enter into a contract of affreightment to Rangoon, which will be evidenced by a bill of lading and to take out a proper policy of insurance. The defendant undertook to pay as settled by the contract against these documents. When this has been done the plaintiffs as sellers will drop out, but they must supply defendant with a bill of lading and a policy which are still subsisting and can be enforced. Now here the contract of affreightment was made with a German subject with reference to a German ship and the effect of the outbreak of the war was that the contract of affreightment was dissolved. The result was that the shipper was no longer bound to continue the voyage and there was no force left in the bill of lading by which defendant could compel him to do so or to recompense him. It is not sufficient to say that the policy of insurance was with an English subject, for defendants are entitled to have the contract carried out by plaintiff before they pay, and that plaintiff could not do.

The Royal Proclamation of 5th August 1914 forbids the obtaining from the German empire or from any person resident therein any goods, wares or merchandise: it also forbids the trading in any goods, wares or merchandise coming from the said empire or from any person resident, carrying on business or being therein. If the contract had remained good, the effect would only have been that to pursue it defendant might have had to enter into contractual relations with a German subject or subjects. The proclamation, by forbidding trading in goods coming from the German empire as these did, rendered the contract abortive and illegal and so void. Plaintiff was bound to tender and defendant was entitled to get documents that were valid and effective, documents by which he could recover what might lawfully be recovered under such documents. Plaintiff did not and could not tender such document in respect of the contract of affreightment and this being so, defendants are entitled to refuse to pay against them. The suit, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs.

A. S. Shaik Dawood—Applicant.

A. Mahomed Ebrahim—Respondent.

Criminal Revn. No. 133-B of 1917. Decided on 8th August 1917, from order of Dist. Magistrate, Rangoon, D/- 21st May 1917.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 250—Accusation found to be false—Case comes within S. 250.

There is no reason why a case in which the accusation is found to be false should be considered as being outside the scope of S. 250, Criminal P. C. : 5 Bom. L. R. 128, Foll.

[P 50 C 1]

(b) Criminal Trial—Duty of complainant—Facts showing innocence of accused known by complainant during trial—Complainant must verify and if true must inform Court.

Where during the course of a trial facts come to the notice of the complainant which if true would prove the innocence of the accused, it is his duty to investigate those facts, and if he finds them to be true to inform the Magistrate accordingly. [P 49 C 2]

Order.—The applicant has under S. 250, Criminal P. C., been ordered to pay Rs. 50 compensation to the respondent for bringing a frivolous and vexatious accusation against the latter. This application is made for a revision of that order. The grounds are as follows: (1) that in view of the fact that before issuing process the learned Magistrate examined three witnesses of the prosecution and fully informed himself of the nature of the charge and inspected the account book through which your petitioner hoped to establish his case and then issued process against him, it was not consistent to afterwards classify the complaint as "frivolous and vexatious" and to award compensation, (2) for that the logical effect of the Magistrate's findings that there is a possibility of the respondent's innocence and hence his discharge, is inconsistent with the complaint being either frivolous or vexatious, (3) for that the words "frivolous and vexatious" have definite meanings and the learned Magistrate overlooked them, (4) for that however desirable it may be to economise the time of the Courts of Justice and because time was wasted in this case in the learned Magistrate's opinion, your petitioner submits that it was not a reason for awarding compensation, (5) that the learned Magistrate not having finished writing his order when your petitioner's advocate appeared, he should have given him an opportunity of being heard against making the order.

The charges against the respondent were: (1) that on 21st August 1916 he bought Rs. 65-4-0 worth of certain drugs from Galliara & Co. of Rangoon on behalf of his master, the applicant, and failed to enter them in the books of the shop or account for the same to the applicant, and that the goods never arrived at the applicant's shop, (2) that on 21st October 1916 the respondent bought on behalf of the applicant two bags of coirenda from M. C. Bham for Rs. 24-9-9 and also a bag of betel nuts from Hajee Kader Fakir Rowther, both of Rangoon, but the said goods were not entered in the applicant's books nor were they brought to his shop. All that the applicant proved was that the respondent did buy the aforesaid goods from the aforesaid persons and that such goods are not shown in his books, further that it was part of the respondent's duty to enter them, or have them entered in the books and that at the end of every day accounts were looked into when the respondent would be present according to the practice in vogue in the shop. The applicant's point was that an inference should be drawn from these facts that the goods though bought in his name had been misappropriated by the respondent. The learned District Magistrate held that the books did not appear to be properly and regularly kept and the circumstances of the case are not such that the books are infallible proof of the goods not having been brought to the shop. He also held that the fact that according to the practice of the shop the respondent would be present at the end of the day, when the accounts were gone over again, was not in any way against the respondent and that there is no proof that he would notice the omission in the accounts regarding the goods. I think the learned Magistrate is right in holding these views. The result of these views is that it is impossible to get a conviction against the respondent on the evidence afforded by the applicant's books.

Of course these views do not necessarily lead one to the conclusion that the case brought against the respondent is false. If there was nothing more in the case brought against the respondent it might be held that action could not be taken under S. 250, Criminal P. C., but I notice, and the Magistrate has noticed, that the representative of Galliara & Co. says he despatched his durwan to take the goods from his shop to the applicant's shop. Bham also says that applicant's coolies took away the goods from his shop, while, on the other hand, Kader Fakir Rowther's man does not know who took the goods away from his shop. The learned Magistrate has pertinently remarked that the evidence of the representative of Galliara & Co. and Bham indicates that the goods would in the natural course of business have been delivered at the complainant's shop, so that the fact that former's durwan is not called by the prosecution justifies the presumption that if he was called his evidence would go against them. It was the business of the prosecution to call him and they had ample opportunity of calling him. Though the applicant believed his case to be true at first he should subsequently have made proper inquiries from his coolies and the durwan of Galliara, and if he found that his belief had been proved to be untrue, it would be his business frankly to tell the Court that he had made a mistake. Suppose he paid no attention to the information given by Galliara's durwan and Bham's man, that would argue recklessness on his part, not caring to see whether the information could be true. That would argue malice on his part against the respondent.

Suppose he did inquire into the truth or falsity of this information and it turned out to be true, the fact that he did not bring that to the notice of the Court would show unwarrantable malice on his part. If the information turned out to be untrue he could have brought that forward in evidence and thereby strengthened his case very much indeed. I think his omission to call either of these two men must be taken to go hard against him. Thus the conclusion that the prosecution was frivolous and vexatious becomes justified. I do not think there is anything in the first ground mentioned above, because the materials which were placed before the Magistrate before process was issued were such as to justify the issue of process but not necessarily a conviction. I think that in saying that the time of the Court was wasted in the trial of such cases as this, the learned Magistrate only meant to point out the results of such folly on the part of complainants, but it is not put forward as a reason for the action he took under S. 250, Criminal P. C. As regards the fifth ground, I do not think the case has been prejudiced at all by his Advocate not having been heard.

The learned Magistrate classes the case as "false", and I was referred to the case of Emperor v. Asha (1), which rules that the provisions of S. 250 under consideration apply only in the case where the charge is frivolous or vexatious but not where the charge is false. A similar ruling was come to in Parst Hajra v. Bandhi Dhauk (2), but both these cases were distinguished from in Emperor v. Bai Asha (3).

where the Full Bench ruling of the Calcutta High Court in Beni Madhab Kurmi v. Kumad Kumar Biswas (4) was followed. In the latter case it was held per curiam, Prinsep, C. For the above reasons I am of opinion that the order of the Court below is justified, and this application is dismissed.

TWOMEY, C. J. AND ORMOND, J.

Arracan Co. Ltd.—Defendants—Appellants.

v.

H. Hamadane & Co.—Plaintiffs—Respondents.

First Appeal No. 157 of 1917. Decided on 14th February 1918.

Deed—Construction—Contract of sale of rice to be delivered from some specified mills—Condition to absolve defendants in case of accident to mill—Condition was for benefit of defendant and he was not bound to go to other mill in case of accident to his mill from which rice was supplied and accepted—Defendant was not liable for non-delivery.

Defendant contracted to sell a certain quantity of rice to the plaintiff, and the contract gave the seller the right of delivering the milling of seven specified firms. One of the clauses of the contract absolved the defendant from liability in case of accidents to machinery, etc. It appeared that the plaintiff agreed to accept the milling of the defendant's mill, but before the delivery was completed the mill was burnt down. Plaintiff sued the defendant for damages for non-delivery of the balance.

Held: (1) that the clause giving the option to the defendant to deliver the milling of any of the specified firms was inserted for the benefit of the defendant and that the latter could not be compelled to deliver from all the mills;

(2) that the clause relating to accidents to machinery referred to the mill from which delivery was to be taken or was being taken and that that mill having been burnt down, the defendant was absolved from giving or completing delivery of so much of the rice as remained undelivered under the contract. (P 51 C 1)

Lentaigne—for Appellants.

N. M. Cowasji—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The defendants in Rangoon agreed to sell to the plaintiff 10,000 bags of rice, delivery to be taken "ex hopper in April 1916 at Moulmein" date at sellers' option. The contract was in writing, upon one of the defendants' Rangoon printed forms of "rice sale notes."

The plaintiff took delivery of 6,442 bags from the defendants' mill at Moulmein up to 26th April, when the mill was burnt down and the deliveries under the contract ceased. The plaintiff sued for damages for breach of contract in not delivering the balance. The defendants rely upon Cl. 16 of the contract: . . . "Accidents to machinery, strikes or sickness of millhands or coolies always excepted." Cl. 18 gives the sellers the right of delivery under the contract the milling of seven specified firms, some of which have no mill at Moulmein, and the defendants' mill is not included. No evidence was taken at the hearing and there is nothing in the contract to show that the defendants had a mill or were entitled to give delivery of their own milling. But the plaintiff in his plaint says that "in terms of the said contract the defendants delivered to the plaintiff 6,442 bags," and the learned Judge on the original side has assumed that the contract was for the defendants' milling. He gave the plaintiff a decree on the ground that Cl. 18 applied not only to the defendants' mill, but to the other mills mentioned therein as well; and that the defendants were bound to deliver from these other mills if they could not deliver from their own mill. Cl. 16 is in the interest of the seller and absolves him from giving delivery, if prevented from doing so by a breakdown in the mill Mr. Lentaigne for the defendant-appellant contends that Cl. 16 refers to the defendants' mill. Mr. Cowasji for the plaintiff-respondent contends that Cl. 16 would not operate to absolve the seller from giving delivery, until all the mills mentioned in the contract had broken down which in effect means that Cl. 16 applies only to the last surviving mill.

If the contract had stated that the defendants were selling their own milling the defendants would not have been under any obligation to deliver their own milling. They could have selected any one or more of the mills mentioned in Cl. 18; and having communicated to the buyer their election to deliver the whole or a portion of the rice from one of those mills, the contract would have to be read as if the buyer had expressly agreed to buy that quantity of rice of that milling; and the buyer could not require the seller to give him any other milling. If A agrees to buy rice from B of X milling "ex hopper" and gives B the right of deliver.

ing, under the contract, Y milling, and if B elects to give Y milling, A cannot compel B to give delivery of Y milling. And the fact that delivery of Y milling has, after B's election has been communicated to A, become impossible, does not alter the case. Under the contract, the seller is entitled to say that he will give delivery from one mill only. The learned Judge was in error in construing Cl. 18, which is clearly inserted for the benefit of the seller, as if it imposed an obligation upon the seller to deliver, in certain circumstances, from all the mills. Cl. 16 clearly refers to the mill from which delivery is to be taken or is being taken; and means that if that mill breaks down, the seller is absolved from giving or completing delivery of so much rice as the buyer would have had to take from that mill if it had not broken down. The clause absolves the seller from anticipating and providing against a breakdown in the mill from which delivery is to be given. In the present case the plaintiff accepted a milling notice on the defendants' mill. It must be taken, therefore, that the parties had agreed that the defendants should be at liberty to give delivery under the contract from their own mill and the milling notice has been taken to have been in respect of the whole quantity of rice. Cl. 16, therefore, applies to a breakdown of machinery in the defendants' mill which actually occurred, and the defendants are absolved from any further delivery. The appeal is allowed and the plaintiff's claim is dismissed with costs in both Courts.

Second Appeal No. 102 of 1916, decided on 15th March 1917.

Buddhist Law (Burmese)—Succession—Not mere non-attendance on sick bed but positive act destroying natural affection is required for exclusion.

Mere non-attendance on a deceased during his or her illness is not sufficient to exclude those who would ordinarily inherit from him or her. The law requires that on the part of the person sought to be excluded, there must be conduct such as constitutes an intention on his part to destroy the natural tie between him and the deceased.

*Ba Dun—*for Appellant.*Pa Han—*for Respondents.

Judgment.—The respondents are brother and sister and the appellant is their brother. They had another sister, Ma Thi, who is dead. The respondents were older and the appellant younger than Ma Thi. On her death, the respondents sold the appellant for their respective shares in the property left by her. The appellant set up his daughter, Ma Saw Mya, as an adopted daughter of the deceased and Ma Saw Mya was added as a party defendant. The parties then went to trial on the following issues:—(1) Whether Ma Saw Mya was an adopted daughter of Ma Thi or not; (2) To what share is each of the parties entitled? The contest was concentrated on the first issue, but in the evidence it appears that the appellant and Ma Thi were not on speaking terms for some considerable time owing to a law-suit they had between them. It also appears that Ma Thi, who had been ailing for four or five years past, apparently not seriously, for witnesses say that she was ill off and on, took ill seriously one day and died the same day. The trial Court held that Ma Saw Mya was not adopted and that as the appellant had neglected to assist Ma Thi during her illness, he was not entitled to inherit. But it proceeded to say that appellant's daughter and a daughter of one of the respondents so assisted and the funeral obsequies were performed out of Ma Thi's money and it thought, apparently because of these latter facts, that the appellant and the respondents should share the estate of Ma Thi equally. The lower appellate Court held that the appellant's claim was extinguished through failure to attend on the deceased during her last illness but allowed the decree of the trial Court to stand, as the respondents had not appealed. It also held that Ma Saw Mya was not adopted by Ma Thi.

Ma Saw Mya has not appealed. The appellant now urges that he being the younger brother of Ma Thi and the respondents being her elder brother and sister he excludes them and that the lower Courts were wrong in not giving him the whole of the property. It has been urged before me by the learned Counsel for the respondents that the appellant was not on speaking terms with the deceased for some considerable time before her death owing to a law-suit between them, that he did not attend on the deceased during her illness and that he did not contribute towards the expenses of the funeral and that these facts clearly show that the fraternal relationship between them had been intentionally and deliberately severed by the appellant. We are not in a position to know who was in fault with regard to the litigation, to whom was solely due the fact that the sister and brother were not on speaking terms. If the sister was in fault and to her was solely due the estrangement between them, the appellant cannot be blamed. It must be remembered that Ma Thi had not the right to exclude her brother by any conduct on her part towards him. It must be shown that the appellant was guilty of conduct which in law is sufficient to exclude him. In other words, he must be proved to have forfeited his ordinary right by his own misconduct.

If Ma Thi was to blame for the estrangement we cannot expect the appellant to be at her bedside during her illness, especially as she took ill suddenly and died. It is not denied that he went to the house after her death. As regards the funeral expenses, it seems no one contributed towards them and they were paid, as has been rightly held by the trial Court, out of Ma Thi's property. I am unable to hold that mere non-attendance on a deceased during his or her illness excludes those who would ordinarily inherit from him or her. The law requires that on the part of the person sought to be excluded there was conduct such as constitutes an intention on his part to destroy the natural tie between him and the deceased: See the cases of Maung Chit Kywe v. Maung Pyo (1) and Maung Sein v. Maung Kywe (2). For the reasons given above I am unable to hold that the appellant could be excluded at all. The result is that he is entitled to the whole of the estate. As the younger brother of the deceased he excludes the respondents, her older brother and sister. The appeal is allowed with costs.

First Appeal No. 156 of 1916. Decided on 19th March 1918, against the decree of Dist. Judge, Toungoo, in Civil Regular No. 14 of 1915.

(a) Registration Act (16 of 1908), S. 17—Memorandum of securities handed over to equitable mortgagee need not be registered.

Judgment.—The plaintiff Chetty Firm O. A. M. K. of Rangoon sued Badri Dass of Toungoo and the Official Assignee as representing the firm mark S. V. A. R. on an equitable sub-mortgage of 24th September 1914. The plaintiff obtained a decree in the District Court and Badri Dass now appeals.

The District Judge has carefully considered all the facts. The defence raised one or two legal points which we will now deal with: First, the equitable sub-mortgage was by the deposit of a mortgage-deed made by Badri Dass in favour of the S. V. A. R. Firm and the deposit was made by the mortgagee with the plaintiff in Rangoon. It was accompanied by a document Ex. B and the question is whether that document is merely a memorandum or whether it should be construed as a mortgage. That document merely recites what securities were handed over at that time to the plaintiff. We are satisfied that it is a memorandum and not a mortgage and, therefore, it does not require registration; secondly, it is contended that the suit is not maintainable because no leave has been obtained under S. 17, Presidency Insolvency Act. The case of B. N. Lang v. Heptullabhai Ismailjee (1) is an authority to show that a secured creditor can bring a suit to realise his securities without the leave of the Official Assignee. The defence of Badri

Dass on the facts is that he had paid up the balance due on this mortgage to S. V. A. R. and that he had not received notice of the equitable sub-mortgage. Rs. 10,000 was due on the mortgage by Badri Dass when this equitable sub-mortgage was made, i. e., on 24th September 1914. He alleges that on 4th April 1915 he paid to Oodayappa, the agent of the S. V. A. R. Firm in Rangoon, Rs. 4,500 in cash and handed him over a promissory note on which Rs. 5,500 was due which had been executed by S. V. A. R. in favour of Lalchand Rupmull, who in turn had sold the note to Badri Dass' uncle Hardyal and liability under it was taken over by Badri Dass. Beyond the entries in the book of Badri Dass and Hardyal there is no documentary evidence to support this settlement or payment to S. V. A. R. On previous occasions when Badri Dass had made payments in respect of this mortgage such payments were endorsed on the mortgage. On this occasion he took no receipt and he did not get back the mortgage-bond.

His explanation of that is that when the mortgage was made in favour of S. V. A. R. the title-deeds of the property were also handed to that firm and when this settlement was made in Rangoon the title deeds were handed back but the mortgage deed was in Toungoo; that Oodayappa gave him (Badri Dass) a letter to Vellassami, the agent of the S. V. A. R. Firm in Toungoo, directing him to hand over the mortgage-deed to Badri Dass. Badri Dass says he went to Toungoo and showed the letter to Vellassami, that Vellassami said he would give him the mortgage deed and Badri Dass thereupon handed him the letter and Vellassami subsequently said he had lost the mortgage-deed. Badri Dass, therefore, parted with the letter without receiving the mortgage-deed. Vellassami and S. V. A. R., deny the whole of this story and it is almost impossible to believe that Badri Dass would have parted with that letter without receiving the mortgage-deed. No written demand was made for the mortgage deed until 10th May, more than a month later. The plaintiff alleges that he gave notice to Badri Dass a day or two after 24th September and that Badri Dass paid three instalments of interest to the plaintiff through one Perianan, the agent at Toungoo of the firm of C. R. V. V. C. T. The plaintiff had no branch at Toungoo and Perianan must have been known to Badri Dass as having no business connexion with the S. V. A. R. Firm. Badri Dass alleges that he made these payments to Vellassami. Perianan alleges that they were made direct to him by Badri Dass on behalf of the plaintiff.

Perianan has entered two of these payments in a temporary loan account book and two letters are put in Exs. J and K, written by Perianan to the plaintiff explaining what arrangements Perianan had made with Badri Dass for the repayment of this mortgage. The District Judge has disbelieved the case set up by Badri Dass and has believed the plaintiff's case as to notice having been given to Badri Dass. We agree with the view the District Judge has taken of the case. The appeal is dismissed and the plaintiff will have his costs against the appellant of this appeal.

A. E. Sallayjee and another—Defendants.

Civil Regular No. 144 of 1917, Decided on 3rd July 1918.

(a) Evidence Act (1872), S. 115—Act or deed must not be ambiguous—Act when ambiguous explained.

Just as an estoppel cannot be created by an ambiguous document, so too it cannot be created by an ambiguous act. (P 57 C 1)

A mere deposit of title-deeds with a banker or a Chetty is ambiguous and may be either for custody or by way of mortgage, and the ambiguity is not eliminated by showing that the depositor is also a debtor of the depositor. (P 57 C 1)

(b) Contract Act (1872), S. 172—Promissory note.

A promissory note may be the subject of a pledge.

Das and Ginnwala—for Plaintiffs.

Connell, Campagnac and A. B. Banerji—for Defendants.

Judgment.—Messrs. E. Y. Mamsa Bros., the plaintiffs in this suit, claim that on or about 2nd January 1917 they lent the now insolvent Chetty firm of T. A. R. A. R. M. the sum of Rs. 25,000 and assert that to secure the debt Kaderasen, the agent of the firm, deposited with them by way of pledge and equitable sub-mortgage (a) two pro-notes dated 30th August 1915, under which defendant 1 A. E. Sallayjee promised to pay the Chetty firm Rs. 9,000 and Rs. 20,000; and which they allege the Chetty firm endorsed in blank, (b) the title deeds of House No. 84, 29th Street, which they allege that Kaderasen had stated had been deposited with his firm to secure the repayment of the Rs. 29,000. The house in question at the time of the loan was vested in Sallayjee as executor of his father, and he was originally sued in both capacities and the other heirs were also joined. At the hearing however the claims against the other heirs and against him as executor were waived and he was sued in his personal capacity only, for a declaration that plaintiff was entitled to the rights of a sub-mortgagee in respect of his share in the house in question. The Official Assignee was also sued as representing the insolvent estate of T. A. R. A. R. M. At first this officer contended that the suit as against him must be dismissed, on the ground that the leave of the Insolvency Court had not been obtained, but abandoned the plea having regard to Cl. 2, S. 17, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act.

Originally also the plaintiff had claimed that he was entitled only to the rights of an equitable sub-mortgagee in respect of the house or rather defendant 1's share in it, but at the hearing he prayed leave to amend by claiming a pledgee's rights in respect also of the two pro-notes, a request which was consented to by the defendants, provided it was understood that the suit was not converted into (a) a suit on the pro-notes, (b) a suit for a declaration with regard to the house, but remained only a suit for a mortgage decree with however an added claim as regards the pledged pro-notes. The 1st question therefore to be considered is whether the plaintiffs lent the Chetty firm the sum of Rs. 25,000 as alleged. (Issue No. 2, Pt. No. 1). Kaderasen, to whom they say that they lent it, has absconded and cannot be found; but they produce (a) the pro-notes which they allege that he gave them, (b) their books, and (c) show corresponding entries in the insolvent's books. Mr. Connell, who appeared for Sallayjee, objected that these last were unproved and were in any event not evidence against him. At this stage it is inconvenient and unnecessary to discuss this objection, as the plaintiffs' evidence without them is sufficient. It consists of plaintiff's own books which are in order and the statement of Sallayjee's own witness, Lutchman Chetty, who admits that the pro-note was executed by Kaderasen, and as he is his brother, he should know. This first point must therefore be found in plaintiffs' favour. (Issue No. 2, Pt. No. 1). The next question (Issue No. 2, Pt. No. 2) is whether Kaderasen deposited, (a) Sallayjee's two pro-notes, Exs. C and D, (b) the title-deeds, with intent to secure the repayment of this debt of Rs. 25,000. I will take the two pro-notes first. In support we have, (a) the plaintiffs' oath, (b) their possession of the title-deeds and pro-notes (c) an entry in Kaderasen's alleged books.

Plaintiff's own books do not support his story that there was a deposit at the actual date of loan; their cash book entry under the heading "details" says simply "Paid on a pro-note made," and says nothing of any deposit by way of security.

The principal of the firm explains the omission by stating that he is a hardware merchant and had not lent money in this fashion before and did not think it necessary to enter the additional details. The insolvent's books, Exs. J-1 and K-1, however, set out the whole transaction in full detailing the deposit both of the pro-notes and the title-deeds but they are alleged to be unsatisfactory. It appears that when the T. A. R. A. R. M. firm began to get shaky, some of his creditors went and seized some or all his books and on 14th March 1917, Kaderasen with one Mahomed Ismail Ariff made over for safe custody certain books, whether restored or never taken does not appear, to Mr. Bilimoria, Barrister-at-law, one of the partners of Messrs. B. Cowasji & Co. He in due course when Kaderasen was adjudicated handed them over to the Official Assignee and it is in one of these books that these entries are found given up by Kaderasen to Mr. Bilimoria, kept by the latter in a locked drawer till made over to the Official Assignee, and written in part by Kaderasen himself as admitted by his brother Lachman. The suggestion apparently is that Kaderasen was preferring the plaintiff. Another objection taken to the books is in relation to the Rs. 29,000 owed by Sallayjee to the Chetty, no entry of which is to be found at any rate on the date on which it would be expected to appear. It is admitted that there had been a running account between him and the Chetty firm that this was closed and a sum of Rs. 29,000 found to be due from Sallayjee for which he gave the 2 pro-notes, Exs. C and D.

At this time Lachman was agent and he swears that when he gave over charge in October 1915 Kaderasen took over the debt. Curiously enough, however, it is not entered in the new agent's books at any rate under the date of 30th August 1915, which is the date on which the 2 pro-notes were taken. The only books produced, however, are day books and a book called the balance book. The ledgers seem to be missing: possibly it was the ledgers that were taken by the angry creditors. Anyhow they are not here to supply a clue to the cash books, and it is possible that the entry relating to the 2 pro-notes was made on some other date: this ought not, I presume, to have occurred but the notes were taken at a time when one agent was making over to another and there may have been some confusion and if the ledgers were found, or the cash books searched more fully, the entries might be found on a different date. Another point alleged against Kaderasen's books is that Sallayjee produces a pro-note Ex. 10 for Rs. 12,000, dated 1st February 1917, which purports to be signed by Kaderasen and which he swears was signed by him and which Lachman identifies as being in his hand, which also is not entered in the books produced, and on these grounds Mr. Council urges that the books and Ex. J-1 and K-1 are not to be relied on. But suppose they are not to be relied on, does it make any difference? We are dealing only with what Kaderasen did, and I must hold that the entries in J-1 and K-1 books surrendered by Kaderasen himself and containing entries in his own hand constitute admissions that at some period or another he deposited with Mamsa both the pro-notes and the title-deeds.

These admissions corroborate and are corroborated by the fact that the documents themselves are in the possession of the plaintiff.

It may be that Kaderasen deposited them after the loan, but that makes no difference, provided that he deposited them to secure the debt, and for this we have Kaderasen's own admission corroborated by plaintiff's possession. I think it quite possible that they were deposited after the loan and quite possible that they were deposited within less than 3 months of his insolvency, but if so, though the deposit might be void as against the Official Assignee he has never moved. It could not be void under S. 53, T. P. Act, as I have found that Kaderasen actually owed Rs. 25,000 to plaintiff and the only person who could object to his paying or securing the repayment of his debt would be not other creditors but the Official Assignee. The 4th issue must, therefore, be decided in the negative. Mr. Council also urged that that the books are not evidence against him, but they would have been evidence against Kaderasen if he had not become insolvent and as he has, are evidence against the Official Assignee, and it is he and not Sallayjee who is really concerned in the case so far. Sallayjee certainly owed Kaderasen at one time Rs. 29,000 and repaid certainly Rupees 4,000 and possibly Rs. 10,000, but cannot get out of the fact that he owes Kaderasen at least Rs. 13,000 and possibly Rs. 25,000.

He must pay either the Official Assignee or Mamsa, and it matters little to him which of these two has recourse to the securities if he fails to do so. The only question is whether Kaderasen had power to pledge the pro-notes and sub-mortgage the title-deeds. Now it does not seem disputable that the pro-notes may be the subject of pledge: of, in England Bills of Exchange Act, S. 27 (3), Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 2, para. 845. Peacock v. Puseell (1), and in India Osmond Beeby v. Khilish Chandra Acharya (2) and Bhashyam's Negotiable Instruments Act, p. 65, and as between the plaintiff and the Official Assignee I must hold that Kaderasen did as a fact pledge the notes with the plaintiff to secure his own debt. The next question is whether he also validly sub-mortgaged the house property. This transaction stands on a different footing from that of the pro-notes, inasmuch as the house was not Kaderasen's own property as the pro-notes were and unless Kaderasen acquired an interest in the house, which he could in turn mortgage, the sub-mortgage can only be valid by calling in aid the principle of estoppel.

2. A I R 1915 Cal 13=26 I C 284=41 Cal 771.

The plaintiff first of all endeavours to prove that the property was equitably mortgaged by Sallayjee to Kaderasen and if so, of course Kaderasen could equitably sub-mortgage it.

The evidence, however, shows that the title-deeds were originally deposited with the Bank of Bengal in 1903 to secure an overdraft of Rs. 25,000 by T. A. R. A. R. M. and withdrawn about 1906, vide Exs. 6 and 8. The latter of these exhibits which were written by Lachman ended as follows: "We agree to take back and deliver the said grant to you whenever you want it." There is nothing in this from which a deposit by way of mortgage can be spelt; on the contrary the language is inconsistent with such an idea, and Lachman tells us that the transactions between his firm and Sallayjee were then small. Later on we know that there was a mutual account between the parties and there is no evidence that Sallayjee's side was secured. Lachman in fact denies it. We know that this account was closed in 1915 and that a balance was struck and Rs. 29,000 was found due from Sallayjee for which he gave pro notes and though it might be reasonable to suppose that at this time it was arranged between T. A. R. A. R. M. that the nature of the bailment should be changed, Lachman tells us that this was not done. He also adds that if it had been done it would have been noted in the books if the usual practice of Chetties had been followed. He says that he would also have noted the fact on the pro notes. He is defendant's witness, but none of these statements were cross examined to and if plaintiff relies on J1 and K1 as he does, he cannot say that though Kaderasen borrowed on a mortgage he did not enter the details of the security given, and if so, it seems probable that when he lent upon a security he would also have made a note of the securities taken.

Admittedly the plaintiff has not made a thorough inspection of the books, and it may be that if he had done so and found the entry of the Rs. 29,000, he would have found also an entry of the deposit: but he has not done so and I must take things as I find them de non apparentibus et non existentibus eadem est ratio. Clearly the title-deeds were not originally deposited to secure a loan, and when they were taken back from the Bank there was no idea of anything but a deposit for safe-custody, vide Ex. 8. Lachman also tells us that the nature of the bailment was not changed in his time and there is no written evidence of any subsequent change. It is, however, very easy to change the nature of a deposit and Sallayjee's conduct is more than suspicious: he never sent a written demand for their return, even when he changed his Chetty or when the Chetty closed his business and was in hiding from his creditors. Sallayjee knew where he was and says he went to Kaderasen and asked for his deeds every two or three days, thereby showing that he appreciated the importance of getting them back into his own hands. He says the Chetty kept putting him off and that he trusted him and so made no written demand.

I cannot accept this story and can only understand Sallayjee's inaction on the supposition that at some time or another it was agreed that the deeds should be retained as security, either when the notes were taken or that later when the Chetty began to be pressed for money, he in turn pressed Sallayjee and in default of payment made Sallayjee agree to give the title-deeds as security. There was no absolute necessity for Kaderasen to have noted in his books that on such and such a day Sallayjee consented that the title-deeds should no longer be held in safe custody but as security for the repayment of the two pro-notes, in my mind the omission to note or rather the failure to produce such note in the books is outweighed by Sallayjee's own conduct which is I think inconsistent with the idea that he still had power to demand their return. I must, therefore, answer the first issue by saying that the title-deeds were not originally deposited with T. A. R. A. R. M. for the purpose of creating an equitable mortgage, but that later on the bailment was changed, and I must also hold that both notes and title-deeds were mortgaged to plaintiffs by Kaderasen. It is not contended that the mortgage was valid to anything beyond Sallayjee's interest, or that the sub-mortgage is valid to any larger extent, and to this extent I must hold it valid. Under these circumstances, it becomes unnecessary to consider the question whether Sallayjee's conduct in depositing the title deeds with the Chetty estopped him from denying that they were deposited by way of equitable mortgage, but if I had to decide it my answer would be in the negative.

Just as an estoppel cannot be created from an ambiguous document, cf. per Lord Watson in Colonial Bank v. Cady (3), so too can it not be created from an ambiguous act. A deposit of title-deeds especially with a Banker or Chetty is ambiguous and may be either for custody or by way of mortgage, and the ambiguity is not eliminated by showing that the depositor is also a debtor. My answer to issue 3, is therefore, in the negative. It remains to consider the remedies to which plaintiff is entitled. This as regards the mortgaged documents depends on the state of the account between the original mortgagor Sallayjee and his mortgagee Kaderasen. The plaintiff tells a curious story of his having given the pro-notes back to the Chetty on 10th January 1917 and 17th January 1917 after the deposit to enable Kaderasen to receive and endorse payments of two sums of Rs. 1,000 by Sallayjee.

He further says that he himself never got these payments and that he did not care as the notes were still good for the amount that he had advanced upon them. It may be so, but mortgagees are not usually so benevolent as to consent to the diminution of their security and it seems to me at any rate more probable that the notes and, therefore, the title-deeds also were not deposited by Kaderasen with the plaintiff at the time of the loan on 2nd January 1917, but at some date subsequent to 17th January, this being the date of the last endorsement of payment. If so, as the Chetty was adjudicated insolvent in Madras on 16th April, the deposit may have been void as against the Official Assignee. It is a matter of suspicion and the Official Assignee never having thought fit to raise the question the point is immaterial, except that the plaintiff has to admit that the notes represent in his hands only a debt of Rs. 25,000 with interest at 6 per cent., there being no mention of interest in the pro-note given by Kaderasen to himself. Sallayjee, however, goes further and claims that he made a further payment of Rs. 12,000 on 1st February 1917 to Kaderasen in respect of the loan and that it should also be taken into account, though the payment is not endorsed on the note. Sallayjee, however, admits that he took a pro-note with interest at 3 per cent. per mensem for the amount which is obviously inconsistent with the idea that it was a repayment of the loan, and as we are dealing with the statement of account between Kaderasen and Sallayjee, I do not think he can be heard under S. 92, Evidence Act, to plead that it was not a loan but a part repayment.

His story, moreover, is very weak, and I should come to the same conclusion on it and apart from S. 92. He admits that whenever he made the prior repayments Kaderasen brought him the notes to show that they were still in his possession and unnegotiated and that the payments were endorsed thereon, but says that on this occasion he did not do so saying he was in a great hurry for the money and had forgotten to bring the notes. The two lived quite close together and I think that Sallayjee, who admittedly had not the money with him, would have said that while he was getting the money, Kaderasen must go back get the notes; or alternatively have taken, if as he says he trusted his word, a receipt and not a pro-note. He tries to explain his omission by saying that he did not know how to make out a receipt, but even if this rather improbable excuse be accepted, he had his manager with him who admits that he knew how to write such a document. Both admit that their suspicions were aroused and the most I can find in their favour is that they neither accepted nor rejected the Chetty's story that he still had the notes in his possession and were willing to cancel the note and treat it as a repayment if he showed his story were true by bringing back the notes, but safeguarded themselves in case it was false by taking a pro-note at 3 per cent. interest. This is really Sallayjee's own story for he says that finally the Chetty said he would give him a pro-note for the amount and take it back when he brought the pro-notes. In other words it was at best a conditional re-payment, and if the condition was unfulfilled it was a loan at 3 per cent. The condition never was fulfilled, and it remains a loan at 3 per cent. for which Sallayjee can prove against Kaderasen's insolvent estate, but not against Mamsa. Lastly, if the notes were duly endorsed in Mamsa's favour, I do not see how he could in any event plead this payment to Kaderasen as an answer to Mamsa's claim, for Mamsa though only a pledgee, would by the endorsement become a holder in due course of a negotiable instrument. The note for Rs. 20,000 was admittedly endorsed by Kaderasen, but the endorsement of the note for Rs. 9,000 which by reason of the repayments had become a note for Rs. 5,000 is not satisfactorily proved.

Apparently it had been pledged at some earlier date to one A. M. B. Khorasanee at a time when Kaderasen was away and it only purports to be endorsed by one Sunderam Pillay, attorney of Kaderasen. It is admitted that this man did hold a power of attorney from Kaderasen, but there is no proof of his signature. I do not know that this would make any difference with regard to the alleged payment of Rs. 12,000 and in the view I take of the case, it is unnecessary to enquire. Lastly as regards plaintiff's rights on these pro-notes. He has sued in terms as pledgee and not upon the notes as holder or holder in due course. As pledgee he would, if the notes being notes to order were endorsed, be a holder for value, or if not endorsed be a holder and entitled to the legal remedies of persons holding these positions. Originally the plaintiff did not claim upon the notes in this suit at all, but at the hearing prayed and obtained leave to amend by including them in this mortgage suit on the clear understanding that he claimed only mortgage decree in respect of them. Whatsoever, therefore, plaintiff's rights may be as holders or holders in due course, they deliberately elected to forego these and asked for a sale if necessary of the property described in para. 9 of the plaint, which by their amendment included the pro-notes. There must, therefore, be a decree as against the Official Assignee for Rs. 25,000 with interest at 6 per cent. (as the note specified no rate of interest) and costs, and there must be the ordinary mortgage account taken of what is due by Sallayjee to T. A. R. A. R. M. on the two notes for Rs. 20,000, and Rs. 9,000, or rather on the two notes for Rupees 20,000, and Rs. 5,000, as they have come to be and in default of payment of this amount or so much as may be necessary by Sallayjee to the plaintiffs, the pro-notes and the interest of Sallayjee in House No. 84, 29th Street, must be sold and the amount due by Sallayjee to Kaderasen or so much as may be necessary to discharge T. A. R. A. R. M.'s debt to the plaintiffs must be paid to them and the surplus handed over to the Official Assignee. Sallayjee is also liable for costs.

TOWMEY, C. J. AND ORMOND, J.

Chit Tha—Appellant.

v.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Criminal Appeal No. 947 of 1917, Decided on 10th January 1918.

Penal Code (1860), S. 302—Punishment—Youth is extenuating circumstance except in cases of extreme depravity.

Ordinarily youth is in itself an extenuating circumstance in murder cases as in other Criminal cases. Cases of extreme depravity do occur in which the youth of the accused may not be a sufficient reason for imposing the lesser sentence. But the youth of the criminal is a circumstance which should always be taken into account by Sessions Courts in exercising the discretion vested in them by S. 302, I. P. C. [P 59 C 1]

Judgment.—The appellant Nga Chit Tha has been sentenced to death for murder. The case is clear and the appeal admitted only for the purpose of considering the propriety of the sentence. The appellant who is an agricultural labourer had been working with a wood-cutting dhama in his hand and returned to his employer's house to get a light for his cheroot. There he suddenly encountered the deceased Maung San Mya with whom he had a quarrel some months before. He fell upon the deceased with the da and inflicted fatal wounds on his head. The appellant at first stated that he had been threatened with death in an anonymous letter which he attributed to San Mya and when he suddenly met San Mya, he was terrorstruck and attacked him so as to prevent San Mya from attacking him. The Sessions Judge was inclined to believe this story, though the appellant modified it considerably when he was examined in Court. He then alleged that the deceased abused him and assaulted him when he entered the cooking place of the house. There can be no doubt that the appellant was rightly convicted of murder. His age according to the medical subordinate who gave evidence at the trial is between 17 and 19. The Superintendent and Medical Officer of the Jail where Chit Tha is now confined was asked to give his opinion on this point, and he reports that in his opinion Chit Tha is 16 years of age. The Sessions Judge thought that he would not be justified in remitting the extreme penalty on the ground of youth only. The learned Judge was perhaps influenced by the ruling in Nga Pyan v. Crown (1). The following is an extract from Fox, J.'s judgment in that case:

"The present case is one in which a youth must have silently brooded for a considerable time over chidings and abuse addressed to him by the man he subsequently murdered, but in the end his act was deliberate, previously meditated, done in cold blood, and was accompanied by great ferocity. To refrain from confirming a sentence of death in such a case on account of the criminal's youth would, in my opinion, be an act of pure mercy. The exercise of mercy is the prerogative of the Crown to be exercised in this country by the very highest authorities, and, if mercy is exercised towards a criminal, he and the public should understand that the mitigation of the sentence passed upon him by the Court of Justice is due to the exercise of the power of clemency, which is an attribute of the King Emperor alone."

In the murder case now under consideration there appears to have been no deliberation; it is probable that the appellant acted on a sudden impulse. The case is, therefore, distinguishable from that of Nga Pyan. As to the general principle, we are of opinion that ordinarily youth is in itself an extenuating circumstance in murder cases as in other criminal cases. We refrain from laying down that the lesser penalty should be awarded in every murder case where the accused is below a certain age. Cases of extreme depravity do occur in which the youth of the accused may not be a sufficient reason for imposing the lesser sentence. But the youth of the criminal is a circumstance which should always be taken into account by Sessions Courts in exercising the discretion vested in them by S. 302, I. P. C. We respectfully dissent from the view suggested in Nga Pyan's case that a Sessions Court, which on the ground of the criminal's youth imposes on him the lesser sentence provided in S. 302, is thereby encroaching on the prerogative of the Crown. Having regard to the youth of the present appellant and the circumstances of the case, we consider that the sentence passed on him may properly be reduced to one of transportation for life and it is reduced accordingly.

ROBINSON, J.

Mathuraban—Plaintiff.

v.

D. Tewary—Defendant.

Civil Regular No. 75 of 1916, Decided on 21st March 1917.

Guardians and Wards Act (8 of 1890), Ss. 12, and 25 — No remedy under Act—Father can sue for custody of child.

A suit by a father for the custody of his child is maintainable where no remedy under the Guardians and Wards Act exists that he can apply for. [P. 60 C. 1]

Dhar—for Plaintiff.

Rose—for Defendant.

Order.—This is a suit by the plaintiff asking for the custody of his illegitimate child. The mother of the child was the illegitimate daughter of the defendant. In August 1913 the mother left plaintiff's protection taking the child with her. The mother was the natural guardian of the illegitimate child. She died in December 1915 and the plaintiff then became the natural guardian. Plaintiff has been maintaining the child since the mother left him. The first question is whether the suit lies. The Guardians and Wards Act makes certain provisions for obtaining custody, under S. 12 when an application for the appointment of a guardian is pending, and under S. 25 when the ward leaves or is removed from the custody of the guardian. Neither of these provisions applies here as the plaintiff never has had custody of the child. It is urged that their Lordships of the Privy Council held in Mrs. Annie Besant v. Narayaniah (1) that a suit will not lie, but that action must be taken under the Act. This was the view taken in Arunachallam Pillay v. Iyama (2). In both these cases the suit had been launched in the District Court though the former was transferred to the High Court, and it was held that its powers were limited to those that the District Court possessed. The contrary view of the Privy Council decision has been taken in Achratlal Jekisendas v. Chimanlal Parbhudas (3). The Bombay High Court in Sharifa v. Mune Khan (4) and this Court in Ma Shwe Ge v. Maung Shwe Pan (5) have held that such a suit would lie, and in Achratlal's case (3) the Bombay High Court said:

"We are not prepared to hold that the dictum of the Privy Council in Mrs. Annie Besant v. Narayanath (1), to the effect that a suit inter partes is not the proper proceeding, was intended to be of such general application as virtually to overrule the decision of this Court in Sharifa v. Mune Khan (4)."

In my opinion this view is correct and the decision of this Court in Ma Shwe Ge's case (5) cannot be taken to be overruled. No remedy under the Guardians and Wards Act exists that the plaintiff can apply for. I must, therefore, follow the decision of the Full Bench in Ma Shwe Ge's case (5) and hold that the suit lies.

First Appeal No. 127 of 1917, Decided on 26th April 1918, against decrees of District Judge, Hanthawaddy, in Civil Regular No. 56 of 1915.

Buddhist Law (Burmese) — Marriage — Minor — Minor girl's marriage without father's consent is invalid.

There cannot be a valid marriage of a minor Burmese Buddhist girl without her father's express consent. [F 60 C 2]

Broadbent—for Appellant.

Connel and Maung Thin—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The plaintiff and defendant are Burmese Buddhists. The plaintiff is a young man of 23 years of age and sues for restitution of conjugal rights. The defendant Ma Tin is 16 or 17 years of age and is admittedly a minor. She eloped with the plaintiff and lived with him for four days in Mg. Gyi's house in the same village in which she lived with her father. Lugyis intervened on behalf of the plaintiff to persuade the defendant's father to allow them to marry. When the Lugyis first intervened, they were under the impression that the father would consent to a marriage. On the fourth day the Lugyis and the young couple returned to the defendant's father's house and there was an interview which lasted some hours. The father asked his daughter if she had gone willingly with the plaintiff and she said that she had done so because she loved him. The father told the two young people to go up into the house and the Lugyis also went into the house.

Shortly afterwards the girl said she did not want to remain in her father's house because she thought her father wished to separate her from the plaintiff. Some of the witnesses say that the father said: "as you love him, I will not interfere," but others who were present do not give evidence to this effect. The Lugyis were present in order to be witnesses of a consent to the marriage, but no express consent was given. We are asked to find that there was an implied consent in view of the fact that the father told the plaintiff and defendant to go into the house, and in view of the evidence of certain witnesses that the father said he would not interfere, but as against that there was the conduct of the girl and the fact that the plaintiff did not stay in the house that night; there is the further fact that when he came next morning he was refused admission and that he has not been allowed to see the girl since.

The only question in this appeal is: Did the father give his consent? The facts are fully dealt with by the learned Judge and we agree with him in the view he has taken, namely, that no real consent was given. Mr. Connel, for the respondent, contends, that even if the father did give his consent, that would not convert the elopement into a marriage with retrospective effect, but that further cohabitation would be necessary after such consent in order to constitute a marriage and he quotes the Upper Burma case of King-Emperor v. Naga Ni Ta (1). But it is unnecessary to go into that question in this appeal, because we find that the father did not in fact give his consent to a marriage between the parties, and Mr. Broadbent for the appellant admits that without such consent there could be no valid marriage and that the plaintiff's suit would have to be dismissed. The appeal, therefore, is dismissed with costs.

Criminal Appeals Nos. 173 and 874 of 1917, Decided on 7th December 1917.

(a) Penal Code (45 of 1860), Ss. 75 and 379 — Punishment—Highest need not always be awarded — Extenuating circumstances and subject-matter of theft should be considered.

There is no hard and fast rule that a sentence of two years' rigorous imprisonment must be passed in all cattle and boat theft cases, without regard to the value and utility of the stolen property, the youth of the accused, his previous character, or any other circumstances that may justly be taken into consideration in passing sentence. Each case should be considered on its merits, and if extenuating circumstances appear to exist, the sentence should be modified accordingly. A sentence should never be heavier than is necessary to deter the criminal from committing the offence again. [P 61 C 2]

(b) Penal Code (45 of 1860), S. 75 — Previous conviction is not the only factor to be considered for higher sentence — Scope and object of S. 221 Criminal P. C. stated — Criminal P. C. (5 of 1898), S. 221.

In the case of men with previous convictions, regard should be had to their career and to the time that has elapsed between the convictions passed upon them. Ss. 75, I. P. C., and 221, Criminal P. C., were not intended for the purpose of automatically enhancing by a kind of geometrical progression the sentence to be passed after a previous conviction. The reason for passing a more severe sentence in the case of a criminal with a previous conviction is primarily to protect society from the predations and offences committed by an habitual rogue, who has shown no signs of repentance. A Magistrate or Judge should make some inquiry into the regular and antecedent behaviour of a man whom he proposes to sentence severely. [P 61 C 2; P 62 C 1]

Judgment. — The appellants have been rightly convicted of the theft of a bauktu boat, worth Rs. 8 on 2nd August, and another similar boat, worth Rs. 15, on the 12th August. Nga Po Gyein, who had a previous conviction proved against him was sentenced to two consecutive terms of three and a half years' rigorous imprisonment or to seven years in all, whilst Po Tin who has no previous convictions was sentenced to consecutive sentences of two years' rigorous imprisonment, or to four years in all. The sentence passed on Po Tin for the theft of two boats of little value is an example of that want of discrimination and thought that is shown in some of the sentences passed in these cases. The Magistrate probably had in mind the ruling of Queen-Empress v. Nga San (1) in which Aston, J. C., said:

"The reason why boat thefts and cattle thefts call ordinarily for a sentence of two years' imprisonment is two-fold. They for the most part are committed by professional thieves, or by persons ready to join the ranks of professional thieves, and the injury inflicted on the owner is not measured by the intrinsic value of the property stolen, but is usually far beyond that value when the owners are deprived of their means of livelihood by the loss of their cattle or boats."

The proper sentence to be passed in cattle theft cases was again considered in Queen-Empress v. Nga Ni and Nga Shwe Ni (2) in which Byles, J. C., said that where there are no extenuating circumstances, a sentence of two years' rigorous imprisonment is not unsuitable. These pronouncements have unfortunately been sometimes interpreted as laying down a hard and fast rule that a sentence of two years' rigorous imprisonment must be passed in all cattle and boat theft cases, without regard to the value and utility of the stolen property, the youth of the accused, his previous character, or any other circumstances that may justly be taken into consideration in passing sentence. When Mr. Aston spoke of cattle thefts being committed for the most part by professional thieves, he was probably thinking of the type prevalent in India, whereas in Burma many of the thefts are committed by young men who are tempted to steal either by the careless way in which cattle are tended, or by motives of bravado. It is undesirable to send young men to jail if they can be suitably punished otherwise, and in many cases I think that a whipping would be a more appropriate sentence than imprisonment. Each case should be considered on its merits, and if extenuating circumstances appear to exist, the sentence should be modified accordingly. A sentence should never be heavier than is necessary to deter the criminal from committing the offence again. In the case of men with previous convictions regard should be had to their career and to the time that has elapsed between the convictions passed upon them. Ss. 75, I. P. C., and 221, Criminal P. C., were not intended for the purpose of automatically enhancing by a kind of geometrical progression the sentence to be passed after a previous conviction.

The reason for passing a more severe sentence in the case of a criminal with a previous conviction is primarily to protect society from the predations and offences committed by an habitual rogue, who has shown no signs of repentance. But there is a large number of men who commit offences more than once, but do not seek to live by crime. These seem to me to stand on a different footing from the professional criminal. On the other hand, a man may have few if any previous convictions and may yet be a dangerous criminal whose powers of mischief need curtailment by a long sentence. I think that a Magistrate or Judge should make some inquiry into the repute and antecedent behaviour of a man whom he proposes to sentence severely. This could be done after the evidence has been heard and the Court has come to a decision about his guilt. The Police Officer in charge of the station within the jurisdiction of which the prisoner resides, or the head-man of the village would be able to supply the necessary information. Po Nyein must have had previous convictions before the one now set out against him, as he was sentenced to four years under S. 379. He was released from jail in 1915, and has again committed two thefts in August 1917. His appeal is dismissed. The boats stolen by Po Tin were not of much value, but as it is in evidence at the countryside near the landing place from which they were removed, is one vast sheet of water, the thefts probably caused great inconvenience, if not less to the owners. His sentence is reduced to one of six months rigorous imprisonment on each charge to run consecutively.

Anklesaria—for Appellant.

Judgment.—The learned Judge of the District Court has dismissed the suit of the plaintiff-appellant firm, holding that the execution of the mortgage instrument is not proved. The circumstances attending the alleged execution, as set out in the judgment, give rise to strong suspicion of fraud and it is remarkable that though the mortgagor Azim is said to have died in 1909, a few months after the document was executed, and the mortgaged property passed into other hands, the mortgagees took no steps to enforce their mortgage rights in respect of either principal or interest for a period of seven years. But though we are inclined to agree with the remarks of the District Court as to the suspicious character of the whole transaction, we find that it is unnecessary to decide the question whether the mortgage should be held unproved on that ground alone. For there is a fatal defect on the face of the mortgage instrument and evidence called by the P. A. Firm to prove it. Under S. 59, T. P. Act, the mortgage instrument required for its validity the attestation of two witnesses. It purports to have been signed by two witnesses, Palaniappa Chetty and Virappa Chetty. Virappa was not called as a witness, and it is clear from the evidence that Palaniappa did not in fact witness the alleged execution by Azim at all. Palaniappa says that the document was brought to him at Pegu for signature and before signing it he was told by Azim that he had executed it. It must now be regarded as a well-established rule of law that mere acknowledgement of his signature by the executant is not sufficient; the witness must sign only after seeing the actual execution of the deed. Palaniappa was, therefore, not an attestation witness as contemplated by law. The document is not only inadmissible in evidence under S. 68, Evidence Act, but owing to the want of two attestation witnesses under S. 59, Transfer of Property Act, did not effect a mortgage at all. The provisions of S. 59 are imperative, and although the effect was not noticed in the lower Court

[we are bound to take cognizance of it. On these grounds the appeal is dismissed. K.N./R.K. Appeal dismissed.]

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 350—Scope and object stated—Right when claimed must be granted.

The right of claiming a trial de novo on the transfer of a Magistrate is given to an accused person in order that he may have the very great benefit of the Trying Magistrate having the witnesses examined and cross-examined in his presence, so that he may see and note their demeanour and manner of giving evidence. When the right is claimed the Magistrate must recommence the trial.

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 350—Trial de novo claimed—Prosecution witnesses only cross-examined their previous statements being read—No fresh charge or examination—Requirements of S. 350 are not satisfied.

In a criminal trial the Magistrate was transferred after the prosecution evidence was heard and a charge framed. The accused claimed a trial de novo before the succeeding Magistrate. Thereupon the witnesses were re-summoned, their statements were read over to them and they were further cross-examined. No fresh charge was framed nor was the accused examined by the Magistrate.

Judgment.—This case has been referred by the District Magistrate. The evidence was heard and a charge framed and all but one witness for the defence were examined by Maung Shin. He was then transferred and Mr. . . . took up the case. The accused exercised his right to have all the witnesses re-summoned and re-heard. They were re-summoned but they were not re-heard. Their statements were merely read over to them and they were then further cross-examined. No fresh charge was framed nor was the accused examined by Mr. . . . This is clearly no compliance with the law. The right is given to an accused person in order that he may have the very great benefit of the Magistrate having the witnesses examined and cross-examined in his presence, so that he may see and note their demeanour and manner of giving evidence. When the right is so claimed, the Magistrate must recommence the trial: King Emperor v. Naga Pe (1). In Sobh Nait Singh v. Emperor (2) the facts were the same as in the present case and it was held that the provisions of S. 350, Criminal P. C., were not duly complied with and further that it was impossible to say that the accused had not been materially prejudiced. A re-trial was ordered. With this I entirely agree. It is urged that the accused has been very lightly sentenced to fine only and that if a re-trial is ordered he may be convicted again and sentenced to imprisonment and that if so, he would be materially prejudiced. I cannot assume that he would be convicted nor that if he is, he would be imprisoned, and the mere fact that he may be, has nothing to do with the matter before me. A direct contravention of an express provision of law has been committed and is an illegality. This being so, S. 537 cannot cure the defect: Gomer Sirda v. Queen-Empress (3). The convictions and sentences are set aside and a new trial is ordered.

Judgment.—This case illustrates the inconvenience which may be caused by a District Judge not bearing in mind the object of proceedings under the Probate and Administration Act. A sister applied for Letters of Administration to the estate of her deceased brother. He had no children of his body, but the father of the minor respondent acting as her guardian set up that she had been adopted by the appellant's brother and his wife. The District Judge framed one issue, "was Ma Chit Saw the adopted daughter of U Nge and Ma Saung?" He found in the affirmative and rejected the application. There were debts due to the deceased, the documents relating to which were apparently in the appellant's possession. As matters stand, no one can sue to recover those debts and some of them may have become barred by limitation. As stated in Jagannath Prasad Gupta v. Runjit Singh (1), the object of proceedings under the Probate and Administration Act is to determine only the question of representation of the deceased for the purpose of administering the estate, and not for the purpose of determining any question of inheritance. In Ma Tak v. Ma Thi (2) a Bench of this Court warned District Courts against entering into questions of adoption in proceeding under the Act, pointing out that the rulings up to that time were to the effect that any decision on such a question under the Act was not final and would not operate as res judicata in any subsequent suit in which the party dissatisfied with the decision might raise the same question. The later case of Lalit Mohan Das v. Radha Ramau Saha (3) is to the same effect. A decision in such proceedings being practically ineffective, it is waste of time and labour to take evidence about the adoption. The present case was a simple one. The applicant was admittedly a sister of the deceased, and nothing against her character was alleged. S. 13 of the Act forbids Letters of Administration being granted to a minor, and there being no will and consequently no residuary legatee, Letters could not have been granted to the guardian of the minor even if he had applied for them.

Prima facie, the sister was a person under S. 23 of Act to whom Letters might be granted, but even if she, might as the result of litigation, turn out to have no right to any part of the estate in consequence of the minor having been adopted with right of inheritance, she was a person to whom Letters of Administration might have been granted under S. 41 of the Act. The order of the District Judge is set aside. He will issue Letters to the applicant in the case on her filing the proper court-fee and furnishing security. The respondent's guardian must pay the costs of the appellant on this appeal, two gold mohurs allowed as advocate's fee.

J. R. Das—for Appellant.

Leach—for Respondent.

Twomey, C. J.—The parties carried on business in Moulmein, one of the towns to which S. 69, T. P. Act, expressly extends, and on 19th December 1913, the plaintiff firm mortgaged certain immovable property to the defendant for Rupees 25,000 advanced and such further sums as might be advanced up to Rs. 75,000 in all. The mortgage instrument allows redemption on payment of principal and that interest shall be paid monthly. It also gives the mortgagee a power of sale to be exercised "at any time" and provides that if the power is exercised, the sale-proceeds after meeting the incidental expenses shall be applied to pay and satisfy the moneys which shall then be owing upon the security of the mortgage, any surplus being paid to the mortgagor. To the power of sale is annexed a proviso that "the power of sale shall not be exercised unless a default shall be made in payment of the said principal sum or the interest thereof."

As the interest was not paid monthly and was heavily in arrear, the defendant (mortgagee) threatened in February 1917 to exercise his power of sale. The plaintiff firm (mortgagor) then brought this suit for an injunction to restrain the defendant from exercising the power of sale. The District Court has dismissed the suit and the plaintiff firm now appeals to this Court. Their main contention is that in India a power of sale under the mortgage must conform with the provisions of S. 69, T. P. Act, and that the power contemplated in that section is not exercisable unless there has been a default in payment of the principal money, which cannot occur until the period allowed for redemption has expired. I think the first part of this contention is correct but not the rest. The section clearly contemplates the exercise of the power of sale when interest amounting to Rs. 500 at least is in arrear and unpaid for three months after becoming due. "Default of payment of loan mortgage money" in the Para. 1 of the section would include default of payment of interest, for the term "mortgage money" is defined in S. 58 as the principal money and interest of which payment is secured, and thus it appears that "mortgage money" includes interest as principal is. The use of the conjunction "and" does not imply that the term "mortgage money" is applicable only to principal and interest in combination. In my opinion it is not to be held that there is anything in the section inconsistent with the exercise of the power of sale prior to the expiration of the period allowed for redemption. We have been referred to the ruling of the Privy Council in Venkatachandra Iyengar v. Venkata Lakshmanal (1). The mortgage instrument in that case had a clause giving a power of sale which was exercisable if any "obstruction" was caused by the mortgagor in respect of the conditions in the mortgage, and it was held that in the event of such obstruction the mortgagee could sell the property before the expiry of 12 years, the period of redemption, and could pay himself from the sale-proceeds the full amount of principal and interest, not merely the interest then due but interest also for the unexpired portion of the term of 12 years.

It was held that this clause was in the nature of a penalty and could not be enforced; but that is a different thing from saying where the deed gives a power of sale on default of payment of interest, that the mortgagee cannot exercise it to the extent of recovering the full amount of principal and the interest due up to the time of the suit unless the period allowed for redemption has expired. In the Privy Council case the clause was held to be in the nature of a penalty only because it provided for the recovery of interest for the period which had still to run. If the Privy Council ruling gave rise to any doubt on the subject, it has been set at rest by S. 69, T. P. Act, which, as noted above, clearly contemplates the exercise of the power of sale even if there has as yet been no default in respect of payment of the principal money. We have, however, to consider whether the mortgage instrument in this suit does in fact provide for the power of sale on default of payment of interest alone and for the recovery of the full amount of principal and interest up to date in the event of such defendant. The power of sale is to be exercised according to the instrument "at any time" on default of payment of "principal or interest." The provision in the deed as to the disposal of the sale-proceeds shows that when the power of sale is exercised, not only the interest which is in arrears but also the principal amount secured is to be recoverable from the sale-proceeds. The mortgagee is to take the moneys which shall then be "owing on the security of the mortgage." Although the principal money could not in ordinary circumstances be demanded till 31st December 1919, still it is a debt and is owing to the mortgagee from the time when the money was actually advanced to the mortgagor.

It is true that the exercise of the power of sale before 31st December 1919 has the effect of defeating the express provision for re-conveyance on payment of principal and interest on that date. But the document must be taken as a whole and it appears to me that the parties clearly intended the right of redemption on 31st December 1919 to be dependent on punctual payment of the monthly interest as it fell due in the meantime. I can see no reason why the Courts should not give effect to this intention. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal with costs.

Judgment.—San Hla Baw Mi sued Khorow Nissa, wife of Kalathan deceased, Mi Shora Bi, Kalathan's daughter, and three minor children of defendant 1 for recovery of Rs. 120 said to be the balance rent due on a lease executed by Kalathan on 9th May 1913. The suit was filed in the Township Court of Rathedaung on 25th November 1915. Neither party was assisted in the Township Court by an Advocate in the trial in which, as the District Judge has remarked, the evidence was recorded in a somewhat perfunctory way without any attempt being made to test the credibility of the witnesses. The Township Judge decreed the claim. The decision was reversed on appeal to the District Court, Akyab. On second appeal to this Court exception has been taken to the nature of the judgment written by the learned District Judge. He commences his judgment by saying:

"This is a typical 'San Hla Baw' case. He wants really to get a decree for certain land standing in some one else's name; so he brings a suit, something like two years after it is due, for rent against the heirs of the late owner . . . His ways of business are, I know, very slipshod, and usually sail very close to the wind. . . . San Hla Baw, of course, is a convicted perjurer and a man who by his own admission is prepared to swear to anything to gain time when he is pressed."

The Judge also refers to the evidence of Tha Kaing who he states, is a man who to his own knowledge is accustomed to give evidence on behalf of San Hla Baw. He describes Tha Kaing as San Hla Baw's creature. It is urged in the appeal to this Court that the Judge was not justified in making remarks about the characters of the witnesses, when such characters were not established by any evidence on the record but were matters of personal knowledge of the Judge. In Bamundoss Mookerjee v. Mt. Tarine (1) their Lordships of the Privy Council observe as follows:

"An observation, however, is made by the Sudder Dewanny Court, that the Zillah Judge, with respect to two of the attesting witnesses has spoken of them from his own knowledge, as being what he calls 'professional-witnesses,' persons of no character, and, therefore, entitled to no credit whatever. He does not say that as we understand him, from his own personal knowledge of the parties, as being in the habit of coming before his Court. Now, the Judges in the Sudder Dewanny Court have passed a severe censure upon the Zillah Judge, for making that observation. Their Lordships think it right to say that in that censure they do not at all concur. It is of great importance that the Judge should know the character of the parties, and it is of great advantage to the decision of the case, that it is heard by a Judge acquainted with the character of the parties produced as witnesses, who is capable, therefore, of forming an opinion upon the credit due to them."

Again in Mahomed Buksh Khan v. Hosseini Bibi (2) their Lordships say that they thought the Subordinate Judge was right in relying on the evidence of the Sub Registrar and of the Mukhtar, with whose character the Subordinate Judge seemed to have been acquainted:

"The Subordinate Judge says he holds a diploma, and is a respectable person in his community, and the Court has never seen any act of his by which it can suspect him."

These cases are sufficient authority for justifying a Judge in using his knowledge about the character of the parties to come to a decision upon the credit to be attached to their evidence or the case set up by them. On the other hand, it has been laid down by their Lordships in Hurpurshad v. Sheo Dyal (3) that a Judge cannot, without giving evidence as a witness, import into a case his own knowledge of particular facts. Their Lordships appear to draw the distinction between the conclusion drawn from the knowledge of a Judge about the general character and position of the parties and their witnesses and his knowledge regarding any particular facts connected with the facts in issue in the case. I am of opinion, therefore that the District Judge was justified in alluding to his experience of San Hla Baw's litigation in his Court and in declining to believe in the bona fides of the class of the cases launched by him, many or others of which had been found to be false, unless the case was supported by evidence that left no doubt in the mind of the Judge about its credibility.

First Appeal No. 103 of 1917, Decided on 23rd May 1918, against J. C. of Dist. Judge, Hanthawaddy, in Civil Regular No. 32 of 1916.

Contract Act (9 of 1872), S. 16—Gift by lady to nephew working as agent—Undue influence can not be presumed.

Where a Buddhist lady made a gift of some land to her nephew who was also acting as her agent:

Held: that although there was what may be called a fiduciary relationship between the parties it was not such as would lead the Court to infer undue influence. [P. 65 C 2]

P. N. Chari—for Respondent.

Judgment—The plaintiffs appellants Mg. San U and his wife Ma Byaw sued for a declaration of title in respect of two pieces of paddy land and for possession of the lands and mesne profits. These two pieces of land together with two houses were given on 28th May 1912 by a registered document to the plaintiffs by Ma Byaw's aunt Ma Leik and possession was given to the donees. Ma Leik died about July 1914. The defendant Ma Thaung Me was the adopted daughter of Ma Leik and her husband U Po, who predeceased Ma Leik in April 1911, i. e., about a year before the date of the gift. When U Po died Ma Thaung Me applied for Letters of Administration to his estate and the widow Ma Leik, Ma Thaung Me's adoptive mother, opposed the application and denied the adoption. The Letters of Administration were granted to Ma Leik. Ma Thaung Me then instituted a suit to have her adoption recognized and she was successful in that suit. In execution of her decree for costs against Ma Leik, Ma Thaung Me attached one of the houses which had been given to Mg. San U and Ma Byaw. Mg. San U and Ma Byaw applied for removal of the attachment as donees and subsequently sued for a declaration of title to the house in the Subdivisional Court of Twanta. They succeeded in that suit and Ma Thaung Me's appeal to the Divisional Court and her second appeal to this Court were dismissed.

Then the present plaintiffs brought this present suit for possession of the two pieces of land against Ma Thaung Me, who had obtained possession from the administrator pendente lite of Ma Leik's estate. The learned District Judge, after examining various rulings of the Indian High Courts on the subject of undue influence, has come to the conclusion that Mg. San U being in a position of active confidence towards Ma Leik the burden of proving that no undue influence was exercised by him lay on him and that he has not satisfactorily discharged the burden, as she has not shown that at any time either before or after the making of the gift on 28th May 1912 Ma Leik had any independent advice from anybody conversant with the full facts of the case. He decided therefore that the gift was avoidable by Ma Leik and after her death by her legal representative Ma Thaung Me, the defendant.

The execution of the deed of gift is clearly established and it is also clear that the donor was at that time in full possession of her faculties, though she was then a very old woman. San U had a power of attorney from Ma Leik and was acting as her agent from the time of her husband's death in 1911 until she died in 1914. He had to transact all Ma Leik's business in Court. He and his wife lived with Ma Leik up to time of the gift but when the gift was made, Ma Leik went to live in another house with her sister Ma Hla. San U however continued to look after the property of her. During the two years which elapsed between the time of the gift and Ma Leik's death in 1914 she took no steps to revoke the gift and in January 1914 she gave evidence that she had made a gift. It is clear that Ma Leik fell out with her adopted daughter Ma Thaung Me, though it does not appear whether their first disagreement was prior to the gift of 1912 or not. The learned Judge remarks that Ma Leik's dislike of Ma Thaung Me may have been due to the fact that Ma Thaung Me had neglected her adoptive parents for some years. Ma Thaung Me admits that she left U Po's house about two years before his death in 1911, that she saw him afterwards only once and she was not present at his funeral. As the learned Judge remarks, there is no need in the circumstances to presume any undue influence as accounting for the favour shown to Mg. San U and Ma Byaw. The donor's estrangement from her adopted daughter Ma Thaung Me and the desire to prevent her from getting the lands after Ma Leik's death would be sufficient to account for Ma Leik's action in making the gift to Mg. San U and Ma Byaw, whom she probably regarded with as much affection as if they were her own children. In setting aside the gift the learned Judge was influenced by the fact that the relationship of principal and agent existed between Ma Leik and San U. He considered that they stood to one another in such a fiduciary relationship that San U was bound to prove the good faith of the transaction under S. 111, Evidence Act, by showing that Ma Leik had independent advice. It has been pointed out in the case of Maung Pu v. Lucy Moss (1) that under the English law there is no presumption of undue influence in the case of a gift to a son, grandson or son-in-law even if made during the donor's illness and a few days before his death and that the Indian law in this respect would be the same. In Coomber, In re, Coomber v. Coomber (2) there was a gift by a mother to her son who had managed her business for her and collected her rents. The learned Judges decided that although there was what might be called a fiduciary relationship between the mother and the son, it was not such relationship as would lead the Court to infer undue influence and that the burden of proof did not lie upon the donee. We do not consider that the present case is one in which the plaintiffs were bound to show that Ma Leik had independent advice. It is sufficient that she knew perfectly well what she was doing, that she had a clear motive for it and that she abided by her act for the remaining two years of her life.

It was pleaded in para. 2 of the written statement of Ma Thaung Me that Ma Leik at the time of the gift was the owner of the property subject to the rights of Ma Thaung Me as Auresa child and that in any case therefore the gift should be held valid only to the extent of Ma Leik's interest in the property. But it would follow from the ruling in the Full Bench case of Ma Sein Ton v. Ma Son (3) that on the death of a father the eldest daughter can possibly claim a quarter share of the joint property of her parents. At the hearing of this appeal Mr. Chari for the respondent expressly waived Ma Thaung Me's claim to a share as Aurasa child set up in the defendant's written statement.

We find that the gift to the plaintiffs-appellants was valid; the decree of the District Court will be set aside, and there will be a declaration in favour of the plaintiffs that they are the absolute owners of the two pieces of land referred to in the plaint and for possession of the said lands. The question of mesne profits from 1913-1914 onwards has not been decided and the defendant-respondent's Advocate in the District Court expressly stated that the claim for mesne profits as set forth in the plaint was not admitted. The case must therefore be remanded to the District Court for inquiry as to the amount of the mesne profits and when the amount is determined the District Judge will thereupon grant a decree on the amount so determined with costs. The defendant-respondent will pay the plaintiffs-appellants costs in all Courts.

Second Appeal No. 40 of 1916, Decided on 15th March 1917.

(a) Practice — Appellate Court disposing of case on point raised by itself commits error of law.

(b) Negotiable Instruments Act (1881), S. 87 — Difference of ink does not amount to material alteration — Altering a figure does not amount to forgery.

It is absolutely wrong to say that because a man alters a figure in a document, he thereby forges the document, or because there is something in a different ink to the rest of the document, there must be a material alteration of the document. [P 70 C 1]

J. R. Das—for Appellant.

Doctor—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The suit was by the appellant for the recovery of Rs. 1,720 principal and interest alleged to be due on a promissory note for Rs. 1,000, dated 26th June 1914. The respondent replied that the promissory note sued on was a forgery and that on that date he borrowed, not Rs. 1,000, but only Rs. 100 for which he executed a promissory note and that he had paid off what was due on the same. He produced what he alleged to be the promissory note for Rs. 100. The trial Court dismissed the suit on the ground that it was not satisfied that the plaintiff had proved his claim. The plaintiff appealed to the Divisional Court which confirmed the decree of the trial Court. There is on the record much evidence on both sides. But the learned Divisional Judge apparently found it unnecessary to consider it, as he had seized on what he apparently considered to be a matter which helped to dispose of the suit without calling for further evidence or explanation. It was a matter which he himself discovered and from it he drew his own inferences without giving the party against whom he drew the inferences an opportunity of explaining the matter. I will now quote the learned Judge's words to show how he made the discovery:

"while the case was being argued in this Court, I noticed that the last figure in the number 1,000 and the dash at the end of the number had the appearance of being in a different ink from the other figures of that number, so I sent for a glass and examined it carefully. On examination through my glass, it is seen beyond doubt that the last 0 and the dash have been added, and that the note as originally written was one for Rs. 100 and not Rs. 1,000."

The learned Judge then proceeded to hold that that part of the defendant's story where he said he borrowed only Rs. 100 is true but the note he produced was a forgery and that the note he executed was the note sued on, which however the plaintiff had forged by altering the figure "100" into the figure "1,000". He further held that it followed that the defence that the defendant repaid the loan must also be false. Both sides were therefore guilty of perjury and forgery but the plaintiff could not get a decree even for the amount held to have been borrowed by the defendant, as he had materially altered his pro-note. Now the learned Judge has worked out all this upon the basis of the plaintiff having made the alteration in question. What he held may be put in a few words: the plaintiff altered his note, therefore he is guilty of forgery; the alteration is material, therefore the note becomes void by reason of that. It is apparent that his views are based upon assumptions which have not been put down in black and white. But I may say in passing that it is satisfactory to note that he has not done so, for I am going to remand the case for further evidence. In my judgment it is absolutely wrong to say that because a man alters a figure in a document, he thereby forges the document, or because there is something in a different ink to the rest of the document, there must be a material alteration. It is obvious that it is not fair to resort to this train of reasoning without giving the party affected thereby a reasonable opportunity of meeting it. What appears at first sight to be suspicious may be capable of a satisfactory explanation and to use a homely saying, circumstances often alter cases.

For the above reasons, I will order that the case be remanded to the trial Court upon the following issue: How did it happen that the last figure "0" in the number 1,000 and the dash at the end of the number have the appearance of being in a different ink from the other figures of that number? The trial Court will record such evidence as is offered by the parties on the issue and return the proceedings together with its findings through the Divisional Court, which will make any remarks it may think proper upon the findings of the trial Court. This order is justified by the cases of Kristamma Naidu v. Chapa Naidu (1), where it was expressly held by Collins, C. J., that a Judge who disposed of a suit on a point taken by himself on appeal, without affording the parties an opportunity of proving what was necessary to meet the point, was wrong in law. The question immediately before the Full Bench in that case was whether such an error was a ground for revision under S. 622, Civil P. C., which is S. 115 in the present Code. The other Judges went upon the assumption that the error was one of law without expressly saying so and discussed the applicability of S. 622 to the case.

First Appeal No. 110 of 1916, Decided on 23rd August 1917.

Evidence Act (1 of 1872), S. 92 (4)—Mortgage—Oral agreement to forego is inadmissible—No payment of principal—No application of Contract Act (9 of 1872), S. 63.

A mortgagee, desirous of getting in his outstanding debts, made an oral offer to the mortgagors that he would accept the principal money in full satisfaction of the mortgage debt foregoing the interest that had accrued for some three years. The mortgagors accepted the offer and tried to raise the money but they could not raise it and no tender of the principal money was made to the mortgagee:

Held: (1) that the oral agreement was inadmissible in evidence in view of the prov. 4, S. 92, Evidence Act; (2) that as there was no payment of the principal money, the provisions of S. 63, Contract Act, did not apply. (P 71 O 1)

Ormiston—for Appellants.J. R. Das—for Respondents.

Judgment.—This was a suit for the principal and interest due on a mortgage instrument. The appellants owed the defendant-respondent firm Rs. 10,000 on a registered instrument of mortgage executed in 1905, the stipulated rate of interest being 1/12 per cent. per mensem. The agent of the respondent firm at that time was Allagappa Chetty. It appears that a new agent Muthia being appointed in 1906 and Allagappa, being desirous of getting in the outstanding debts of the firm before going back to Madras, made an oral offer to the mortgagors that he would accept the principal money Rs. 10,000 in full satisfaction of the mortgage debt foregoing the interest that had accrued for some 3 years. The mortgagors accepted this offer and took some steps to raise the money. But they did not actually raise it and no tender of Rs. 10,000 was made. They explain that as there was a dispute between Allagappa and Muthia as to whether the defendant's outgoing or incoming agent should receive the money they, the mortgagors, told them to settle between themselves who was to receive it and as they did not settle this point, the money was never actually paid. Some years later, before the institution of the suit the agent Muthia demanded the money from the plaintiffs appellants but they declined to pay him unless the former agent Allagappa came along too. In the mortgage instrument the mortgagee is mentioned as A. M. Allagappa Chetty, but it was not disputed in the written statement or apparently at the hearing of the suit that it was a mortgage to the A. M. Firm of which Allagappa was the agent at the time and of which Muthia is the present agent.

The learned Judge on the Original Side has granted a decree for the full amount of principal and interest as claimed in the plaint, holding that the mortgagors failed to carry out their part of the oral arrangement of 1908 and cannot now rely upon that arrangement as absolving them from payment of interest. In my opinion this view is clearly correct. The arrangement was that the principal money should be paid in cash at once or at any rate while the two agents were making over and taking over charge. The defendants-appellants cannot now avail themselves of the excuse that the two Chetties were unable to agree among themselves which of them was to receive the money. It was open to the mortgagors to deposit the money in Court under S. 83, T. P. Act, or at least to tender the money to one or other of the two agents. They did not tender the money at all and did not even raise the amount required. By their own want of diligence they lost the opportunity which had been given to them of obtaining a discharge in full by prompt payment of the principal money.

I agree also in the learned Judge's remark that evidence as to the oral agreement of 1908 was really inadmissible in view of the provisions of S. 92, Prov. 4, Evidence Act. The appellants' learned counsel refers to S. 63, Contract Act, as showing that an oral agreement to forego interest can be enforced. If the mortgagors had actually paid up the principal money at the time and had thereupon obtained a discharge in full of the mortgage debt, they could doubtless under S. 63, Contract Act, rely on such discharge as a good defence if the mortgagees were afterwards to sue them for the interest. But in the present case there was no such payment and no such discharge and the provisions of S. 63, Contract Act, cannot, in my opinion, affect the application of S. 92, Evidence Act, to the oral agreement, which was not carried out. The application is dismissed with costs.

Secondary evidence of a lost unregistered document affecting an interest in immovable property and therefore required to be registered is not admissible as evidence of any transaction affecting such property but such evidence is admissible to prove the document so far as it evidences an oral agreement not affecting the land or any interest in land. [P 72 C 1]

Lambert—(for Applicant).

Moung Thin—(for Opposite Party).

Judgment.—In 1910 the plaintiff-appellant advanced Rs. 450 to the parents of the respondent in consideration of being put into possession of certain land, and it was agreed that the plaintiff should take the profits in lieu of interest. The transaction was reduced to writing but not registered. In 1915 the plaintiff had to give up possession to the respondent because the document not having been registered, the plaintiff had no right or interest in the land and therefore had no legal right to possession. The plaintiff then instituted this suit in September 1915 asking for a money-decree for the Rs. 450. In the Township Court the plaintiff obtained a decree; in the District Court plaintiff's suit was dismissed on the ground that the plaintiff was prevented from proving the agreement under which he obtained possession by Ss. 49 and 17, Registration Act. The plaintiff applies in revision on the ground that the District Court wrongly rejected that evidence. S. 17 requires this document to be registered. S. 49 says:

"No document requiring under S. 17 to be registered shall affect any immovable property comprised therein, or be received as evidence of any transaction affecting such property."

The document in the present suit has been lost but if the plaintiff could not prove that document if available, he would be debarred from proving it by secondary evidence. But the plaintiff does not rely upon that document to prove any transaction affecting the land. He does not claim that he ever had any legal right to the possession of the land under that document. That he is entitled to use that document as evidence of an oral agreement which does not affect the land or any interest in the land has been held by all the High Courts of India: vide, Ulfatunnissa v. Hosain Khan (1) and in this Court Myat Thin v. P. C. V. E. Kasu Visvanathan Chetty (2). The District Judge, therefore, wrongly held that that evidence was inadmissible. From this judgment it appears that he concurs with the Township Judge in the findings of fact, if this evidence was admissible, i. e., that the plaintiff advanced Rs. 450 to the defendant's parents in 1910 and obtained possession and received the profits in lieu of interest and was dispossessed in 1915. That being so, plaintiff is entitled to a decree for Rs. 450 against the respondent in her representative capacity with costs in both Courts, and three gold mohurs for the costs of this application.

Vakharia—for Respondent.

Twomey, C. J.—These appeals which were heard together arise out of two suits in which the plaintiffs-respondents (1) Messrs. Walker and Whyte, Ltd., and (2) Mr. and Mrs. Bruce claimed damages from the defendant-respondent Mg. Kyaw Zin on account of a collision between Kyaw Zin's motor launch "Handy" and Walker and Whyte's "Triad" on the evening 7th January 1915 in the Kanoungto Creek. The Triad's bows were smashed and she sunk and Mr. and Mrs. Bruce who were crossing in the Triad to the Rangoon side had to swim for their lives. The collision was admittedly caused by the negligence of Haidayut Ali, the Serang of the Handy. His certificate was afterwards suspended and he was also prosecuted and punished under the Penal Code. Kyaw Zin, the owner of the Handy, lives at Kya In, a village in the delta about 7 hour's journey from Pyapon. The launch was used by him to ply with goods and passengers in the delta. He sent it in July 1914 to Messrs. G. Nichols and Co., Marine Contractors, Rangoon, to have a new engine put in. In November Nichols wrote that the new engine was ready and asked Kyaw Zin to send Rs. 4,000, the amount agreed upon. Kyaw Zin sent his young cousin Klai Po to Rangoon to pay the money and bring the launch to Pyapon. She was not brought back at once. She was hired out with a crew of a Serang and engine driver, first to the Arracan Co. for 18 days at Rs. 500 a month and subsequently to Messrs. Steel Bros., Ltd., at Rs. 15 a day. She had been only for 2½ days with Steel Bros. when the accident occurred.

The plaintiff's case in both suits is that Klai Po was Kyaw Zin's agent, that the crew were engaged by Klai Po, that the launch was hired out by Nichols as broker for Klai Po to Steel Bros. and that Kyaw Zin is responsible as owner of the launch and as Klai Po's principal for the results of the Serang's negligence. The defendant-respondent Kyaw Zin has not been consistent in his defence. In a letter, Ex. 5, written by his legal adviser Mr. Broadbent two months after the accident, it is said that Klai Po without authority from Kyaw Zin hired out the launch to Nichols and that it was Nichols who engaged the crew and that he let out the launch on his own account to the Arracan Co. and afterwards to Steel Bros. In his written statement Kyaw Zin takes up a different position, viz., that Nichols having possession of the launch hired it out without any authority. The written statement does not refer to Klai Po at all. When examined at the hearing Kyaw Zin at first said that Klai Po came back to Kya in December for a few days and left word that he had hired out the launch to Nichols, but when the evidence was read over to Kyaw Zin he altered this statement and said Klai Po left word merely that "Nichols had hired out the launch." Klai Po in his evidence said that Nichols asked him to hire the launch to him but that they did not agree about the rate of hiring. He denied that the Serang and engine driver were engaged by him and denied also that the launch was hired by his authority to Steel Bros. The learned Judge found that it was Klai Po who engaged the crew and also that Klai Po hired out the launch to Steel Bros. through Nichols as broker. But the Judge held that Klai Po was employed by Kyaw Zin merely as a clerk and that he had no authority to hire out the launch and that in hiring it out he acted beyond the scope of his employment. The Judge added:

"To hold otherwise means to hold that he had powers of management and was in fact the agent of defendant for which there was no justification"

The plaintiffs' suits were, therefore, both dismissed.

It is urged for the defendant that this decision is right if it be assumed that the crew was engaged and the launch hired out by Klai Po, but we are asked to go further and hold on the evidence produced that Klai Po did not engage the crew and that if he did hire out the launch he hired it only to Nichols, who thereupon engaged the crew and sublet the launch on his own account. Klai Po is clearly not a truthful witness and Nichols has a strong motive for supporting the view that he himself acted merely as a broker. The documentary evidence is very much against defendant. Nichols' salary book Ex. R, which appears to be kept regularly, does not show that Haidavut Ali and Tha Maung the Serang and engine driver were employed by Nichols during the material period, November 1914 to January 1915. If these men were engaged by Nichols for the period in December when the launch was hired out to the Arracan Co. and the period in January when she was hired out to Steels, their names, salary and acquittances would probably appear in this book in the ordinary course of business. If it be true that Chinasawmy Pillay, who was at that time a clerk of Nichols, refers at the end of his evidence to another book, an "engagement book", as showing for what period Nichols' men were employed. But in an earlier part of his evidence this witness says there is no other establishment book except Ex. R and that this is the only book by which he could say who the employees were. This witness says that receipts for salary were sometimes taken on slips of paper and not in the book. He supports defendant's case that it was Nichols who engaged the crew and says that so far as he knows, Nichols had no authority from Klai Po to hire out the launch. But Chinasawmy is unfriendly to Nichols. He is now a rival in the stevedoring business.

He admits that he left Nichols partly "because he could not put up with his ways and manners" and that he afterwards wrote to a Liverpool firm, with which Nichols had business, a letter, Ex. Q, in which he tried to injure Nichols and get the English firm's business in Rangoon away from Nichols. It seems to me, Ex. R must be regarded as strong negative evidence against the defendant. Tha Maung (P. W. 8) himself said that he was engaged by the clerk Klai Po and worked for him as engine driver on the Haudy for over two months and was paid by him altogether Rs. 75 or Re. 80. But Tha Maung's evidence must be accepted with considerable reserve as he is a nephew of Mrs. Nichols. Klai Po admits that he paid Tha Maung Rs. 30 but says he took him on only after the collision. He admits, however, giving Tha Maung a certificate Ex. B on 1st February, in which he says that Tha Maung worked for him for three months. Then we have Ex. 5 in which there is a clear admission that Klai Po paid off the crew, though it is said that Nichols induced him to do so "taking full advantage of his simplicity and ignorance of business." Kyaw Zin gives Klai Po's age as 20; but Klai Po himself owns to nearly 24, and he has a fair knowledge of English as he passed the 8th standard. After the collision he signed the receipts Exs. D and E for the hire of the launch by the Arracan Co. and Steels and in each of these receipts the transaction appears as a hiring out by Nichols as broker on behalf of Maung Kyaw Zin. These are both signed "E. T. Klai Po, for Mg. Kyaw Zin."

We are asked to believe that this is only another instance of Nichols' superior cunning and Klai Po's ignorance and simplicity, but it is hardly likely that Klai Po signed the receipts without reading them and without noticing that Nichols figured in them merely as a broker. On the evidence there can be no reasonable doubt that it was Klai Po who engaged the crew and that Nichols was authorized by him to hire out the launch to the Arracan Co. and to Steels. It remains to consider whether the Judge was right in absolving the defendant on the ground that Klai Po acted beyond the scope of his employment in hiring out the launch through Nichols. The owner of a vessel is not liable qua owner for damage caused by the negligence of the crew. He is liable only as employer of the wrong-doer. The wrong-doer in this case, i. e. Serang was employed by Klai Po. The Judge considered that there was no justification for holding that Klai Po was an agent of the defendant. In this Court Mr. Vakbaria for the defendant does not go so far as this. He only urges that Klai Po in his capacity of clerk was an agent with strictly limited authority. I think it is for the owner to show clearly the character of Klai Po's agency and to prove that Klai Po exceeded his authority by hiring out the launch at Rangoon. The burden of proof on this point lay on the defendant according to the principle of S. 106. Evidence Act, for the character of Klai Po's authority was a matter specially within the principal's knowledge. We cannot rely on the evidence of either Kyaw or Klai Po. They have contradicted themselves and one another and their evidence conflicts in material particulars with the statements made on Kyaw Zin's instructions in Ex. 5.

It is clear on Ex. 5 that Klai Po was sent to Rangoon to take delivery of the launch and bring her to Pyapon, and Klai Po admits that he did bring her to Pyapon after the collision, having hired a Serang under Kyaw Zin's express instructions. Kyaw Zin has a brother Kya Zin also called Mg. Di, and Klai lives with the two brothers who are related to him as second cousins once removed, but he calls them both his "uncles." Kya Zin as well as Kyaw Zin had a launch. It was called the Admire. Klai Po admittedly looked after it. It was Klai Po who started negotiations with Nichols for the purchase of the Admire. He went to Pegu with Nichols and saw the launch there and liking the look of her took her to Kya Zin, who then bought her. After the collision Klai Po had the Handy repaired at Rangoon, meeting the costs of the repairs out of the money received from the Arracan Co. and Steels. During this time he also applied to the Port Commissioners on behalf of his principal Kyaw Zin for license to ply the launch for hire. The engine driver Tha Maung says that before returning to Pyapon after the collision the launch was again hired by a broker and taken to a village beyond Kyauntan and that Klai Po directed him, Tha Maung, to go there with the launch, but Klai Po denies this hiring also. After returning to Pyapon the launch was plied for about six months in the delta and Klai Po was on the launch during the greater part of this time.

According to Kyaw Zin he was on her for about five months out of the 6. Kyaw Zin says that Klai Po was on the launch to look after the money and that he was only acting as a clerk. Klai Po himself says that he did not act as a clerk and he does not say in what capacity he was on the launch, except that he washed the launch when it was dirty. He got no pay. It is a legitimate inference that at this time at any rate, i. e., after the collision, he was looking after the Handy for Kyaw Zin as he had previously looked after the Admire for Kya Zin. He was evidently regarded by the Police as the person in charge of the launch, for he was arrested and kept in custody for a week or more when the Handy collided with a Sampan in the delta. As a matter of fact it seems likely that Kya Zin and Kyaw Zin were in partnership in the launch business, though Klai Po says that they were only planning to work together. Klai Po wrote and signed several letters about the launches for both the brothers. Several letters are produced written by Klai Po and signed by him for Kyaw Zin. Exs. L,

M, N, O are signed "Kyaw Zin Bros." while one letter, Ex P, is signed "Mg. Kyaw Zin Sigun" Mg. Sagun being the father of the two brothers.

Kyaw Zin and Klai Po would have us believe that Klai Po's principal object in going to Rangoon was to get employment for himself and that Kyaw Zin seized the opportunity of his going to Rangoon to send the Rs. 400 to Nichols. It is clear, however, that Klai Po remained in Rangoon only as long as the launch was plying there and then returned with her to his village after carrying out the repairs rendered necessary by the collision and obtaining a plying license from the Port Commissioners. The admissions of the defendant and Klai Po and the circumstances are, in my opinion, entirely inconsistent with the view taken by the learned Judge as to the nature of Klai Po's employment. The facts appear to me to show that Klai Po, being the best educated member of the family, was entrusted with a wide degree of control at Rangoon in the absence of Kyaw Zin. The very fact that he was paid no salary is significant. Kyaw Zin deputed him to bring the launch from Rangoon, which would necessarily involve hiring a crew. When Nichols proposed that the launch should be hired out in Rangoon, it seems probable that Klai Po readily agreed to the proposal. The launch had admittedly been plying at a loss in Pyawon—vide Kyaw Zin's evidence—and the opportunity of lucrative employment at Rangoon would no doubt be acceptable to Kyaw Zin. Klai Po admits that he did not communicate Nichols' proposal to Kyaw Zin at all. He probably thought that there could be no doubt as to his principal's approval. When he went back to Kya In for a few days in December, he left word for Kyaw Zin who was absent that the launch was being hired out at Rangoon. Kyaw Zin says that after receiving this message he wrote to Klai Po to tell Nichols to send the launch back to Pyawon at once. But he admits that he did not write until two weeks after Klai Po's return to Rangoon and a week after his own return to Kya In. Klai Po, on the other hand, denies that he received any letter from Kyaw Zin, but says he did receive a verbal message from him on the day of the collision to the effect that the launch should be sent back.

It is clear at any rate that Kyaw Zin expressed no disapproval of the hiring out at Rangoon. When the plaintiffs demanded compensation through their lawyers, Kyaw Zin visited Mr. Bruce and asked him to let him off. So far from disclaiming responsibility for the accident he offered to give up his own launch, the Handy, and his brother's launch "Admire" by way of compensation. The inclusion of the Admire in this offer lends colour to the suggestion that the two brothers were really in partnership though it may have been that Kyaw Zin only counted on obtaining the consent of Kyaw Zin to sacrifice the Admire.

I would hold that the defendant failed entirely to prove that Klai Po was a mere clerk with no powers of management and that on the contrary the evidence is sufficient to show that Klai Po had considerable powers of control at Rangoon. He was sent there to bring the launch to Pyawon. He had to get a license from the Port Trust, to hire a crew, and to buy petrol for the launch. While at Rangoon he saw that it would be to his employer's benefit to hire out the launch there and that he did so apparently without consulting the owner or thinking it necessary to do so. But he was acting for the owner's benefit and he evidently considered it so much a matter of course that he did not inform Kyaw Zin of what he was doing until he went back to the village some weeks later, and even then he only left a casual message that the launch had been hired out at Rangoon. It is unlikely that Klai Po would have acted in this manner if his authority from Kyaw Zin was not wide enough to let out the launch at all. Kyaw Zin's inaction on hearing of the letting out, his apparent acquiescence in what Klai Po had done, suggests that Klai Po had in fact the necessary authority. The relations between Klai Po and his two uncles and the admissions of Klai Po as to his connexion with the Admire and the Handy strongly support this inference. It is instructive to remember that an interval of about three weeks elapsed between the time that Klai Po went to Rangoon for the launch and the time in December when he returned to the village for a few days. If he had no authority from Kyaw Zin except to go and fetch the launch, Kyaw Zin would probably have written or sent a message enquiring the reason of delay in bringing the launch to Pyapon. His inaction leads to the inference that he had constituted Klai Po his representative and agent for the purpose of dealing with the launch and that it was left to Klai Po either to bring the launch back at once or to deal otherwise with it as might seem profitable. The case falls within the general rule laid down by Willes, L. J., in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank (1):

"The general rule is, that the master is answerable for every such wrong of the servant or agent as is committed in the course of the service and for the master's benefit, though no express command or privity of the master be proved. That principle is acted upon every day in running down cases. It has been applied also to direct trespass to goods, as in the case holding the owners of ships liable for the act of masters abroad improperly selling the cargo. It has been held applicable to actions of false imprisonment, in cases where officers of Railway Companies, entrusted with the execution of bye-laws relating to imprisonment, and intending to act in the course of their duty, improperly imprisoned persons who are supposed to come within the terms of the bye-law. It has been acted upon where persons employed by the owners of boats to navigate them and to take fares have committed an infringement of a ferry, or such like wrong. In all these cases it may be said, as it was said here, that the master has not authorized the act. It is true, he has not authorized the particular act, but he has put the agent in his place to do that class of acts, and he must be answerable for the manner in which the agent has conducted himself in doing the business which it was the act of his master to place him in."

I would set aside the decree of the Original Side in both cases and would record a finding in favour of the plaintiff on issue 1 and remand the suits for further enquiry as to the amount of damages in each case and for final disposal. The costs of the appellants in this Court should be borne in both cases by the defendant.

Special Second Appeal No. 98 of 1916, Decided on 13th November 1917.

General Clauses Act (10 of 1897), S. 3 (25) —Pugmill created and affixed to earth is immovable property.

Where a pugmill is erected and affixed to the earth it is immovable property within the meaning of S. 3 (25), General Clauses Act. [P 76 C 2]

Ray—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The facts of this case are fully set out in the judgment of the lower appellate Court. It is contended on second appeal that it has been wrongly decided by that Court that a pugmill is movable property, and that even if this contention is unsound, the Judge should have applied Art. 49, Lim. Act, and passed a decree for the value of the Mill. Immovable property is defined in the General Clauses Act 10 of 1897 as including things attached to the earth. Before a pugmill can be worked, its posts have to be imbedded in the earth in order to keep it stationary, and unless it was fixed in this manner, it would be of no use. In Miller v. Brindaban (1) it was held that things such as steam engines and boilers seized in execution of a decree were fixtures and not goods and chattels. In Hobson v. Gorringe (2) it was decided that a gas engine affixed to the freehold by bolts and screws to prevent it from rocking, was sufficiently annexed to the earth to become a fixture. The learned Judge thinks that there is no distinction between the affixing of a pugmill to the land and that of a tent or plane table. In the case of a plane table, there does not seem to me to be any difficulty in drawing a distinction, as any one using it has no intention of attaching it to the earth. Whether a tent could be said to be attached to the earth would, I think, depend on the circumstance of the case. But here the pugmill is erected and affixed to the earth for the purpose of making a quantity of bricks, and I have no doubt that it should be regarded as immovable property. It is conceded that if the pugmill is immovable property, the suit is in time. The only other question for decision is the amount of damages to be awarded for wrongful attachment. The plaintiff valued the pugmill at Rs. 150, which is about the cost when the mill is new. The mill had been in use for sometime before its attachment, and the claim for its full value is excessive. Mr. Doctor agrees to my estimating the value at any figure I think proper. I allow Rs. 75 for the pugmill. Mr. Doctor also waives the claim for attending fees, and there is no proof that the plaintiff spent Rs. 41 4-0 in attending

Court in connexion with the proceedings for the removal of attachment. I accordingly set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court and pass a decree for Rs. 75 plus Rs. 120-2-0 costs ordered in Civil Miscellaneous Case No. 20 of 1914 of the Sub-divisional Court, Pyn. The defendant-respondent will pay two-thirds of the costs throughout.

Regular Civil Suit No. 116 of 1917. Decided on 10th June 1918.

(a) Contract Act (9 of 1872), S. 23—Agreement not to bid against each other is not void.

An agreement between two persons not to bid against each other at an auction is not necessarily illegal or against public policy. [P 79 C 2]

(b) Contract Act (9 of 1872), S. 23—Void agreement not carried out—Money paid can be recovered—When is such contract executed, stated—Authority to stake holder to pay money can be revoked before it is paid out.

If two parties enter into an illegal contract and money is paid upon it by one to the other it may be recovered back before the execution of the contract but not afterwards. In the case of persons entering into such a contract and paying money to a stake-holder, if the event happens and the money is paid over without dispute, that is considered as a complete execution of the contract and the money cannot be reclaimed, but if the event has not happened, the money may be recovered. [P 81 C 1, 2]

Authority given to a stake-holder to pay over money in respect of an unlawful transaction may be revoked at any time before it has been actually paid, even if it has been credited in account to the other party. [P 81 C 2]

Judgment.—In this suit one Ah Foke originally sought to recover from the Chetty firm of P. M. A. Nagappa Chetty the sums of Rs. 5,000 and Rs. 4,000, which he alleged that he had deposited with him on 2nd April 1917 with interest. The Chetty replied denying that the deposit had been made by the plaintiff and alleging that it had been deposited by one Li Kut Chaung in the plaintiff's presence and had been returned to him (Li Kut Chaung) five days later. The plaintiff then obtained leave to amend and add Li Kut Chaung. Li Kut Chaung in turn put in a written statement pleading, as the Chetty had also pleaded, that it was he who deposited the amount and not the plaintiff. On or about 18th April 1918 plaintiff again applied and was allowed to amend. His amendment consisted in explaining the circumstances of the alleged deposit, namely, that the deposit was a bribe to be paid to defendant 2 (a) if he obtained from bidding at the auction of liquor licenses for Hlauza Liquor Licenses Nos 2 and 3 and (b) if plaintiff obtained these licenses for a certain sum not specified in the pleading. He stated that these sums were deposited with Nagappa as stake-holder—he being known to both parties, but that licenses were knocked to him at much higher figures, and that consequently he was entitled to the return of his money. Defendant 1 replied denying all knowledge of the above facts, and maintaining that the money had been deposited by defendant 2.

Defendant 2 also put in another written statement in which he denied the plaintiff's allegations and in his evidence explained that the deposit had indeed been made with a view to prevent his competition, but had been made by himself as an instalment towards a quarter share in a partnership in the two licenses, and that the arrangement was that he was to be a partner if the licenses went for less than a big and less than Rs. 85,000 respectively. The licenses as a matter of fact were knocked down for Rs. 1,05,000 and Rs. 75,100 and so he considered the bargain off and went and withdrew the money. It also transpired in the evidence that Ah Foke was a partner with one Li Kan Shu in the purchase of No. 2 and that both were partners with one Wong King in the purchase of No. 3, and that Wong King had supplied Rs. 2,000 out of the Rs. 4,000 alleged to have been deposited for No. 3, while Li Kan Shu and Ah Foke had supplied the Rs. 5,000 for No. 2 and the other moiety of Rs. 2,000 for No. 3. No question of non-joinder, however, was raised and any such point must be taken as waived. Now having regard to the flat contradiction of the plaintiff's story by that of defendant 2 two points at once leap into prominence, (a) that the Chetty, an impartial person, trusted by both, with no apparent object but to do the right had paid defendant 2 and (b) that whichever had paid the Rs. 9,000 ought to be able to produce accounts showing that he had taken from his shop or borrowed from his Chetty the sum in question. The plaintiff tendered such an account, but it was promptly objected that in his affidavit of documents he had sworn so far back as July 1917 that he had no account or book of account relating to the matter.

When, therefore, as soon as the case came on for hearing he at once tried to put a book of this vital importance in evidence, which the other side relying upon his affidavit had never inspected, I declined to admit it, and had it not been for the fact that Wong King produced his own cash book in which an entry dated 2nd April 1917 occurred showing Rupees 2,000 as paid "for backshish for peace in the license", matters would in my judgment have gone hard with the plaintiff.

No objection was taken either to the admissibility or to the genuineness of this latter document, and it was therefore, admitted, though having regard to what had happened with regard to plaintiff's books, it cannot be said to have the weight that it otherwise would, for Ah Foke and Wong King are partners. Technically there may have been no ground for objecting to its admissibility, but defendants had no real opportunity of considering its genuineness and unless we assume that there was inexplicable negligence on the plaintiff's part when he swore he had no relevant entries in his account books, the ones that he produced were not genuine and if so, why should those of his partner be. Carelessness, however, may be the answer. Let us turn to defendant 2. No affidavit of documents was ever called for from him, and therefore, if he had produced such accounts, plaintiff would only have had himself to thank if a hurried inspection in Court yielded no result. But defendant 2 produced none at all; his story was that the Rs. 9,000 was part of a much larger sum which he had drawn from two Chetties. He called neither of these, one for the weak reason that he had been subpoenaed by the other side, the other because he said he had left Rangoon. He also produced no entry of any receipt in his own books though the sums alleged to have been taken were very large. He says he drew the other and larger portions of the sums drawn for the purpose of bidding, but re-paid them as he did not succeed in obtaining any license. As they constituted an overdraft, one would have expected that he would not have left the unused Rs. 9,000 with Nagappa, but have diminished his overdraft. Instead of this he left it idle with Nagappa and asks that it should be believed that he charged no interest to Nagappa and was charged in turn no interest by the other Chetties. Both he and Nagappa swear that this is quite a common thing, but it seems rather curious to me.

There is no apparent motive for any fraud on the part of Nagappa, but that is slender proof that none exists; he had been the Chetty of both and each trusted him, but every one has a good character till he is found out. It is impossible to decide the case against the plaintiff on these grounds only. It is not without significance that the two defendants contradict one another as to what happened when the money was deposited. The Chetty says that all that he was told by Li Kut Chaung was that he was going to an auction and that he was to keep the money till he came back, when he would tell him what he has to do with it. Li Kut Chaung told the same story in examination-in-chief, except that he said that in the evening when he went back to the Chetty he merely told him that he might keep the money as he had no use for it. In cross examination, however, he said that he told the Chetty that the money was to be used for buying the license at the auction and that it was to be bought by him and Ah Foke jointly. He immediately corrected the last statement, but says that he told the Chetty in the evening that Ah Foke had nothing to do with the money, because the license was not in his (Li Kut Chaung's) name, a statement which would be unnecessary unless he had more or less explained the matter in the morning. Moreover as he admits that the money was deposited with the Chetty, because he and Ah Foke distrusted each other, it is difficult to suppose that Ah Foke would have been content to leave the matter quite unexplained and Li Kut Chaung consequently at liberty to send and withdraw the money the next minute. Nagappa, however, says that no one else told him anything and that he did not ask any one. Li Kut Chaung says that Ah Foke merely listened and was satisfied. I do not think he would have been satisfied, had the story been that told by the Chetty, viz., that there was a mere deposit liable to withdrawal the next instant. Explanations in my opinion must have been given.

Nagappa's advocate cross-examined Li Kut Chaung as to these statements and he persisted that he had made them. It follows that the Chetty's account, which, improbable in itself, cannot be accepted, and that he had no business whichever of the two made the deposit to give it up till satisfied that the conditions had been fulfilled.

Lastly, Li Kut Chaung's story strikes me as very lame: Li Kan Shu was the head partner of Ah Foke, and Li Kut Chaung had formerly been a partner of Li Kan Shu, but the two had quarrelled and were no longer even on speaking terms, and had become bitter rivals. Ah Foke was Li Kan Shu's man and Li Kut Chaung knew and says in an unguarded moment that Li Kan Shu was Ah Foke and Ah Foke was Li Kan Shu, and yet he would have it believed, though each swore that he would never be partner again of the other, that he was willing to take a 4th share with Ah Foke and his enemy partners in the other 3/4. I cannot believe the tale and must hold that plaintiff's story is the truth. Mr. Chari, however, contended that if so, the contract was void under S. 23, Contract Act, on the ground that its object was to obtain the licenses in question at an undervalue, that all parties were in pari delicto and that the Court would not interfere to aid one or the other, relying on the somewhat similar cases of Sit Kauk v. Ah Kun (1) and Maung Thain Gah v. Maung Kan Tark (2). In the earlier and leading case, that of Sit Kauk v. Ah Kun (1), Burgess, Judicial Commissioner, relied on inter alia a passage from Stoll's Principles of Equity 9th Edn. p. 575, running as follows:

"Agreements whereby parties engage not to bid against each other at a public auction, especially where the same is directed or required by law, are held void for (however common) they are unconscientious and have a tendency to cause the property to be sold at an undervalue."

The learned Judge had also before him the Edn. 6 of Dart's Vendors and Purchasers, which laid down the conflicting rules that an agreement between two persons not to bid against each other at an auction is legal and forms a valuable consideration for an agreement giving to the party withdrawing his opposition at the auction a right of pre-emption, and after regretting his inability to consult the decisions on which the rules were based decided that such an agreement was either fraudulent or involved or implied injury to the person or property of another or was immoral or opposed to public policy, and was void under S. 23, Contract Act. In my opinion the learned Judge laid down the rule too strictly and I consider that the true rule is as stated by Brett and Mockerjee, J. in Gobindo Chandra Jha v. Shyam Lal Jha (3), viz., that such an agreement is not necessarily illegal or against public policy. Sargent, C. J., held the same in Hari Ballabhusa v. Naro Moreshear (4), and in Mahomed Mira Ibrahim v. Sarwan Vijaya Raghunatha Gopalar (5), the Judicial Committee agreed with the view of the Madras High Court that a charge against a ladder that he and those in concert with him have acted in such a manner as to prevent the best price being obtained does not of itself amount to a charge of fraud, and that proof of such concert will not invalidate the sale.

In my opinion, it is impossible to say that the object of such an agreement is necessarily to get property at an undervalue: it is quite possible that its object may be to avoid having to buy at an overvalue, as was pointed out by Mockerjee, J. in Ambika Prasad Singh v. R. H. Whitwell (6), and where as here the object of defendant 2 is, on the facts as found by me, to retain the money which does not belong to him and that of defendant 1 is to avoid having to re-pay money which either through carelessness or fraud he paid to the wrong person, neither can rightly object if the Court calls for clear proof that the object of the transaction was fraudulent, for as has been often laid down, the Courts look with great disfavour on such a plea when it comes from the mouth of a partner in inequity.

Section 23, Contract Act, provides that contract is void if either its object or consideration is illegal. Here the consideration was on one side the promise to pay on the other the promise not to bid, and neither seems to fall within the section. It is only the object that can be so stigmatised. What then was the object? To defraud Government and buy the licenses at an unfair undervalue or to get the licenses at a reasonable price? In favour of the first alternative is the fact that the plaintiff, who had had the licenses in the previous years and presumably knew what it would be worth his while to offer agreed to pay the defendant Rs. 5,000 if license No. 2 was knocked down at Rs. 72,000, but eventually thought it worth his while to pay Rs. 1,05,000 and agreed to pay him Rs. 4,000 if license No. 3 was knocked for Rs. 70,000, but eventually thought it worth his while to pay Rs. 75,100. In favour of 2nd alternative are the facts, (a) that the Rs. 72,000 and Rs. 70,000 were in each case an advance on the price offered and accepted in the former year, (b) that there is no evidence of any collusion except between these two and it seems to be admitted that there were many bidders, and (c) the plaintiff and defendant 2 were not merely rivals in business but on very unfriendly terms, and the plaintiff may well have thought that the defendant would run up the price to an unfair height out of spite. Colour is lent to this last point by the fact that the contract was not merely that defendant should not bid, but that the price was not to exceed the price named. The plaintiff had no objection to the defendant bidding, so long as he did not bid above the price which he (the plaintiff) was willing to pay; on the contrary he would probably have welcomed such bidding as tending to create a belief in the bona fides of the bidding, and the object of the stipulation was to prevent the defendant from having the satisfaction of pocketing plaintiff's money and getting the license by bidding benami.

On the whole, however, while I have no sympathy with the defendant, I find it impossible to get over the fact that plaintiff, who best knew the profits of the licenses inasmuch as he had held them certainly for the previous year and also I think for several years, tried to get for Rs. 72,000 a license for which he ultimately deemed it worth his while to pay Rs. 1,05,000. In accordance with the ordinary rules that govern mankind, I must assume in the absence of any evidence to the contrary that the plaintiff saw his way to making a profit even at this price, in other words, that he hoped by bribing the defendant to get a property worth at least Rs. 1,05,000 for Rs. 72,000. I consider that this was an unfair undervalue and that the plaintiff's object was not to buy off unfair competition but to obtain the property at an unfair price. As Mookerjee, J., pointed out in Ambika Prasad Singh v. R. H. Whitwell (6):

"The test, in each case, is what was the object of the agreement among the bidders, it is the end to be accomplished which determines whether a combination is lawful or otherwise. If the object be to obtain the property at a sacrifice, by the artifice combination is fraudulent, if the object be to make a fair bargain, the combination cannot be said to be fraudulent."

It is for this reason that Judges have in case after case laid down that combinations such as this are not necessarily or are not in themselves fraudulent and the circumstances of each case must therefore be considered. In this case for the reasons already given, I consider that the object in regard to license No. 2 was fraudulent. Whether if the plan had succeeded the vendors could have upset the sale is a different matter. In Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 1, p. 512, the opinion is expressed that even if there is a combination among bidders amounting to what is known as a knock out, it does not give rise to an action at the suit of a vendor and Fletcher, J., in Jyotiprakash Nandi v. Jhommull Johury (7) criticised adversely the decisions in Ambika Prasad Singh v. H. R. Whitwell (6) and Gobindo Chandra Jha v. Syam Lal Jha (3), in so far as they decided to the contrary. But I am not dealing with this case but with the quite distinct one—whether parties who have made such an agreement between themselves should be entitled to the assistance of the Court to recover the price of their mutual and possibly corrupt bargain. The question whether the vendor, who has ample power to ascertain the value of his property and who can, by putting a reserve price upon it, avoid having to part with it at less than his own price, is entitled to rescind his contract, merely because he has not chosen to put a reserve price or has put too low a one, is quite a different one. If he is willing to sell at a certain price and gets that price, has he any right to complain because if he had put a higher price, he could have obtained it? Lex subvenit vigilantibus non dor- mientibus. The Contract Act is a Code though not a complete one. S. 123 penalises the correlative fraud of pulling by a vendor, is it intentional or unintentional that there is no provision penalising combinations by bidders to effect the opposite result?

The great lawyers who drew up the Code could hardly have been unaware of the judgment in Hogfer v. Martyn (8), in which L. D. Romilly, M. R., in 1867 five years before the passing of the Act commented on the difference of treatment meted out. But it is enough to say that the question of the rights of the vendor is not (and in the present case where the combination failed could not be) before me. Here I am concerned only with the contract between Ah Foke and Li Kut Chaung and not with that between Ah Foke and his vendor, and the sole question is whether the Court should lend its aid to the plaintiff to recover his money from defendant 1 or 2. With regard to license No. 3, the arrangement was that Rs. 4,000 was to be paid if the biddings did not exceed Rs. 70,000; as a matter of fact it was knocked down for Rs. 75,000 and if the case stood alone, I might have held that the difference of price was insufficient proof of any impropriety of object. But it does not stand alone and was all one transaction and I think that the object was the same in both, and on the principles that ex dolo malo non oritur actio and in pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis, I must decline to help the plaintiff to get his money back from defendant 2 as he had largely performed his part of the contract: cf. Kearley v. Thompson (9). But as regards Nagappa the case is different; he was a trustee or agent or, if the transaction be regarded as a wager in which Ah Foke bet Li Kut Chaung Rs. 5,000 and Rs. 4,000 to nil that the licenses would fetch respectively more than Rs. 72,000 and Rs. 70,000, he was a stakeholder, and the rule is laid down in Hastelow v. Jackson (10) where Littledale, J., stated as follows:

"If two parties enter into an illegal contract, and money is paid upon it by one to the other, that may be recovered back before the execution of the contract, but not afterwards. In the case of persons entering into such a contract and paying money to a stakeholder, if the event happens and the money is paid over without dispute, that is considered as a complete execution of the contract and the money cannot be reclaimed, but if the event has not happened, the money may be recovered. With respect to a stakeholder there is a third case, viz., where the event has happened, but before the money has been paid over, one party expresses his dissent from the payment."

This case was followed in Hodson v. Terrill (11), and Stirling, J., in Barclay v. Pearson (12) stated that these two cases had been repeatedly recognized as correctly laying down the law on the subject, and Collins, M. R., in Torman v. Charlemouth (13) expressed his approval of Stirling, J.'s remarks. In the present case, as I have already said, even if the oral evidence of the plaintiff on the point should be discarded, which I must not be taken as conceding, it is clear that the plaintiffs by their lawyer's letter prohibited the payment of the money, before it had been paid over and when only a promissory note had been given. To pay and to promise to pay are not the same thing and as is stated by Pollock and Mulla's Contract Act, Edn. 3, p. 574, authority to pay money in respect of an unlawful transaction may be revoked at any time before it has been actually paid, even if it has been credited in account. I doubt if the promissory note could have been enforced. Nagappa, however, elected to pay it and must take the consequences. The contract was, in my opinion, illegal, and also largely performed by Li Kut Chaung, and I, therefore, cannot help the plaintiff to recover the money from him and the suit must be dismissed as against him, though under the circumstances I make no order as to costs; but as against Nagappa, who was an agent and virtually a stakeholder who paid over money after his authority had been countermanded, I must grant a decree with interest at 6 per cent. from 5th April 1917 to realization and costs.

(a) Penal Code (1860), S. 376—Statement by complainant immediately after occurrence is admissible as evidence of consistency of her conduct—Evidence Act (1872), Ss. 8 and 157.

In a case of rape the statement made by the complainant immediately after the occurrence to another woman is admissible, not as evidence of the truth of the charge alleged, but as corroborating the credibility of the complainant and as evidence of the consistency of her conduct.

(b) Penal Code (1860), S. 376—Suicide of complainant cannot be taken into consideration in passing sentence on accused.

An inference adverse to the accused cannot be drawn from the fact that the complainant was very much ashamed and even committed suicide owing to the shame brought on her.

[P 82 C 2; P 83 C 1]

The fact of the complainant's suicide should not be taken into consideration in passing sentence in a case of rape because that is neither the natural nor ordinary nor probable consequence of the accused's act.

[P 83 C 1]

Judgment—I am not satisfied that the conviction for rape is justified by the evidence and I think the offence committed was one of assault with intent to outrage the modesty of a woman. The conviction for rape depends solely upon what the girl is supposed to have said to Ma O Za and others. What she said to Ma O Za is admissible, not as evidence of the truth of the charge alleged, but as corroborating the credibility of the girl and as evidence of the consistency of her conduct. Let us now see what happened. The girl went to cut grass in the field and sometime after she went running to Ma O Za and told her that the accused had squeezed her neck and raped her, and when asked where the offender was she pointed out and the accused was seen walking away fast. Ma O Za does not appear to have asked any questions as to the details of the offence committed. Nor did she examine the girl's longyi or person. She saw a red mark on her throat. It was shown her by the girl. To two other women including her mother the girl stated the same thing as she had done to Ma O Za. According to their evidence the girl would seem to be very much ashamed of having been maltreated by the accused, for she beat her breast and cried saying that it would not be worth her while to live in the human world any more. None of the women asked the girl in order to get details showing that her words that she was raped were correctly used. Nor any of them examine her person or her clothes to see if there were any signs of rape. Only Ma Pe, the girl's mother, is supposed to have asked her, if there was penetration and she is supposed to have said there was. Curiously enough this was deposed to not by Ma Pe but by Ma O Za who said:

"I did not ask when Ma Pe asked Ma E Thwe that is, the girl said that penetration took place when rape was committed."

so that it is not safe to seize on this piece of evidence and direct one's attention against the accused. The girl is dead; she hanged herself the very day she was insulted, so we have not her evidence. Now it is for me to try and ascertain whether there is evidence on the record of rape having been committed. The girl's longyi and the accused were sent to the Chemical Examiner, who has reported that there was no spermatozoa on either longyi. The medical evidence shows that owing to the decomposed state of the girl's body it was difficult to detect marks of violence other than wounds such as stick and dah wounds. No signs of violence could be detected at the vulva orifice. The medical evidence shows, if anything, that there were no signs of violence on the girl's person. There was not rent of any sort or kind in the girl's jacket. It was, however, stained with mud on the right side of the back of the jacket especially on the upper part and also on the outside of the right sleeve about the forearm. This shows that, if the girl was thrown before the attempt at rape, the man did not succeed in making the necessary preparations. He never got her full on her back.

This view is supported by the fact that it is nowhere stated that there were any mud stains on her longyi. In fact we must take it that there were no such stains on the longyi because the Magistrate had both the longyi and the jacket before him and after examining them noted about stains on the jacket only. The proper inference then is that the girl's neck was squeezed and that she was thrown down on the ground; she resisted and the man gave up and ran away. The fact that the paddy plants appeared to have been trodden down only shows that there was a struggle and nothing more. In my judgment it is very unsafe to rely on a jungle girl when she says "I am raped" without particulars being obtained by questioning her. That such people do not speak with clearness and precision is proverbial. Nor can we draw any inference adverse to the accused from the fact that the girl was very much ashamed and even committed suicide owing to the shame brought on her. She must be adjudged to be a girl with an abnormal mind, doing and saying things what others in similar circumstances would not do or say. Her words are not consistent with the post mortem appearances or the absence of stains on her longyi or the mud stains which were only on the right side of her body which shows that she must have fallen sideways and never on her back. I thought at first that the offence committed by the accused might be one of an attempt to commit rape. But I think the above findings do not justify that view: see Empress v. Shanker (1).

For the reasons above stated I hold that the conviction and sentence for rape ought to be set aside and the accused convicted of an assault with intent to outrage the modesty of a woman. I, therefore, alter the conviction to one under S. 354, I. P. C. and sentence the accused to one year's rigorous imprisonment. In passing sentence I have not taken into consideration the fact of the girl's suicide, because that is neither a natural nor ordinary nor probable consequence of the accused's act.

Civil Regular No. 271 of 1916, Decided on 6th July 1917.

(a) Divorce Act (4 of 1869), S. 4—S. 4 does not prevent consideration of whether marriage is void under Christian Marriage Act (1872), Ss. 4 and 5.

Section 4, Divorce Act, which provides that the jurisdiction exercised by the High Court in all causes, suits and matters matrimonial shall be exercised subject to the provisions of the Divorce Act and not otherwise, does not preclude the Court from considering the provisions of Ss. 4 and 5, Christian Marriage Act and declaring a particular marriage void as not having been solemnized in accordance therewith.

(b) Christian Marriage Act (15 of 1872), S. 5—"Solemnized" refers to ceremony—S. 5 does not concern with capacity of performing and on whom performed.

The word "solemnized" in S. 5, Christian Marriage Act means "celebrated" and refers to the ceremony only.

Section 5, Christian Marriage Act, deals only with the ceremony and the person who may perform it, and not with the capacity of the persons on whom it is performed or with the capacity of the person who performs it, save that he should have received episcopal ordination.

[P 85 C 2]

(c) Divorce Act (1869), S. 19—Fraud to set aside marriage—Fraud must be such as to amount to no consent.

There is no degree of deception which can avail to set aside a contract of marriage knowingly made, unless the party implicated upon has been deceived as to the person and thus has given no consent at all.

When fraud is spoken of as avoiding a marriage, it means such fraud as procures the appearance without the reality of consent; it does not include such fraud as induces a consent, nor fraud which is practised on a third party in order to procure a licence.

DeGlanville and Miller—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—In this suit the petitioner seeks to have it declared that his marriage with the respondent is null and void: (a) on the ground that his consent was procured by fraud, (b) on the ground that they were married by a Roman Catholic priest, who was by the rules and regulations of his church incapable of marrying them inasmuch as the respondent was a divorced woman, a fact of which he was unaware when he performed the marriage ceremony. Mr. DeGlanville for the respondent raised a preliminary objection to the jurisdiction relying on Ss. 4, 18 and 19, Divorce Act, the effect of which is clearly, if this Act alone is to be considered, to deprive the Court of any jurisdiction to consider the petitioner's second ground. Mr. DeGlanville also urged that S. 4, which provides that the jurisdiction then exercised by the High Courts in all causes, suits and matters matrimonial shall be exercised subject to the provisions of the Divorce Act and not otherwise, precludes the Court from considering the provisions of S. 4, Christian Marriage Act, which declares that every marriage solemnized otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of S. 5 shall be void. In support of his contention he relied upon the case of Gasper v. Gonsalves (1), in which Pontifex, J., held that the High Court could not entertain a suit of a matrimonial nature otherwise than as provided by the Divorce Act and, therefore, had no jurisdiction to make a decree of nullity on the ground that the marriage was invalid. This case, however, was decided ex parte. Further in Lopez v. Lopez (2), where the question was whether a certain marriage was void on the ground that the parties were within the prohibited degrees—one of the grounds on which a marriage may be declared null and void under the Divorce Act, it was also argued that the marriage was void under the Christian Marriage Act and Wilson, J., who delivered the opinion of the Full Bench, stated as follows:

"Section 5, Act 15 of 1872 enacts, as did the Act of 1865, that 'marriage may be solemnised in India (1) by any person who has received episcopal ordination provided that the marriage be solemnised according to the rules, rites, ceremonies, and customs of the church of which he is a minister.' It was argued that the words 'rites, rules, ceremonies, and customs, here used include rules as to capacity to marry, and make those rules in each case depend upon the law of the church whose minister performs the marriage. That argument would lead by a short process to the same conclusion as which we have arrived upon this reference. The construction of those words is difficult; we are not prepared to express a unanimous opinion upon it and it is unnecessary that we should deal with it."

The case was, therefore, decided on the Divorce Act, but while it is unfortunate that this Court is deprived of the advantage of learning the views of the Calcutta High Court on the meaning of these words, it is significant that it never occurred either to counsel or to Court to question the jurisdiction to decide the reference under the Christian Marriage Act. The Court refrained from doing so only from lack of unanimity and because it was possible to decide the question raised in the case under the Divorce Act. I am of the same opinion: the Christian Marriage Act in S. 4, expressly declares that marriages are null which are not solemnised in accordance with the provisions of S. 5 and I fail to see how if, as here, the question is whether a particular marriage was so solemnised, I can refrain from deciding it and declaring the result in accordance with the law. I cannot agree with the decision in Gasper v. Gonsalves (1), if, and so far as, it decides to the contrary, and I am not bound by it, and if I were, I should require to be satisfied that the suit being one to declare a marriage solemnised in Chandernagore, a French settlement, null and void, the learned Judge had any jurisdiction to deal with the case at all, for under the Divorce Act decrees of nullity can only be granted in cases where the marriage has been solemnised in British India (S. 2) and the same is the case under the Christian Marriage Act. Unless, therefore, Chandernagore is in India, which seems to me doubtful under the General Clauses Act, which defines India as meaning British India together with any territories of any native prince, or chief under the suzerainty of His Majesty, the decision would be one without jurisdiction. As, however, I am not bound by the decision, I do not propose to discuss the point on which I have not had the advantage of hearing argument. I hold that I have jurisdiction to deal with both grounds of the petition.

As regards the first ground, viz., that the petitioner's consent was obtained by fraud, the cross-examination of the petitioner shows that if there was fraud within the meaning of the Divorce Act, it was condoned and the authorities of Moss v. Moss (3), and Swift v. Kelly (4), shew that the frauds alleged do not, according to the principles and rules of the English Courts which under S. 7, Divorce Act, I am bound to follow, afford grounds for granting the relief sought. Thus in Swift v. Kelly (4), the Judicial Committee stated as follows:

"It would seem indeed to be the general law of all countries, as it certainly is of England, that unless there be some positive provision of Statute Law requiring certain things to be done in a specified manner, no marriage shall be held void merely upon proof that it had been contracted upon false representation, and that but for such contrivances consent would never have been obtained. Unless the party imposed upon has been deceived as to the person and thus has given no consent at all, there is no degree of deception which can avail to set aside a contract of marriage knowingly made."

and in Moss v. Moss (3), Sir Francis Jeune expressed his agreement with this view of the law of England, and stated (page 268), that:

"when in English Law fraud is spoken of as a ground for avoiding a marriage, this does not include such fraud as induces a consent, but is limited to such fraud as procures the appearance without the reality of consent."

In this case it is not alleged that there was no consent, the petitioner expressly pleads that he did consent, but that his consent was procured by fraud. He also pleads that the license was fraudulently obtained by the respondent concealing from the priest that she had been divorced. The alleged fraud upon the petitioner is expressly dealt with by both the above authorities and the fraud upon the priest is inferentially dealt with in Moss v. Moss (3), and expressly in Swift v. Kelly (4), where their Lordships say:

"If such be the law touching consent to the marriage itself and the fraud whereby that consent was obtained, it would be extraordinary indeed if another rule were allowed to govern the case where fraud has been practised upon a third party, acting immaterially in granting the license to celebrate it."

Moreover, S. 19 does not include fraud upon a third party as one of the grounds for invalidating a marriage. At the commencement of the second day's hearing I asked Mr. Giles whether in the face of these authorities and the evidence as to condonation it was worthwhile proceeding with the case upon the ground of fraud, and he abandoned this portion of it. It remains to deal with the second ground, viz., that the marriage was celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest in this city of Rangoon and that as the lady had been divorced, the marriage was null and void under the provisions of the Christian Marriage Act. S. 5 of the Act provides that marriages may be solemnised in India by (amongst others) any person who has received episcopal ordination, provided that the marriage be solemnised according to the rules, rites, ceremonies and customs of the church of which he is a minister. There is no doubt that in this case the celebrant had received episcopal ordination and no doubt that the marriage was celebrated according to the rules, rites, ceremonies and customs of his church, except as regards the fact that the lady had been divorced. There is equally no doubt on the evidence that according to its rules and customs no priest of the Church of Rome can celebrate a marriage between persons one or both of whom has been divorced, and no person can marry a divorced man or woman. The question, however, is not whether the marriage is valid in the eyes of the church which is simple, but whether it is valid in the eyes of the law which is difficult. It is exactly the question on which the Calcutta High Court were not unanimous, and on which unfortunately they expressed no opinion, and the answer depends upon the meaning of the words "provided that the marriage be solemnised according to the rules, rites, ceremonies and customs of the church." According to the tenets of the Roman Church such a marriage is bigamous, no priest can solemnise it, no person can enter into it. According to the law it is otherwise and if the parties had had their marriage solemnised by a marriage Registrar or a clergyman of the Church of England, no question, so far as I can see, could have arisen, and it undoubtedly would have been more prudent if the lady, who it may be assumed desired to contract a marriage that would be binding had adopted that course. But she elected not to do so, and it is, therefore, necessary to determine, not whether the union is binding according to the Church of Rome, but whether it is binding by law.

In my opinion in this Act "solemnised" means celebrated, see Queen-Empress v. Postlethwaite, and while the Divorce Act gives the external reasons and causes for which, apart from the ceremony, a marriage may be declared null and void, the Christian Marriage Act in these sections deals with the ceremony and the ceremony only. S. 4 does not say that persons may marry each other if the law of the church by which they are married so permits, and does not say that priests may marry such persons if and only if the law of their church allows, but merely provides, as it seems to me, how every Christian marriage is to be solemnised or celebrated.

"Every marriage" it says "shall be solemnised in accordance with the provisions of S. 5 and every marriage not so solemnised shall be null."

Again S. 5 does not say that Christians in India marry one another provided that they are married by a person who has received episcopal ordination and provided further that they are permitted to marry each other by the rules of the church and are married in accordance with its rules, rites, ceremonies and customs, but that marriages may be solemnised in India by certain persons, provided that they are solemnised in accordance with certain rules. In other words, the section, in my opinion deals only with the ceremony and the person who may perform it and not with the capacity of the persons on whom it is performed or with the capacity of the person who performs it, save as is expressed in the section, viz., that he should have received episcopal ordination. It is not suggested that the parties are not Christians, or that the person who performed the marriage ceremony had not received episcopal ordination or that the ceremony was performed in any way differently from that in which marriages are celebrated in the Roman Church. Such being the case, the marriage, in my opinion, fulfilled the conditions required by the Christian Marriage Act, and the parties in the eye of the law are man and wife. I dismiss the application with costs, eight gold mohurs.

Civil P. C. (1908) O. 33, Rr. 2, 3, 6 and 15—Application not framed properly—Rejection does not bar under R. 15 of subsequent application of like nature.

The rejection of an application to sue as a pauper, on the ground that it is not framed and presented in the manner prescribed by Rr. 2 and 3, O. 33, Civil P. C., is not a bar under R. 15 to a subsequent application of a like nature, in respect of the same right to sue, merely because the order of rejection is passed after the opposite party has appeared in response to a notice issued under R. 6. Case-law discussed. [1918 C 1]

Maung Ba Kya—for Applicant.

Palit—for Opposite Party.

Order of Reference.

Parlett, J.—The petitioner filed an application on 28th July 1915 for permission to sue the two respondents as a pauper. Notice was served upon the respondents, who on the 7th December filed through an advocate a written statement setting out, among other things, that the application for leave to sue as a pauper was not framed according to law. The District Judge found that the schedule of the property belonging to the applicant annexed to her application was not verified, nor was it referred to in the application itself, which was verified. He therefore rejected the application under O. 33, R. 5 (a), as not being framed in the manner prescribed by R. 2. On 22nd January 1916 the petitioner filed another application for leave to sue as a pauper and notice was issued to the respondents, who filed a written statement pleading, among other things, that the refusal of the former application constituted a bar to the entertainment of the present one, and on 23rd March 1916 the District Judge so held and dismissed the application under O. 33, R. 15. The petitioner now applies for revision of the District Judge's order, on the ground that the order of rejection under R. 5 (a) does not amount to an order of refusal under R. 7 so as to constitute a bar to the further application under R. 15. If this be so, the District Court in refusing to consider the second application on its merits failed to exercise jurisdiction vested in it, and so the matter is open to revision.

The District Judge relied upon Kali Kumar Sen v. N. N. Burjorjee (1). In that case the applicant filed a petition for permission to sue as a pauper, upon which notice was issued under O. 33, R. 6. Subsequently an amended petition was filed adding the names of several new defendants to whom notice was also issued. The application was rejected by the District Judge for want of verification in proper form, and revision of that order was sought. A Bench of this Court decided that though the verification might perhaps be held to comply substantially with the rule, the petitioner was bound to fail for want of a schedule of the property belonging to the applicant, so there was no ground for interference with the District Judge's order. It was however further laid down that that order was clearly passed under R. 7 and should have been a refusal to allow to sue as a pauper. The reason for this, view is not stated, but it would appear to be that the petition was not rejected in limine under R. 5 but after the opposite party had appeared in response to a notice issued under R. 6. But the point does not appear to have been necessary for the decision of the case nor even to have arisen in it. I think the same may be said of the remark in the judgment that the absence of a schedule of the property rendered the applicant subject to the prohibition specified in O. 33, R. 5 (a).

In Narsiah v. Vithalingam Thinganda (2) where an application to sue as a pauper had been rejected for want of a proper verification, after, as the record shows notice, had been issued to the opposite party under R. 6 a Bench of this Court expressly refrained from recording an opinion as to whether a subsequent application would be barred under R. 15. In Ranchod Morar v. Beroonji Edulji (3) an application to sue in forma pauperis was rejected as the applicant did not wish to proceed with it, and it was held that this order amounted to a refusal under S. 409 and was a bar to a further application under S. 413 of the Code of 1882, corresponding to Rr. 7 and 15, O. 33. It was remarked that an order of rejection under S. 407, corresponding to R. 5 (a), can only be made on preliminary grounds before notice is issued and before inquiry is held into the applicant's pauperism, whereas in the case then being dealt with such an inquiry had commenced. In Atul Chandra Sen v. Peary Mohan (4) a second application was held to be barred under R. 15, where the former application was ostensibly rejected under R. 2 for failure to furnish the particulars required in regard to the plaint, but in reality after evidence had been taken on both sides and it had been found that the applicant had made a false statement as to the property he owned; and I think the dictum that there is no distinction between rejection under R. 5 and an order of refusal under R. 7 was intended to apply to a case like that under consideration where evidence had been given on both sides.

It appears to me therefore that there is no strong authority for holding that when an application to sue as a pauper, which is not framed and presented in the manner prescribed by Rr. 2 and 3, is rejected only after the opposite party had appeared in answer to a notice, such rejection is an order refusing to allow the applicant to sue as a pauper, which under R. 15 bars a subsequent application. On general principles such a view would not appear to be right. Rr. 4, 5 and 6 imply that it is the Court's duty to scrutinize the application to see whether it complies with the conditions laid down as to both form and substance, and to reject it forthwith if it, on the face, fails to satisfy any one of those conditions. The applicant can then present another application. If the Court neglects its duty in this respect and issues notice upon an application which is not in proper form and thereafter rejects it on that ground, it would be unjust that the applicant should be put in a worse position by reason merely of the Court having failed to do its duty. Turning to the rules themselves, R. 5 lays down that an application to sue as a pauper must be rejected unless it conforms to each of five conditions. Briefly it must be rejected: (a) where it is improperly framed and presented, (b) where the applicant is not a pauper, (c) where he has within two months fraudulently disposed of any property in order to be able to apply for permission to sue as a pauper, (d) where his allegations do not show a cause of action, and (e) where he has entered into a champertous agreement with reference to the subject-matter of the proposed suit. Of those conditions it would be obvious on the face of the application whether (a) and usually whether (d) was fulfilled or not. The decision as to the others could only be arrived at on inquiry and after taking evidence, so if (a) and on the face of it (d) are complied with, a notice should issue under R. 6. When the opposite party appears, the conditions (b) to (e) may be gone into, but if the Court has done its duty so questions as to (a) ought to arise at this stage, and the decision to which the Court is required to come under R. 7 should on the face of it have no reference to Cl. (a), R. 5. Cl. (2), R. 7 runs:

"The Court shall also hear any argument which the parties may desire to offer on the question whether, on the face of the application and of the evidence (if any) taken by the Court as herein provided, the applicant is or is not subject to any of the prohibitions specified in R. 5."

The language is somewhat unusual, but the word prohibition appears to me to refer to some status of the applicant or to some conduct on his part which disqualifies him from being allowed to sue as a pauper, and not to any formal defect in his application. The fact that he is not a pauper disqualifies him, so would a fraudulent disposal of his property or an agreement such as are referred to in Cls. (c) and (e) and these three disqualifications are clearly prohibitions. Usually I think failure to show a cause of action would not be, but however that may be, I am clearly of opinion that a merely formal defect in the frame of the application cannot be said to render the applicant subject to a prohibition. It is significant that S. 405 of the Code of 1882 required the application to be rejected if not framed and presented in the prescribed manner, thus corresponding to Cl. (a), R. 5, while S. 407 enjoined rejection for the reasons now appearing in Cls. (b) to (e), R. 5, and S. 409, corresponding to R. 7, provided for the application being allowed or refused after considering whether the applicant was or was not subject to any of the prohibitions specified in S. 407. It is clear, therefore, that under the old Code a formal defect in the application was not regarded as a prohibition to which the applicant was subject, and I cannot see that it becomes one merely because all the grounds on which the application must be rejected are now grouped together in one rule. From all points of view it appears to me that the District Court's order of 7th December 1915 in the present case should not have been held a bar to the application of 20th January 1916. I think the question should be further considered whether the rejection of an application to sue as a pauper, because it is not framed and presented in the manner prescribed by Rr. 2 and 3, O. 33, is a bar under R. 15 to a subsequent application of a like nature in respect of the same right to sue, merely because the order of rejection is passed after the opposite party has appeared in response to a notice issued under R. 6.

Ormond, J.—I agree that the question suggested should be referred to a Full Bench in view of the decision in Kul Kumar Sen v. N. N. Burjorjee (1).

Ormond, Offg. C. J.—The question we have to determine is whether the rejection of an application to sue as pauper, because it is not framed and presented in the manner prescribed by Rr. 2 and 3 O. 32, is a bar under R. 15 to a subsequent application of a like nature in respect of the same right to sue; such order of rejection having been passed after the opposite party has appeared under notice issued under R. 6. It is contended for the applicant that under the rules an order of rejection and an order of refusal are in effect the same and amount to a final dismissal of the pauper-application; and that the word "prohibitions" in R. 6 includes Cl. (a), R. 5. If this contention is correct, a pauper who through ignorance presents his application through a pleader is altogether debarred from having his application heard. R. 15 implies that if the application has been rejected, such rejection would not of itself be a bar to the subsequent presentation of the application. Rr. 4 and 5 show that it is the duty of the Court, when the application is presented, to see that it is in proper form and duly presented. The Court need not at that stage examine the applicant and consider the merits. But it may do so; and if it does and is satisfied upon the admissions made by the applicant that he is not a pauper; according to R. 5 the application must be rejected and no notice can issue under R. 6. But if the Court, without going into the merits, issues notice under R. 6 and then finds that the applicant is not a pauper; according to R. 7 the application must be refused. It is clear that such order of rejection under R. 5 must have the same effect as the order of refusal under O. 7 and that it operates as a final dismissal of the application: for both orders are made upon the finding that the applicant is not a pauper.

It is unreasonable to suppose that the legislature intended that when the Court has come to a finding that the applicant is not a pauper, the application should not be finally dismissed: or to suppose that a finding based upon the admissions of the applicant was intended to be of less effect than a finding based upon the evidence of the opposite party. In my opinion an order of rejection under R. 5 which is based upon a finding that applicant is subject to any of the prohibitions referred to in R. 7, must, by necessary implication, have the effect of a final refusal of the application. The question then is: Does the word "prohibitions" in R. 7 include Cl. (a), R. 5? The word appears in the corresponding section of the Code of 1882, S. 409, and if in Rule 7 it is used in the same sense as in the old S. 409, it would not include Cl. (a), R. 5. Again, Cl. (a), R. 5, refers to irregularities in the framing and presentation of the application; and I do not think such a clause could be said to contain a prohibition in the ordinary sense of the word. In my opinion Cl. (a), R. 5, is not one of the prohibitions referred to in R. 7 and an order of rejection under R. 5, on the ground that the applicant has not complied with the provisions of Cl. (a), does not operate as a bar to a subsequent representation of the application in proper form. The last clause of R. 7:

"The Court shall then either allow or refuse to allow the applicant to sue as a pauper," does not mean that if the application should have been rejected under Cl. (a), R. 5, it is too late for the Court to do so after notice has issued to the opposite party. That clause merely states what order is to be made when the Court has decided whether the applicant is or is not subject to any of the prohibitions, and it has an applicability to the question of an order of rejection under Cl. (a), R. 3. In my opinion an order of rejection under Cl. (a) R. 5 can be made after a notice has been issued under R. 6. For the above reasons I would answer the question referred in the negative. Rr. 5, 7 and 15 are no doubt ambiguous. I think the ambiguity arises from the word "reject" appearing in S. 407 of the old Code, which must be a mistake for the word "refuse." S. 408 begins:

"If the Court sees no reason to refuse the application on any of the grounds stated in S. 407, and that mistake has been overlooked when these rules were framed.

Parlett, J.—I set out my views fully in the order of reference and none of the arguments adduced at the hearing have led me to modify them in any respect. Briefly, they are as follows: The enactment of R. 15, O. 33, shows clearly that every unsuccessful application for leave to sue as a pauper is not necessarily a bar to a subsequent similar application. An application which has been refused under R. 7 (3) is such a bar. An application is refused under that rule when the applicant is subject to one or more of the prohibitions specified in R. 5. In my opinion the failure to frame and present the application in the manner prescribed by Rr. 2 and 3 is not one of those prohibitions, and is not a ground for an order of refusal under R. 7 (3). The appropriate order, whenever such failure comes to the notice of the Court, is one rejecting the application, and an order of rejection on such grounds is not a bar under R. 15 to a subsequent application. The question, whether an order of rejection passed under R. 5 on other grounds may be such a bar is not referred or argued, and I express no opinion upon it. The question referred I would answer in the negative.

Young, J.—The question referred to is, whether the rejection of an application to sue as a pauper, because it is not framed and presented in the manner prescribed by Rr. 2 and 3, O. 33, is a bar under R. 15 to a subsequent application of a like nature in respect of the same right to sue, merely because the order of rejection is passed after the opposite party has appeared in response to a notice issued under R. 6. O. 33, R. 15, is in plain and enacts as follows: An order refusing to allow the applicant to sue as a pauper shall be a bar to any subsequent application of the like nature by him in respect of the same right to sue. It goes on to provide that in such a case the applicant may still sue in the ordinary way. The words "an order refusing to allow an applicant to sue as a pauper" throw us back on to R. 7, and we see that for the same defects (set out in R. 5) the Court is bound either to reject an application for leave to sue as a pauper or to refuse to allow a person so to sue. Which order is to be passed depends on the time and method of detection (R. 6). If the Court detects the defect unsided, it passes an order of rejection under R. 5, if it fails to do so and it is pointed out by the opposite side, an order of refusal under R. 7 is the necessary consequence.

In ordinary language rejection and refusal are practically synonymous; but the legislature does not lightly use different words in the same sense in the same Act: an order of rejection and an order of refusal are clearly different orders, verbally at any rate, and when we see that under R. 15 the bar to making a second application is confined to an order of refusal, one is inclined to doubt whether the same consequence follows an order of rejection. The rest of the Code, I think, confirms these doubts. S. 141 enacts that the procedure provided for suits shall be followed in all proceedings in a Court of civil jurisdiction and O. 7, R. 13, provides that when a plaint is rejected another may be brought. An application for leave to sue is clearly not an application in a suit, it is equally clearly a proceeding in a Court of civil jurisdiction, and the result, in my opinion, is that the word rejection is not only different from the word refusal but each has different results attached to it by the legislature. In other words, an order of rejection under R. 5 does not prevent, but an order of refusal under R. 7 does prevent, a similar application of the like nature by the same person in respect of the same right. It is a curious result, making as it does the consequence depend not upon the nature of the fault but upon the time and method of its detection. It is, however, a construction which, so far as R. 5 is concerned, is in favour of the subject and in my opinion it is the true construction. This, however, is a case under R. 7. The applicant has committed a purely formal mistake, which unfortunately was not detected by the Court under R. 5 but under R. 7, and the question is whether we can see our way to allow him to correct this formal error in a subsequent application.

Rule 7 is very clear and gives the Court no option but to pass an order of refusal. R. 15 is equally clear as to the result that follows. The only method by which we can give relief lies, so far as I can see, in Cls. 2 and 3, R. 7, which direct that the Court shall see whether the applicant is subject to any of the prohibitions specified in R. 5; if he is, the Court is bound to refuse the application. It cannot reject it. R. 5 deals with the circumstances and causes for which a Court is to reject an application. They are five in number and are briefly speaking as follows: (1) Where the application is not properly framed and presented. (2) Where the applicant is not a pauper. (3) Where his application is fraudulent. (4) Where it does not disclose right to sue. (5) Where it is champertous. So far as I can see these are all prohibitions; the applicant is prohibited from applying in a wrong manner—he is also prohibited from applying if he is not a pauper, or if he has been fraudulent or champertous or if his application shows he has no right to sue. They are all prohibitions the results of which differ according to the method and time of detection of the errors committed. Under the former Code the first ground was treated separately and an applicant who made these trivial formal errors only had his application rejected. The legislature, however, deliberately removed these formal errors from the special section and incorporated them in R. 5. Whether it intended the result that in my opinion follows may perhaps be doubted, but it is not for a Court to speculate on what the legislature intended, but to construe what it has enacted. In my opinion an applicant is as much prohibited from presenting in a wrong manner as he is from presenting it fraudulently. I should have expected the legislature to have provided different results, but the legislature have chosen to enact otherwise in plain and unmistakeable language and I see no room for interference. I would, therefore, answer the question referred in the affirmative—the Courts can, however, in future mitigate the results of the commission of those formal defects by rejecting in such cases the applications under R. 5 of their own motion and should, therefore, pursue the applications carefully.

Maung Kin, J.—In my judgment the answer to the question referred should be in the negative. I do not think that the failure to frame and present in application to sue in forma pauperis in the manner prescribed by Rr. 2 and 3 is a prohibition within the meaning of the word "prohibitions" as used in R. 7.

MAUNG KIN, J.

Mung Po Aung—Accused—Applicant.
v.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Civil Revn. No. 166 of 1916 Decided on 26th March 1917.

Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 195 (6)—High Court can decide whether order of lower Court granting or refusing sanction to prosecute is proper or not—Powers of High Court are not restricted to those under Civil P. C. S. 115 or Criminal P. C. Ss. 435 or 439.

Under S. 195 (b) the High Court has power to interfere with the order of lower Court upon the merits of the case, and its powers are not confined to those under S. 115 Civil P. C. or those under S. 435 or 439, Criminal P. C. according as the case in hand is a civil or a criminal case. The High Court has power to go into the evidence and decide whether the order of the lower Court granting or refusing sanction is a proper one or not. [P 92 C2]

Gaunt—for Applicants.

Palit—for Nagur Meera.

Judgment.—In the Subdivisional Court of Tharrawaddy Nagur Meera sued Mung Po Aung, the present applicant, and four others for the recovery of the principal sum of Rs. 500 and interest alleged to be due on a promissory note. Po Aung pleaded payment of two sums of Rs. 300 and Rs. 500 towards the promissory note but failed to prove the plea and the suit was accordingly decreed against him and the other defendants. He then appealed to the Divisional Court but unsuccessfully. Thereupon Nagur Meera applied to the Subdivisional Court for sanction to prosecute Po Aung, on the ground that the entries in a certain book of his, which he produced and relied on in the suit, were forgeries. The Subdivisional Judge held an enquiry and examined 3 witnesses with the result that he rejected the application. Nagur Meera then appealed to the Divisional Judge, praying sanction might be granted to prosecute Po Aung for forgery. The learned Judge granted sanction as prayed. Po Aung now applies to this Court praying that the order of the Divisional Judge may be set aside. He describes his application as miscellaneous application, thus invoking the civil jurisdiction of the Court. The main ground of the application is, that the learned Judge has failed to consider that on the evidence a conviction is improbable. Mr. Palit for Nagur Meera contends that as this matter arises out of the civil case, this Court can interfere only under S. 115, Civil P. C. and that action does not justify an interference on the evidence. He further contends that this Court would have wider powers under S. 439, Criminal P. C., if that section applied but it applies only in cases in which the sanction giving authority is a criminal Court. He cites in support of his contentions the following cases: Hamirpudi Mondol v. Damodar Ghose (1), Ram Prosad Malla v. Raghubar Malla (2) and Beni Pershad v. Sarju Pershad (3). These cases and many others which need not be cited here, do justify Mr. Palit's contentions.

On the other hand Mr. Gaunt, for Po Aung, contends that this Court has power to interfere on the facts, inasmuch as there is authority for saying that the applicant's remedy is really by way of an appeal, as held in Mathusami Mudali v. Veeni Chetty (4). In that case a Full Bench of the Madras High Court decided following the case of Palaniappa Chetti v. Annamalai Chetti (5), that the right of appeal conferred by S. 195 (b), Criminal

P. C. as read with sub.S. (7) to the same section, is not restricted to a right of appeal to the appellate Court to which the Court of first instance is immediately subordinate and that an appeal lies to the High Court, not only in cases where the Court of first instance refuses sanction and sanction is granted by the Court to which that Court is immediately subordinate, but also in cases where the Court of first instance grants sanction and the sanction is revoked by the Court to which that Court is immediately subordinate. The learned Judges differed from the decision in the Calcutta case of Hamirpudi Mondol v. Damodar Ghose (1), above referred to and agreed with the two subsequent Calcutta decisions in Holburn Rahman v. Moushar Kunda Bakhsh (6) and Gurpreet Shankar Roy v. Khode Sheikh (7). In the former of those two last cited cases the learned Judges (Rampool and Mookerji, JJ.) observed:

"The learned Member for the opposite party says that we have no authority to interfere in the present case. But we think we have power to interfere under sub-S. 6, S. 195, Criminal P. C. Both the Courts which have granted sanction are subordinate to this Court and therefore we have authority to set aside the sanction granted by them."

Turning to Allahabad, we find that High Courts (Akman and Karamat Hussain, JJ.) in the cases of Emperor v. Sarf Ma (8) and Kanhai Lal v. Chhadarami Lal (9) dissenting from the Full Bench of Madras, by holding that under S. 195 (b), Criminal P. C., there could be only one proceeding by way of appeal from an order giving or refusing a sanction and from the order either way of the appellate Court there could be no further appeal. This question whether there can be further appeal or not was raised in Calcutta, Ram Prosad Malla v. Raghubar Malla (2), but the learned Judges (Chitty and Carnduff, JJ.) preferred to interfere under S. 422, Civil P. C. of 1882, though they expressed an inclination in favour of the Madras view, especially as it was supported by some of the Calcutta cases. Then we come to the Calcutta case of Pochay Malay v. Emperor (10), decided by Holmwood and Carnduff, JJ. in 1913. There the latter Judge observed as follows:

1. (1906) 10 C. W. N. 1026.

2. (1910) 37 Cal 13=4 I C 6.

3. (1911) 33 All 512=3 I C 982.

4. (1907) 30 Mad 282.

5. (1904) 27 Mad 213.

6. (1907) 5 C. L. J. 219.

7. (1905) 5 C. L. J. 222.

8. (1908) 30 All 243.

9. (1909) 31 All 48=1 I C 5.

10. (1913) 40 Cal 239=16 I C 167.

"Sub-S. 6, S. 195, Criminal P. C. 1898, provides that any sanction given or refused under that section may be revoked or granted by the higher authority indicated. I think that this language is such as to confer not a right of appeal on the person aggrieved by the grant or refusal to the higher authority. . . What is given is not a right of appeal from below but power to intervene, if thought advisable from above."

So far we find that the Full Bench case of Madras above cited and the two Calcutta cases with which it agrees speak of the further remedy as an appeal while Carnduff, J., in the recent Calcutta case referred to above does not give the name of an appeal but says that the higher authority has discretionary power to interfere, and this discretionary power would appear to be wider than that of revision. Carnduff, J.'s view is supported by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court in Bapu v. Bapu (11), where the learned Judges, after saying that they were not prepared to dissent from the above Full Bench ruling of the same High Court, proceeded to hold that the power conferred on the High Court by S. 195 (6), Criminal P. C. is not a part of its appellate and revisional jurisdiction but it is a special power conferred by S. 195 (6). This view has been held in a case decided by the Allahabad High Court (Piggott, J.) in 1915, namely, Ram Raja Dat v. Sheo Dayal (12), where the learned Judge observed:

"I wish also to note that I look upon an application under S. 195, Cl. (6), as standing on a very different footing from an application in revision. The right conferred by the clause above mentioned may not be exactly a right of appeal but it is strongly analogous to such right. I think the legislature intended that a Court of superior jurisdiction whose jurisdiction was invoked under S. 195, Cl. 6, Criminal P. C., should reconsider the entire matter on the merits and while allowing all reasonable weight to the opinion of the Court below, should nevertheless reconsider the question of the propriety of the order of sanction on its merits upon a complete review of the entire facts."

In Buho Lal v. Chattu Gope (13) of the Calcutta High Court (Sanderson, C. J., and Mookerji, J.) decided in 1916, Mookerji, J., observes as follows:

"In my opinion the controversy as to the rival claims of S. 115, Civil P. C. and S. 435 and 439, Criminal P. C. is based upon a misapprehension and one fallacy which underlies the decision of Pugh, J., in Ramdin Bania v. Sew Bahsh Singh (14) is the erroneous assumption that one of these sections must be applicable. The true view is that S. 195 creates a special jurisdiction as explained in Bapu v. Bapu (11), and provides in Cl. 6 the machinery for the correction of possible errors committed by the primary Court. Consequently upon well known principles the interference by the High Court must be attributed neither to S. 115, Civil P. C. nor to Ss. 435 and 439, Criminal P. C. As Lopes, L. J., observed in Reg v. Essex County Court Judge (15), in the case of an Act which creates a new jurisdiction, a new procedure, new forms, or new remedies, the procedure, forms and remedies there prescribed and no others must be followed. To the same effect is the exposition by Lord Halsbury in Pasmore v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council (16): "The principle that where a specific remedy is given by a statute it thereby deprives the person who insists upon a remedy of any other form of remedy than that given by the statute, is one which is very familiar and which runs through the law. In the case before us the machinery for correction of possible errors is provided in Cl. 6, S. 195, and consequently the party who seeks relief must have recourse thereto and cannot invoke the aid of S. 115, Civil P. C. or Ss. 435 and 439, Criminal P. C. The remedy provided is not restricted in scope; the superior tribunal is not limited to an examination of question of fact or questions of law alone but may upon a review of all the circumstances either affirm or reverse the order of the primary Court. It is thus immaterial whether the remedy provided in Cl. 6 is regarded as in the nature of an appeal or a revision."

The result of the above review of the authorities is that there is a distinct preponderance of authority in favour of the view that the High Court has the power to interfere with the order of the lower Court upon the merits of the case and that its powers are not confined to those under S. 115, Civil P. C. or those under Ss. 435 and 439, Criminal P. C. according as the case in hand is a civil or criminal case. I shall therefore, hold that I have power to go into the evidence and decide whether the order of the learned Divisional Judge granting sanction is a proper one or not.

Nagur Meera depends upon the evidence of two witnesses, namely, Muttu and Belu. The former described himself as a bicycle repairer and the latter as a money lender. I do not think the evidence of these two witnesses will do when we bear in mind that they were not called in the pro-note case and that the application for sanction appears to have been thought of only after the Divisional Judge's remarks that in his opinion the entries in question were forgeries. There is some explanation but none that is satisfactory as to how these two witnesses came forward. Nagur Meera says Mutu did not of his own motion tell him but he happened to question the witness, who then told him that he had at Po Aung's request written something about the receipt of money in Po Aung's book. Mutu swears that about six months before Po Aung went to him on two occasions, asking on one occasion to note the receipt of Rs. 300 and on the other receipt of Rs. 200 in his Po Aung's note book; he complied with the request by making a note in each case in the kala language. Belu corroborates Mutu. I do not think it is safe to convict Po Aung upon evidence such as this. The learned Divisional Judge says that there is circumstantial evidence besides, which is referred to by him in the pronote case. On reference to the record of that case I find the circumstantial evidence referred to is contained in the following sentence in the learned Judge's judgment:

"If defendant 2 was so anxious to have the payment put on the record why did he not have it noted on the pro-note which was there and available?"

I do not think we can safely go upon such a hypothesis as this. At any rate the hypothesis does not render the testimony of the two witnesses reliable which without it is unreliable. Such evidence as that of these two witnesses is on its own not obtainable. I would not myself convict upon such evidence. I shall, therefore, revoke the sanction granted by the Divisional Judge and it is hereby revoked.

MAUNG KIN AND RIGG, JJ.

Moulmein Rubber Plantation Co., Ltd., —Defendant—Appellant.

v.

C. W. Mitchell—Plaintiff—Respondent.

First Appeal No. 140 of 1917, Decided on 4th June 1918.

(a) Master and servant—Wrongful dismissal—What is not gross insolence and insubordination illustrated.

Plaintiff, an accountant in the defendant Company's service, preferred certain charges of a criminal nature against the local manager of the Company. The manager, while preparing an answer to the charges, wanted to remove one of the Company's registers from the office in order to show it to his counsel. Plaintiff stopped him and told him that under the Articles of Association of the Company he could not show the Company's registers to outsiders.

Held: that the plaintiff's conduct did not amount to gross insolence or insubordination so as to justify his dismissal by the Company.

* (b) Master and servant—Wrongful dismissal—Servant need not wait till expiry of term for which engaged to sue for damages.

A servant who has been improperly dismissed need not wait till the expiration of the term for which he was engaged to serve before bringing his action for damages.

* (c) Master and servant—Dismissal—Burden of proof that servant could have obtained another service is on master.

Though it is the duty of the servant who is discharged to seek employment, the onus rests on the person who denies his right to receive his wages in full to show that he could have obtained employment.

Maung Kin, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit by the plaintiff-respondent against the defendant-appellants for damages on the ground that the plaintiff was wrongfully dismissed from the service of the defendants. The plaintiff entered the service of the defendants on 3rd December 1915. He served them as an accountant until 15th December 1916, when he was suspended. On the 7th he was dismissed with effect from the date of his suspension. He claims Rupees 10,750 12-0 as damages. The defence denied the dismissal but pleaded justification. It appears that some time previous to the suspension of the plaintiff he and some other assistants at the estate office of the Company wrote a letter to the Secretary of the defendant Company making several charges of a criminal nature against Major Bradley, the Manager. Some correspondence passed between them and the Secretary, which culminated in the assistants sending Ex. K which contains specific details of the charges. Major Bradley was then called upon by the defendant Company to answer the charges. He sought the assistance of Mr. Sutherland, a barrister, who on 3rd December 1915 came to Major Bradley's bungalow on the estate in order to write a reply to the charges. The bungalow was a two-storied building, of which the downstairs portion was used as the office of the Company while the upstairs was used as residence for Major Bradley and his wife. On the 4th December Mr. Sutherland was upstairs with Major Bradley and was taking instructions from his client as to the charges, when Major Bradley went downstairs to fetch the permanent Establishment Register. He went up to Hla Pe, the head clerk's table and getting the book from him went through it for a little time and then proceeded to go upstairs carrying the book. Thereupon the plaintiff got up from his seat and went up to Major Bradley. He put his hand on Bradley's arm and then showing Ex. BB, which is the revised Articles of Association of the defendant Company spoke loudly to him and said that under a certain rule contained therein Major Bradley was not entitled to show the book to any outsider. Major Bradley, however, continued his journey upstairs with the book. He then sent a telegram to Mr. Dawn, the Managing Director of the defendant Company, to this effect:

"Sutherland here preparing explanations reference charges wished see Company's books Mitchell refuse access wire permission."

Major Bradley got the following reply (Ex. 4) from Mr. Dawn, "Have wired Mitchell give you access to books dismiss him if he refuses." On receipt of Ex. 4 Bradley wrote a letter (Ex. 5) to Mitchell asking for the keys of the office almirahs and saying that he had no doubt that Mitchell had received orders from the Managing Director that he (Bradley) was to have access to the office records. Mitchell noted on this letter the time of its receipt by him, namely, 12 noon, and wrote (Ex. 6) in reply to say that he had not received any orders from the Managing Director that Bradley was to have access to the office records. He further stated in that letter that he did not see why such orders should be sent to him when the books of the Company were open to Bradley's inspection at all times and he added that what he objected to was only the inspection of the Company's books by outsiders without the assent of the Board of Directors. At the time of the receipt of Ex. 5 and the writing of the reply Ex. 6 Mitchell was at lunch away from the office. It is clear that when Mitchell wrote Ex. 6 he had not received any orders, such as were alleged by Bradley, from the Directors. At 1 p. m. Mitchell received at the telegraph office a telegram (Ex. DD) from Mr. Dawn ordering him to allow Bradley access to the books. The tone of Ex. 6 was certainly impolite; but when considered in the light of what had actually happened, it must be held that Mitchell was only showing some measure of independence in maintaining the right as he conceived it to point out to Major Bradley that the books were not open to the inspection of any outsider. Had he received DD when he wrote Ex. 6, not only would his reply be impolite in tone but it would also be a lie. Under the circumstances I do not think that his conduct in writing that letter can be classed as being insubordinate. However that may be, in considering the question whether the plaintiff's dismissal was justified, I do not think that Ex. 6 can be taken into account. Major Bradley himself made no mention of it in writing to the Company afterwards about Mitchell's conduct towards him. The Company themselves did not charge the plaintiff with insubordinate or gross insolence in respect of the letter. The charge against him of insubordination or gross insolence was based on the incidents which occurred in the office on 4th December. The charge made against Mitchell by the Directors was as follows: "You have been directed to attend at this meeting to give you an opportunity of explaining your grossly insubordinate conduct to the Manager, Major Bradley, at the estate office on the 4th instant."

The Chairman read Major Bradley's letter to him complaining of the conduct of Mitchell and Mr. Sutherland's letter in corroboration of it, and then heard what Mitchell had to say. Mitchell said that he did not stand in front of Bradley nor did he grab hold of him, and that all he did was to touch him on the shoulder and tell him that if he as Manager wanted the books he could have them. He then drew Major Bradley's attention to Art. 98 of the Articles of Association. Major Bradley then told him to mind his own business and went upstairs. He admitted having spoken in a loud tone, but said that it was always necessary to do so to Major Bradley because he was deaf. He also stated that at the time there were present Maung Hla Pe and Maung Tun Aung, clerks, and Mr. Wend, a fitter, all servants of the defendant Company. In answer to Mr. Darwood, a Director, he said that he objected to Major Bradley taking the Permanent Register upstairs, because it contained matters which constituted evidence against Major Bradley for the charges he and the other assistants had made and because he thought that if they were altered the evidence would thereby be destroyed. In reply to Mr. Law, another Director, he said he thought Art 98 applied to the occasion but that he might have done so wrongly. Mitchell then withdrew from the meeting and the Directors, after consideration, held that Mitchell's behaviour towards Major Bradley was grossly improper and insubordinate and dismissed him. Considering that Mr. Sutherland saw nothing but only heard Mitchell's voice and afterwards the story of the occurrences from Major Bradley which must have been given in an excited manner, I think the defendant Company should have examined the witnesses named by Mitchell before they took any action against him. The only question we have to consider is as to whether the charge of insubordination and grossly improper conduct with reference to the incidents of the 4th December has been proved. I do not think that it is relevant to inquire into the question whether, as now charged by the defendant Company, Mitchell, for about 2 months prior to his dismissal, treated Major Bradley with veiled insolence, for that was not a part of the charge made against Mitchell. I agree with the learned District Judge in holding that Major Bradley took an exaggerated view of Mitchell's conduct towards him. It has been clearly proved by the evidence of the Burman clerks and the fitter and also of Mrs. Bradley herself that, when people wished to attract the Major's attention, they touched him, as he was very deaf. The Burman clerks and the fitter all corroborate Mitchell's version of occurrence and I can find no reason why they should have sworn falsely in favour of Mitchell, seeing that they are still in the employ of the defendant Company and that Mitchell was not financially in a position to tempt them from the path of rectitude. I agree with the learned District Judge in saying that, considering the strained relations that existed, Mitchell must have put his hand on Major Bradley's arm somewhat too roughly, because at the time he must have been excited and was certainly hurrying up to the Major.

Mr. Sutherland, who was upstairs, might have attributed the loud voice to the intention of Mitchell to be impertinent and insubordinate to his manager. Upon the evidence there may be room for thinking that Mitchell was somewhat insolent to Major Bradley, but none for saying that his conduct was gross insolence or insubordination. He was the accountant in charge of the books of account and had in conjunction with other assistants made charges of a criminal nature against Bradley and was greatly under the impression that the books were, as he said in his evidence, his only safeguard and when Major Bradley took one of the books away in order to show it to an outsider out of his sight he thought he had a right to object to his doing so. And, as the learned District Judge says, he being an accountant, and not a manager, must be allowed some measure of independence. I think that when he raised the objection, he honestly believed that he had the right to do so and although he may have done so in an impertinent manner his conduct was not, in my opinion, such as warranted a dismissal. I would, therefore, hold that his dismissal was not justified. It is a question whether one act of gross insolence would justify dismissal or not, see Edwards v. Leary (1), but I have held that there was no gross insolence which warranted dismissal. Therefore, it is not necessary for us to consider the question. The learned District Judge considered that a 2 months' salary without alternative would be a just and adequate compensation for the plaintiff's wrongful dismissal. I do not think the learned Judge was wrong in doing so.

The learned Judge came to this conclusion after considering the law on the subject as stated in Halsbury's Laws of England, MacDonell's Master and Servant, in Sowden v. Mills (2), Hartland v. General Exchange Bank (3). At para 624, Vol. 10, Halsbury's Laws of England, it is stated that in actions for wrongful dismissal the plaintiff may recover the wages for the whole unexpired period of service including wages due at the date of dismissal. At p. 160 of MacDonell's Master and Servant, Vol. 2, it is stated that a servant who has been improperly dismissed need not wait till the expiration of the term for which he was engaged to serve before bringing his action with the qualification, as stated at p. 159 ibid. that though it is the duty of the servant who is discharged to seek employment, the onus rests with the person who dis-nies his right to receive his wages in full to show that he could have obtained employment. In Sowden v. Mills (2) Lord Blackburn says:

"If an action is brought by a servant for a wrongful dismissal soon after the dismissal, the Judge tells the jury that they must speculate on the chance of his getting a new place and ease their damages on that."

In Hartland v. General Exchange Bank (3) the plaintiff had been engaged for three years and was wrongfully dismissed at the end of four months, the jury were told that they should not give him the whole of his salary for the unexpired portion of the term of three years but that they should take into account the probability of his obtaining other employment. Considering that Mitchell had two years more to serve when he was dismissed and considering also how hard it is to get work in these days and having regard also to the fact that Mitchell has proved that he did seek to obtain employment but failed, I think the damages allowed by the District Judge were not excessive. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal with costs.

Rigg, J.—I concur in thinking that there is no proof of such gross insolence on 4th December on the part of Mitchell as warranted his dismissal. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Nga Tun Kaing—Accused.

Criminal Revn. No. 68-A of 1917, Decided on 28th May 1917, against order of Special Magistrate, Myaungmya, D/- 19th December 1916.

Penal Code (1860), S. 376—Attempt to commit rape—Boy of twelve can be held guilty of offence.

A person physically incapable of committing the offence of rape, i. e., a boy 12 years, can yet be held guilty of an attempt to commit it.

Order.—The accused, a little boy of twelve, has been found guilty of an attempt to commit rape upon a little girl of four. The girl's parts were found to be bruised. The accused was convicted of an attempt to commit rape. In England the rule at Common law is that a boy under fourteen is under a physical incapacity to commit the offence of rape and that is a prossumptio juris et de jure and

Judges have from time to time refused to receive evidence to show that a particular prisoner was in fact capable of committing the offence. In Reg v. Williams (1) the prisoner being under the age of fourteen, it was held by Lord Coleridge, C. J., Hawkins, Cave, Day and Collins, JJ., that he was entitled to be acquitted of having had carnal knowledge of a girl of 13 but that he was guilty of an indecent assault. But the question whether the boy would have been convicted of an attempt at rape was expressly left an open question by Hawkins and Day, JJ. The former said:

"I do not assent to the notion that a boy cannot be convicted of an attempt to do that which the law says he cannot do."

In India, there seems to be no ruling except in the unreported case of Gopala Rama, which is quoted in Ratanlal's Law of Crimes at p. 762 from Unreported Criminal Cases 866. The volume cited is not available. There it is stated to have been held that a person physically incapable of committing the offence of rape cannot be held guilty of an attempt to commit it. The point to consider is whether that view is correct. In Queen v. Ramsaran Chombey (2) Turner, J., says: "To constitute then the offence of attempt under this S. 511, there must be an act done with the intention of committing an offence, and for the purpose of committing that offence it must be done in attempting the commission of the offence."

Having regard to the above definition and to the fact that it is not necessary to prove omission in a charge of rape, but only penetration, I think the offence committed was an attempt to commit rape.

K.N./R.K. Conviction upheld.

v.

Mi Me Baw—Opposite Party.

Civil Revn. No. 147 of 1916, Decided on 5th June 1917.

Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 488—Maintenance—Father paying maintenance of child under order of Court is not bound to pay for medical attendance.

A father who is paying maintenance for his child under the orders of a Court is not bound to defray the charges for the medical attendance of the child, unless he has expressly or impliedly contracted to pay the same. [P 97 C 1]

Kyaw Htoon—for Applicant

Judgment.—Mi Me Baw sued her former husband Phaung Tha Rhi for Rupees 17-4-0, the amount of the medical bill tendered by the medical attendance of her son by the defendant. The parties had been divorced, their son being taken by the mother while the father promised to pay her Rs. 10 per month for the maintenance of the child. The child fell ill and a doctor attended on him and then presented the above bill. According to the doctor he has been paid Rs. 6 by the plaintiff and therewith remains Rs. 11-4-0 unpaid. I do not understand how she came to sue for 17-4-0 when she had paid only Rs. 6. She cannot sue for what she has not paid or for what she has paid, because the latter amount must have come out of the monthly allowance. Even if she had paid the whole amount out of her own pocket, the monthly allowance having been spent on other requirements of the boy, there is no obligation on the part of the father to pay fees for medical attendance, unless he has expressly or impliedly contracted to pay the same. In Mortimore v. Wright (1) it was held that the moral obligation which a father is under to provide for his child imposes no liability to pay the debts incurred by the child and that he is not so liable, unless he has given the child authority to incur them or has contracted to pay them. In Pluck v. Tollemache (2) it was held that a father is not bound to pay for clothes furnished to his son, without some contract, express or implied, on his part to do so.

In Urmsion v. Newcomen (3) the question was whether a father deserting his infant child would be liable in assumption to a party who supplied the child with necessities, no further proof of contract being given. It was held that no such action can be maintained, if the father had reasonable ground to suppose that the child was provided for. The above authorities seem to me to be against the plaintiff, even if she could prove that the monthly allowance not being available for the purpose of paying the bill, she had paid the whole of the amount of her own pocket. The application is allowed and the decree of the lower Court is set aside. I shall however make no order as to costs of this application, as I think the defendant, being able to pay, as he is a well-to-do broker, should have considered himself morally bound to pay.

K.N./R.K. Application allowed.

Joseph Heap & Sons, Ltd.—Defendants.
Civil Regular Suit No. 57 of 1915, Decided on 31st May 1917.

(a) Contract Act (1872), Ss. 37 and 38—Requirements of valid offer of performance of contract stated.—There must be actual attempt to perform.

The offer of performance to be valid, it must be complete and must satisfy all the requirements of the contract as to delivery of goods—where the contract requires delivery at a particular place, the goods must be delivered at that place. Where the contract requires delivery of goods at a particular place, the offer of performance must be made at that place. Where the contract requires delivery of goods at a particular place, the offer of performance must be made at that place. Where the contract requires delivery of goods at a particular place, the offer of performance must be made at that place.

Held, that this was a valid offer of performance within the meaning of S. 37, Contract Act, inasmuch as the bill was not tendered at the defendant's mill. (1910 G 2)

(b) Interpretation of Statutes.—Illustrations—Value of.—They must be accepted as relevant and as explaining section.

It is the duty of a court to construe, if that can be done, illustrations given under the sections of a statute as being of such relevance and value in the construction of the text, and they should in no case be rejected because they do not square with ideas derived from another system of jurisprudence as to the law with which they or the sections deal. H. Cowanji—for Plaintiffs.

Counsel and Barristers—for Defendants.

Judgment.—In this suit Messrs. Kavin Kassim Janoo & Co. sue Messrs. Joseph Heap & Sons, Ltd., for breach of contract, dated 14th July 1914, under which they undertook to buy from the plaintiff 50,000 baskets of rail and box paddy at the price of Rs. 121 per 100 baskets of 15 lbs. each and for Rs. 10,721 damages made up as follows: Rs. 10,500 the difference between the contract price and the market rate, survey fees Rupees 192 and Rs. 29 certain railway and godown charges in respect of certain paddy tendered but not accepted.

The sole stipulations in the contract were that the paddy was to be "free from yellows" and was to be delivered into Messrs. Heap's cargo boats at their Pazundaung siding within July and August: vide Ex. P, the bought note. On 27th

July the plaintiff's tendered seven wagon loads of paddy to the defendants which were not accepted. According to the defendants they contained new unripe grain, which plaintiffs agreed to replace as they were able to sell it at a profit: vide defendant's letter of 5th August 1914 — (Ex. C). The plaintiffs, though it is admitted that they sold the paddy in question at a profit, took exception to the defendant's act and wrote to them on July 30th, saying that the paddy had been rejected on the ground that it was new paddy and alleging that they had a perfect right to tender new paddy provided it was free from yellows and asking if they were going to reject all new paddy as they only intended to deliver such, and if they intended to reject it, it was no use going to the expense of formally tendering it. They also asked if it was rejected on any other ground. On 5th August, having received no reply, they again wrote and asked whether the defendants claimed that under the contract they were entitled to get old paddy and would refuse to take new paddy of the quality last tendered. On the same day the defendants wrote to them the letter already mentioned, in which they replied that their contract had always been for ripe sound grain of 1913-14 and not of new 1914 crop, but that the question of non-acceptance had never arisen. This last sentence was an allusion to their contention that the tender had been withdrawn so to speak by consent, as the plaintiffs were able to dispose of it elsewhere to better advantage. It may however be remarked that this contention was given up in the written statement, in which the defendants admitted that they had rejected the paddy as not being of contract quality. The defendants also stated that the plaintiffs had agreed to replace the paddy with good sound paddy. On 7th August the plaintiffs replied denying that they had promised to replace the paddy with paddy of any other quality and asking the defendants to state definitely whether they would take paddy of the quality which had been tendered and rejected. The defendants replied the following day reiterating their assertion that the question of acceptance or non-acceptance had never arisen and stating that until paddy was tendered, they were not in a position either to accept or reject it.

At this stage of the dispute there were two courses open to the plaintiffs which were either to treat the defendants' conduct as tantamount to a wrongful putting an end to the contract and use them for the breach, or to continue the contract. The plaintiffs elected to adopt the latter course and tendered three more wagon loads which were again rejected, whereupon the plaintiffs again wrote on August 20th, Ex. F, to the defendants asking for the reasons of such rejection. The defendants replied on 22nd August that they had rejected it because it again consisted of new crop grain and was damaged, and on 29th August the plaintiffs wrote as follows:

"Referring to previous correspondence we have to point out that you have twice rejected paddy tendered to you on grounds which our clients consider untenable. We are now instructed to tender 14,300 bags of paddy now lying at Moola Dawood's Dawbong Mill. We have to request you to examine this paddy and say whether you will accept it. If you will, our client will cause it to be brought to your mill at once."

The defendants replied the same day declining to accept tender except at their own mill in the customary manner, and the plaintiffs then wrote on August 31st to the defendants stating that it was apparent that they did not intend to take the paddy under any circumstances and adding as follows:

"We hereby give you notice that as you have refused to take delivery of paddy of the quality mentioned in the contract, our client hereby cancels the contract."

From these words it is quite clear, and the plaintiffs do not contend to the contrary, that whether the defendant's previous conduct might or might not have justified the plaintiffs in putting an end to the contract, they had not done so, but had elected to keep it alive until the defendants' refusal to inspect and state whether they would accept the 14,300 bags of paddy lying at Moola Dawood's Dawbong Mill. Up to this stage they kept the contract alive and as pointed out in Frost v. Knight (1), kept it alive for the benefit of the defendants as well as their own and enabled the defendants to take advantage of any supervening circumstance which would justify them in declining to complete it. The defendants claim that this request that they should examine these 14,300 bags at Moola Dawood's Dawbong Mill was such a supervening circumstance, inasmuch as it was no tender or offer of performance within the meaning of the law and that therefore the present suit must be dismissed. They rely upon Ss. 37 and 38, Contract Act. S. 37 provides that the parties to a contract must either perform or offer to perform their respective promises, unless such performance is dispensed with or excused under any law. Whatever rights the defendant's former rejections might have conferred upon the plaintiffs with regard to cancelling the contract, had been admittedly waived by the plaintiffs and unless their letter of 29th August constituted a valid offer of performance, they cannot, in my opinion, be said either to have performed or to have offered to perform their promise or to be entitled to say that the defendants had wrongfully omitted to perform in turn their own promise, whether it was a rightful offer of performance depends upon the construction of S. 38, which provides inter alia that an offer to perform must be unconditional and made at a proper place and time. Here the contract was to deliver paddy within July or August. It was offered within this period and there is, therefore, no objection as to time, but the contract also provided that it was to be delivered into buyers' cargo boat at the Pazundaung siding, and plaintiff's offer was not to deliver there, but to give inspection at Moola Dawood's Dawbend Mill and then deliver at defendants' mill if defendants agreed to accept it. Can this be said to be an offer to perform at a proper place? What is meant by a proper place is not explained in S. 38, presumably because it is in each case a question of fact whether the place is or is not proper except that as we see from the illustration, when a place for performance has been mentioned in the contract, that place is the proper place also for the offer to perform. The illustration, runs as follows:

"A contracts to deliver to B at his warehouse on 1st March 1873, 100 bales of cotton of a particular quality. In order to make an offer of performance with the effect stated in this section, A must bring the cotton to B's warehouse on the appointed day."

Words could hardly be more emphatic or plain than the words "in order to make an offer of performance with the effect stated" and in Mohamed Syedol Ariffin v. Yeoh Ooi Gark (2) the Privy Council laid down

"that it is the duty of a Court of law to accept,

if that can be done, the illustrations given are being both of relevance and value in the construction of the Act, and that they should in no case be rejected because they do not square with ideas possibly derived from another system of jurisprudence as to the law with which they or the sections deal."

This was laid down in an appeal not from India but from the Strait Settlements, but the law laid down is clearly of general application and was, moreover, enunciated with regard to a section reproduced from the Indian Evidence Act, as the judgment in question elsewhere states. The illustration is, therefore, both of relevance and value, and, as here, it so emphatically states that "in order to make an offer of performance with the effect stated in this section" certain things are essential, it seems to follow that if these essentials are not complied with, the offer of performance cannot have the effect stated in the section. In the case of Mohamed Syedol Ariffin v. Yeoh Ooi Gark (2) the Court of Appeal of the Strait Settlements had held it safer to construe the section and illustrations on English lines, and their Lordships reprobated this; but in the present case if we turn to English law, we find that the law of tender is exactly the same in this respect as that laid down in the illustration. I can see no difference between a tender and an offer of performance. In Baker on Contracts, Edn. 4, p. 523, we find the two words used interchangeably for the same act. He writes as follows:

"When a contract is one it may be discharged by performance according to the terms. A promise may be available for performance independently of any act or concurrence on the part of the promisee or it may be incapable of complete performance without some act or concurrence upon his part. Where the performance is dependent upon the concurrence of the promisee, the promisee discharges his liability by a tender or offer of performance, so far as it can be completed on his part."

A promise to deliver goods is clearly a promise that cannot be completely performed without the concurrence of the promisee: Startup v. Macdonald (3). But unless the offer is made at the place specified in the contract, the offer cannot be said to be as complete as it was possible for the promisor to make it. Again in Anson's Law of Contracts Edn. 12, p. 313, we read that "tender is an attempt to perform frustrated by the act of the other party," and again that

3. (1843) 6 Man & G 203=7 Scott N R 269.

"where in a contract for the sale of goods the vendor satisfies all the requirements of the contract as to delivery and the purchaser nevertheless refuses to accept the goods, the vendor is discharged and may either maintain or defend successfully an action for the breach of the contract."

Again it follows that unless the vendor has offered to perform at the place specified in the contract, he has not satisfied all the requirements of the contract as to delivery. Parke, B., in the same case of Startup v. Macdonald (3) at p. 624, stated as follows:

"Where the thing to be done is to be performed at a certain place the tender must be to the other party at that place."

This particular case turned on the question of time rather than of place, but the authorities are quite sufficient to establish the proposition that English law is fully as strict as the illustration. S. 47 lays down in India the law as regards time and place for performance and I have no doubt that the offer to perform, to be a valid offer, must follow the same rule as laid down in the illustration to S. 38 and that as Parke, B., stated at p. 623, the law has fixed the rule and it is not to be left to a jury to be determined as a question of practical convenience or reasonableness in each case. In my opinion therefore for an offer of performance to be valid, it must be complete and must satisfy all the requirements of the contract as to delivery; it must, where the contract requires delivery at a particular place, be an attempt to deliver at that place. In their letter of 29th August the promisees seem to have waived delivery at their Pazundaung siding and consented to take it at their own Dawbong Mill; they were, of course, entitled to do this, but I think they were fully within their rights in declining to inspect at Moola Dawood's Mill or to accept tender of paddy at any place other than that mentioned in the contract or agreed to by both parties. The two mills seem to have been at most only about half a mile apart; but this seems to me immaterial. In England the rules are so strict that a tender of a large sum of money accompanied by a demand for exchange is invalid; the tender or offer to perform must be in accordance with the contract.

This was not such an offer. The plaintiffs themselves recognized this for they said that if the defendants would pass the paddy at Mulla Dawood's Mill they would then deliver it at the defendants mill. There was no such term in the contract, and they could not import it. I must, therefore hold that there was no valid offer of performance and that plaintiffs' suit must be dismissed so far as the two first and main items are concerned. As regards the small claim of Rs. 29 it was practically disregarded by counsel. It arose out of the second tender of three wagon loads; the defendants had a claim against the plaintiffs for certain gunny bags, and claimed a lien on this paddy for the payment, and detained it for some days. I do not see that they were entitled to any lien and I think they are entitled to be reimbursed this amount. The result is that the suit must be dismissed with costs on Rs. 10,721 less Rs. 29 for Rs. 10,692 and the defendants must pay the plaintiffs or deduct from their costs the sum of Rs. 29.

Aung Ma Khaing—Appellant,

v.

Mi Ah Bon—Respondent.

Civil Misc. Appeal No. 166 of 1916, Decided on 11th December 1917.

(a) Probate and Administration Act (5 of 1881), S. 23—Enquiry into question of adoption where rival claimants right to letters depended upon such decision held proper.

Where the full sister and an alleged adopted daughter of the deceased whose adoption was disputed applied for Letters of Administration to the estate of the deceased:

Held: that inasmuch as in the event of the adoption being established the sister would not under the Buddhist law be entitled to any share in the estate, the Court would be justified in going into the question of adoption. [P 101 C 1]

(b) Buddhist Law (Burmese)—Adoption by divorced woman is as good as by single woman.

Under the Buddhist law as regards the power to adopt, a woman who is divorced from her husband and has divided the joint property with him is in the same position as a single woman.

(c) Buddhist Law (Burmese)—Adoption—Formality—Adoption is matter of intention and is good without formal declaration.

An adoption is to a great extent a matter of intention and where an attempted adoption by a married woman causes a divorce between her and her husband but the intention to adopt continues after the divorce and full effect is given to it, there is a good adoption without any formal declaration. [P 101 C 2]

Ba Dun—for Appellant.

J. E. Lambert—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The present respondent Mi Ah Bon applied for Letters of Administration to the estate of Chi Ma Pru, who died in May 1916. The present appellant Anug Ma Khaing opposed the application, alleging that she was an adopted daughter of the deceased. She is also the natural half niece of the deceased. Mi Ah Bon is the full sister of the deceased. Ma Khaing appeals from the order of the District Judge granting Letters of Administration to Mi Ah Bon. Mr. Lambert for Mi Ah Bon contends upon the authority of Ma Tak v. Ma Thi (1) that Mi Ah Bon was entitled to Letters of Administration inasmuch as she was an admitted relation and the adoption of Ma Khaing was in dispute; but that decision refers to the case of an admitted heir and if the adoption of Ma Khaing in this case is proved, Mi Ah Bon would not be an heir. She would not be a person entitled to Letters of Administration under S. 23, Probate and Administration Act, because she would not be entitled to any share in the estate. The District Judge has taken, we consider, a correct view of the case cited. He took the evidence in support of the adoption which lasted a whole day, and then decided that it would be waste of time to take the evidence against the adoption, because it was shown that the deceased Chi Ma Pru adopted Ma Khaing against the wish of her husband. In consequence of this adoption by Chi Ma Pru there was a divorce between her and her husband by mutual consent and a division of their property was made. The learned Judge was of opinion that a sole woman can adopt but that a married woman cannot adopt without the consent of her husband and that the adoption of Ma Khaing, at its inception being invalid, could not become valid after the divorce without some formal adoption or re-adoption in order to place her in the position of a child who had been adopted with a view to inherit. No authorities have been cited to show that a single woman cannot adopt. In the case of Ma Ba Lone v. Ma Mya Sin (2) it was taken for granted that a spinster could adopt. Mr. May Qang in his work on Buddhist law remarks that it is quite usual for widows to adopt.

There is no reason in principle why a woman who is divorced from her husband and has divided the joint property with him should be in a different position as regards the power to adopt. It seems probable, as held by the District Judge in this case, that a married woman living with her husband cannot adopt without his consent. But an adoption is to a great extent a matter of intention and if Chi Ma Pru's intention to adopt Ma Khaing continued after the divorce and full effect was then given to that intention, there would be a good adoption without any formal declaration. From the evidence, so far as it has been taken, it would appear that Chi Ma Pru's intention was to adopt Ma Khaing; that such attempted adoption was the cause of the divorce and that Chi Ma Pru's intention continued after the divorce and that she paid effect to it. The case is remanded in order that Mi Ah Bon may be allowed an opportunity of adducing evidence to show that Ma Khaing was not adopted; and the District Court will dispose of the application in accordance with the above remarks. The costs of this appeal will abide the final result.

Baman Khan and another Plaintiff—and Defendants—Respondents.

Special First Appeal Nos. 81 and 119 of 1916. Decided on 15th February 1917, against Decree of Hon. E. C. Judge, Rangoon, in Civil Reg. No. 7966 of 1915.

Civil P. C. (1908) Sec. 16, 19 and 20—Promise to repay loan at certain place—Creditor is not entitled to sue at that place solely by that reason unless promise is for consideration or falls under S. 25 (2), Contract Act (1872).

A promise to pay what one is already under an obligation to pay, is a promise without any consideration and does not give rise to any cause of action. Therefore, a promise by a debtor to repay the loan at a certain place for the sake of the creditor's convenience does not entitle the creditor to sue at that place solely by reason of it, unless the promise is supported by consideration, or is one falling under S. 25 (2), Contract Act: 8 M. Judgment.—In the Small Cause Court, Rangoon, the plaintiff sued for the recovery of Rs. 1,681-8-0, the balance found due at a settlement of accounts made between him and defendants 1 and 2 at Twante.

The transaction to which the settlement related was an agreement entered into at Twante between them, for the plaintiff to manufacture kutch bricks at Twante at a certain rate. Defendant 3 is sued as having guaranteed payment. Defendant 4 was added as a party defendant after the institution of the suit in consequence of his claim to have a share in the subject matter of the suit. All the defendants reside at Twante. The plaintiff, however, claims to be entitled to sue in Rangoon by reason of an alleged promise of the defendants made at the settlement of accounts to pay the amount found due to the plaintiff at his house in Rangoon on a later date. Defendants 1 and 2 plead among other things to the jurisdiction of the Court. The lower Court held that the said promise to pay at Rangoon gave it jurisdiction to entertain the suit, and after hearing the case on the merits passed a decree for a certain sum against defendants 1, 2 and 3. Defendants 1 and 3 now object that the lower Court had no jurisdiction. After carefully considering the law on the subject I have come to the conclusion that the objection must be upheld. It is clear that without the promise to pay at Rangoon, the suit must be filed at Twante, being the place where the original contract was entered into and was to be performed or where the balance was struck and the amount became due and payable. In my judgment what gave rise to the cause of action was the original contract which was made or was to be performed at Twante or the settlement of accounts which was made at the same place: see Luckmee Chund v. Zorawur Mull (1). The promise in question was no part of the settlement and it is at best a promise to pay what the defendants were already under an obligation to pay either under the original contract or under the settlement of account and as it is a promise without any consideration, it can give rise to no cause of action. If it was part of the original contract as indicating the place of performance, then there can be no doubt it will give the Rangoon Court jurisdiction. But that was not the case. I am unable to see how it can form part of the settlement of accounts, as on the balance being struck the amount found due became payable without any promise on the part of the defendants to pay. My view is supported by authority. As to the nature of the promise, there is the case of Kankani v. Maung Po Yin (2), where it was held that a naked promise to pay what the promisor is already under an obligation to pay gives rise to no cause of action. In Seshagiri Row v. Nawab Askur Jung Aftai Dowlah Mushral Muk (3) the plaintiff sued the defendant at Madras for services rendered at Hyderabad, where also the contract was made, alleging a promise, after the work had been done, to pay at Madras.

It was held that as there was no allegation of any consideration for the promise and as it was not a promise falling under S. 25 (2), Contract Act, there was no contract in law to pay at Madras, which would give the Madras Courts jurisdiction. There is no difference between this case and the case before me. The real thing to pay attention to is that the promise of the defendants was separate and apart from the settlement of the accounts, which, without any promise on their part to pay their amount found due, would have given rise to a cause of action. Therefore any separate promise made to pay the amount at any particular place must be supported by a consideration, before it can give rise to legal consequences. It was rightly conceded before me that if, after a contract of loan has been made, the debtor makes a promise to repay the loan at a certain place for the sake of the creditor's convenience, the promise cannot entitle the creditor to sue at that place solely by reason of it, unless it is supported by a consideration. For the above reasons I am bound to hold that the lower Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. I allow the appeal with costs and direct that the plaint be returned to the plaintiff for presentation to the proper Court.

In No. 119 of 1916.

For the reasons appearing in my judgment in Special Civil First Appeal No. 81 of 1916, heard together with this, I dismiss this appeal with costs. The appellant will pay the court fees which would have been paid by him in this appeal as well as in the original suit, if he was not permitted to sue as a pauper.

Misc. Appeal No. 99 of 1916, Decided on 7th June 1917.

Limitation Act (1908), Sch. I, Art. 182—Application for transfer of decree to another Court without certified copy of—Decree is step-in-aid of execution.

An application for execution of a decree by transfer to another Court, though not accompanied by a certified copy of the decree and though the decree is not transferred, is a step-in-aid of execution within the meaning of Art. 182, Limitation Act, and serves to save the decree from being barred by limitation. Case-law the point considered. [F 104 C 13]

Campagne—for Appellant.

Nariman—for Respondent.

Judgment.—In Suit No. 12 of 1911 of the Sub-Divisional Court of Kynaktan, Ana Mahalingam sued Pazma Sooml and obtained an attachment before judgment. The attachment was subsequently raised by Curpen Chetty executing a bond as surety for the amount of the decree. After this the suit was transferred to the District Court for disposal. That Court passed a decree on 4th March 1911. On 5th April 1911 the plaintiff applied to the District Court for execution against Curpen Chetty. The Court held that Curpen Chetty was bound under the bond to the Sub-Divisional Judge and referred him to the Sub-Divisional Court. On 30th September 1913 plaintiff applied to the Sub-Divisional Court for the execution of the decree by the enforcement of the bond, without having previously applied to the District Court for the transfer of the decree with a certificate of its non-satisfaction and without attaching a certified copy of the decree. But as the bond could not be found no further action was taken either by the plaintiff or by the Court. On 11th March 1914 the plaintiff again applied to the District Court for execution by the arrest of the judgment-debtor and the Chetty surety. This application was dismissed on the ground that it had already been held that the bond could not be enforced by the District Court and as that decision was not appealed against, the application was barred by res judicata. The plaintiff appealed from this order of dismissal but was unsuccessful. On 3rd March 1915 the plaintiff again applied to the Sub-Divisional Court for execution by the enforcement of the bond. That Court held that the application was time-barred. On appeal to the Divisional Court it was held that the application was not time-barred and the case was remanded for decision on the merits. The defendant appeals to this Court.

It is contended that the application of 5th April 1911 to the District Court was not an application for execution, or a step-in-aid of execution, in accordance with law, as it was made to the wrong Court and should be disregarded, as also the application of 11th March 1914. The contention is obviously correct. By reason of the ruling in the case of Narayan v. Timmaya (1) the application of 11th March 1911, though also against the judgment-debtor and in order in regard to him, does not save limitation in regard to the surety. We have then left for our consideration only the question whether the application to the Sub-Divisional Court of 30th September 1913 would save limitation for the application in question here of the 3rd March 1915. Mr. Campagne for the defendant contended that the application of 30th September was not in form in accordance with law, inasmuch as it was not accompanied by a certified copy of the decree and no application had been made for the transfer of the decree to the Sub-Divisional Court as required by law and as more than three years had elapsed from the date of the decree to the date of the present application. If 30th September is left out of consideration, the present application is barred by limitation under Art. 182, Lim. Act. The Bombay case of Saivashiva Raghunath v. Ramchandra Chintaman (2) supports the learned counsel's contention. But this case was dissented from by the Madras High Court in Pachiappa Achari v. Poojali Seenan (3). In the latter case as in the Bombay case the defect relied on was the failure to produce a copy of the decree sought to be executed and it was held that the defect had reference to an extraneous matter and the application, though ac-accompanied by such a defect, was in accordance with law.

In a later Bombay case of Ramchandra Sadashiv v. Laxman Sadashiv (4) the Madras case cited above was followed and it was said in regard to the Bombay case cited above that Chandavarkar, J., who was a party to it, would no longer adhere to the decision of his colleague, who pronounced the judgment. So that case was not followed. The Full Bench case of the Calcutta High Court, reported as Gopal Chunder Manna v. Gosain Das Kalay (5), may be cited in support of the Madras and the later Bombay cases, as it was therein held that material defects only could vitiate an application for execution. Another Bombay case Vinayak Vaman v. Ananda Ramji (6), decided in 1903 may also be cited as denying the correctness of the view contended for by Mr. Campagnac. There is also the Allahabad case of Abdul Majid v. Muhammad Faizullah (7), which may also be cited against Mr. Campagnac's contention. I, therefore, hold that by reason of the application of 4th March 1911 the application now in question is not barred by limitation, though it was not accompanied by a certified copy of the decree and though the decree has not been transferred to the Sub-Divisional Court for execution. The appeal is dismissed with costs and the case will, therefore, be sent back to the Sub-Divisional Court for decision upon the merits as ordered by the Divisional Court.

(b) Lower Burma Courts Act (1900), S. 12—Case referred to Bench under S. 12—On ground of misdirection to Jury—Misdirection amounting to illegality—Trial is void—Bench cannot deal with evidence in case—Procedure—Letters Patent S. 26—Criminal P. C. (1898) Ss. 423 and 439.

Pet. Robinson, J.—In a case referred to a Bench of Chief Court under S. 12 on ground of misdirection to Jury if the misdirection amounts to an illegality, the trial is void and of no effect and the Bench cannot deal with the evidence in the case. If, however, the misdirection is not of that character but is a wrong admission of evidence or a misinterpretation of it, the Bench can go into the evidence. Where the guilt or innocence of the accused depends on evidence consisting of several separate and distinct parts and where the part tainted by the misdirection can be separated from the rest and it is clear that the misdirection has not affected in any way the finding of the Jury on the remainder of the evidence, the Bench can and should consider whether the finding is justified if the objectionable evidence is left entirely out of consideration. If it is justified, the conviction and sentence should be maintained. In doing so the Bench would not be usurping the functions of the Jury but merely reviewing and checking their finding. Dawson and Kyaw Htoon—for Applicant.

Higinbotham—for the Crown.

ORMOND, OFFG. C. J.—This is an application under S. 12, Lower Burma Courts Act, upon the certificate of the Government Advocate to review the case of King Emperor v. Petitioner Nga Thein Myin which was tried at the last Sessions of this Court, upon the ground of misdirection. The petitioner was found guilty by a unanimous verdict of committing mischief by fire, an offence under S. 436, I. P. C. There was evidence to show that the petitioner was seen in the room where the fire originated, when the fire was first discovered. In his examination before the Magistrate, the petitioner said, "after that at about 11 o'clock upon coming back to my house I learnt of the fire in the house and of the people of the quarter having combined and put it out."

The statement was wrongly translated by the Court translator as follows:

"Then at about 11 P. M. I came home and found the house burning and the local people trying to put out the fire."

This statement was read out to the Jury as the statement of the accused and the learned Judge commented to the Jury on the fact that the accused admitted that he was present at the fire and saw the people putting it out. The Judge by mistake put to the Jury, as being a statement made by the accused to the Magistrate, a statement which the accused did not make. It was clearly a case of misdirection which might possibly have had a material effect upon the minds of the Jury when forming their verdict, seeing that the case rested upon the identification of the accused. Mr. Dawson for the petitioner contends that having found there was a misdirection, the only course open to this Court is to set aside the conviction and sentence. He contends that this Court cannot now go into the facts with a view either of convicting or acquitting the accused—because that would be usurping the functions of a Jury; and that this Court cannot order a re-trial—because that power is not expressly mentioned in S. 12 and that it is not the practice of this Court to do so. S. 12, Lower Burma Courts Act, is very similar to Art. 26 of the Letters Patent; and the provisions of S. 537 of the Code and of S. 167, Evidence Act, apply to proceedings under S. 12.

Counsel for the Crown contends that both these sections apply to the present case and that under S. 167 this Court must go into the facts and see whether the evidence that should have been before the jury justifies the decision. Strictly speaking there has been no improper admission or rejection of evidence and I doubt if S. 167, Evidence Act applies. But even if it does, I think the effect of both these sections, when dealing with the verdict of a Jury, is the same. This Court has to consider what effect the improper admission or rejection of evidence or the irregularity or misdirection might have had upon the decision of the jury. It is the duty of this Court to go sufficiently into the facts to determine whether there is a reasonable possibility that upon a proper trial a Jury might come to a finding different to the finding that would commend itself to this Court or not. If there is no such reasonable possibility, then it is the duty of this Court to confirm or alter the judgment in accordance with the finding come to by this Court. But if in the opinion of this Court there is a reasonable possibility that a Jury might either acquit or convict, it would be a proper case for a re-trial, for in such a case this Court would not be satisfied that "independently of the evidence wrongly admitted a Jury would consider that there was sufficient evidence to justify the previous decision or that if the rejected evidence had been received, the Jury would not have varied the decision."

And the accused being entitled to have the verdict of a jury, failure of justice might be occasioned if the finding of this Court on the facts were to prevail in a case where there is reasonable possibility of a jury coming to a different finding. In this view, the provisions of S. 167, Evidence Act, and S. 537 of the Code would be fully complied with and the right of the accused to be convicted solely upon the verdict of a jury would be preserved. S. 12 authorizes this Court to alter the judgment, order or sentence and to pass such judgment, order or sentence as it thinks right. Thus the widest powers are given in express terms. The only limitation that has been placed upon these wide powers is, that they do not authorize the Court to assume the functions of a jury. It has never been held that these powers do not include the power to order a re-trial and in my opinion we have that power.

In Uo Gai v. Emperor (1) it was held that an order of commitment was satisfied after conviction and sentence, although such conviction and sentence were subsequently set aside in proceedings under S. 12. But the conviction and sentence, having been set aside, were not final; and with great respect I doubt if the commitment was satisfied. In any case S. 12 authorizes this Court to pass such orders as it thinks right. I think the right order to pass in this case is to set aside the conviction and sentence and to order the petitioner to be re-tried upon the same commitment and in the meantime to be detained in custody as an under trial prisoner.

Robison, J.—As the Judge who presided at the trial, I think it right to record what occurred. The case was one of arson and it is admitted that arson was committed by some person, but it was denied that the evidence of the witnesses for the prosecution was reliable and that the prisoner at the Bar was the man who set fire to the house or was the person whom the witnesses had seen. In summing up the evidence to the Jury I dealt of with the evidence the eye-witnesses and the question whether ther they had seen the prisoner, as they stated. I reminded the Jury of the statement of the prisoner to the Committing Magistrate which was evidence, and I pointed out that he himself had stated that he was in the house while the fire was still burning. The statement of the prisoner was recorded in Burmese and I read to the Jury the official translation of this part of it. It now appears that that translation is incorrect and that the prisoner had stated that when he returned he found that there had been a fire which had been put out by the neighbours.

I therefore had inadvertently put to the Jury as a statement of the prisoner something that he had never stated and I did so as a statement which might be considered together with the evidence of the eye-witnesses in deciding whether the prisoner was the man whom witnesses had seen. This was clearly a misdirection. It is clearly not a misdirection amounting to an illegality, as for instance the failure to comply with some express provisions of the law or a breach of some express prohibition of the law, such as was before the Lordships of the Privy Council in Sulrahmania Ayyar v. King-Emperor (2). It is therefore necessary to consider the provisions of S. 537, Criminal P. C. I am prepared to agree that this may have influenced the decision of the Jury, and that on a fact vital to the correct decision of the case. I would however record my opinion that in order to arrive at such a decision it is open to this Bench to go into the evidence. We must therefore set aside the conviction and sentence. This brings us to the question whether having done so, this Bench can pass any other judgment, order or sentence. Can we go into the whole case and decide on the evidence, including the prisoner's statement, whether he is guilty or not guilty or can we order a re-trial?

This Bench takes cognizance of the case on a certificate granted by the Government Advocate as required by S. 12, Lower Burma Courts Act. This section is very similar to Cl. 26 of the Letters Patent of the High Courts and is practically in identical terms with S. 434, Criminal P. C. The powers given by this section have been considered in two cases by this Court and I will deal with those cases. In Hla Gyi v. Emperor (3) the charge was one of murder and the Bench held that there had been misdirection in the charge to the Jury and illegality in dealing with the verdict. The final order was that the conviction and sentence be set aside and the accused released from custody. In considering whether any further order could be passed, Sir Harvey Adamson gives four reasons for not ordering a re-trial. With great respect I find myself unable to agree with any of those reasons. The first is because he could not find any instance in which a High Court in India has ordered a re-trial of a case tried by itself and it has never been done under S. 26 of the Letters Patent. The fact that there is no reported case in which this was done does not show it has never been done and further it has never been held that the Court had not the power to do so. The next reason is that the language of S. 12 is not nearly so wide as that of S. 423 read with S. 439 of the Code, which is said to include all the powers mentioned in S. 12 and include also by special mention the power of ordering a re-trial. The powers given by S. 12 are (1) to review the case or such part of it as may be necessary and (2) to finally determine the question, that is, the question referred. The section then proceeds:

"and may thereupon alter the judgment, order or sentence passed by the Judge, and pass such judgment, order or sentence as it thinks right."

Sections 423 and 439 specify the powers given to the Court in detail and this limits the Court's powers to those specified. S. 12 gives the Court power to pass "such judgment, order or sentence as it thinks right." I cannot think that this gives less wide powers. It appears to me to give the widest powers. It might have given specially mentioned powers or it might have given the powers given by S. 423 or S. 439 or both; the language used however does nothing of the kind but instead is couched in the widest terms. When a matter comes upon the certificate of the Government Advocate, it may often happen that the order must be to set aside the conviction and sentence and it might well be that there will be many cases in which an order for re-trial would be obviously the most appropriate order. The Legislature must have been aware of this. It was held to be the most appropriate order in Hla Gyi's case (3). Had it been intended that such an appropriate power should be withheld, it appears to me the section would have been differently worded. The third reason is that that order was not passed in Subrahmanya Ayyar's case (2). Irwin, J.'s, judgment gives reasons why it may not have been passed in that case, and beyond these it must be remembered that the order to be passed must depend on the facts and circumstances of each particular case. The fact that an order of retrial is not passed in a particular case cannot mean that the Court has not that power. The last reason relates to two Calcutta cases in which the Advocate General entered a nolle prosequi, and I cannot agree that the course adopted in these leads to any inference as to the power of ordering a retrial. Sir Charles Fox held it was in that case unnecessary to decide whether the Bench had power to order a retrial. Irwin, J., held an order for retrial might be made. In the second, Hassan Durrani v. Emperor (4), Sir Charles Fox did not deal with the question of a retrial. I agreed with him that in that particular case we should merely set aside the conviction and sentence, but I announced the opinion that in an appropriate case the Bench has the power to order a retrial. Ormond, J., held:

3. (1905-06) 3 L B R 75.

"There being no precedent for ordering a new trial in such a case, I think the order should be that the conviction and sentence be set aside."

I am of opinion that having regard to the wide language used and to the fact that the Bench is given power to pass any order it thinks right, it has the power to order a retrial. As to whether it can review the evidence and decide the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, I am of opinion that it has that power in certain circumstances. If the misdirection amounts to an illegality the trial is void and of no effect and that being so, the Bench could not deal with the evidence. If, however, the misdirection is not of that character but is a wrong admission of evidence or an error such as occurred in this case, the trial is not void and the Bench can go into the evidence. This power is, however, limited by the principle recognized in Subrahmanya Ayyar's case (2). Where, however, the guilt or innocence depends on evidence consisting of several separate and distinct parts and where the part tainted by the misdirection can be separated from the rest and it is clear that the misdirection has not affected in any way the finding of the Jury on the remainder of the evidence, it appears to me that the Bench can and should consider whether the finding is sustained if the objectionable evidence is left entirely out of consideration. If it is justified, I can see no reason why the matter should be left unsettled. The section gives the Bench the widest powers. The Bench would not be usurping the functions of the jury but merely reviewing and checking their finding. The prisoner would not be left with anxiety of a case before a trial hanging over him and the question of his guilt would be decided on evidence given when the facts were fresh in the memory of the witnesses. In the present case the misdirection affected the one central point in the case and involved evidence essential to a fair decision. I am of opinion, therefore, that we should not consider the evidence because the verdict might possibly have been other than it was. At the same time there is a good prima facie case against a jury. Of this I think there can be no question and, for these reasons, I would order a retrial.

Parlett, J.—This case comes before this Court on a certificate from the Government Advocate that the question should be further considered, whether there was a misdirection to the Jury in Sessions Trial No. 28 of 1917. Nga Thein Myin was tried for, and by a unanimous verdict found guilty of setting fire to a dwelling house and was sentenced to five years' rigorous imprisonment. There was evidence to show that he was seen in the house while the fire was still burning. His defence is that he left the house several hours before the fire occurred and did not return to it until after it had been put out, and he made a statement to this effect before the Committing Magistrate. He offered evidence of his movements on the night in question. Owing to a mistranslation his statement as read to the jury at the trial was to the effect that he returned to the house while the fire was still burning, and it was thus at variance with the defence he set up. The result was that his real defence was never fully before the jury at all. There was clearly a material misdirection and the verdict cannot be allowed to stand. I agree that the judgment and sentence should be set aside.

The next question is what further order, if any, should be passed. Manifestly the most appropriate order is that the accused should be re-tried upon the former commitment. S. 12, Lower Burma Courts Act, appears to me to be worded sufficiently widely to allow of such an order being made, and had the matter been res integra I think it should have been made without hesitation. But in the two earlier cases of this Court Hla Gyi v. Emperor (3) and Briscoe Birch v. Emperor (4), where an order for re-trial seemed the appropriate order, it was not passed, though in each of them one of the three Judges held that there was power to pass it, and none of the other Judges held that there was no such power. I entirely agree with the views of Irwin, J., on this point, as expressed in the earlier case. I have referred to all the cases I can trace of reviews under S. 26 of the Letters Patent, but have found none in which an order of re-trial seemed to be called for. The absence of any reported case in which such an order has been passed does not, therefore, show that there is no power to pass it, still less that no such power is conferred by the wider wording of S. 12, Lower Burma Courts Act. It is possible that some remarks in Hla Gyi v. Emperor (1) may be read as expressing a doubt (clearly not shared by Irwin, J.) as to the High Court's power to order a re-trial. But the point was not necessary for that case, which was decided upon S. 439, Criminal P. C. For that reason I consider it was unnecessary in that case to decide whether a commitment order is exhausted by a completed trial following upon it, and with great respect I must say that I find the reasons for this view unconvincing. It appears to me that it is more consonant with the provisions of the Code and with the spirit of Indian Criminal Law, which aims at substantial justice with a minimum of technicality, that where a judgment and sentence have been set aside merely for misdirection, the order of commitment should subsist. In my opinion, therefore, the views expressed in Hla Gyi v. Emperor (1) should be dissented from, and the accused should be re-tried upon the former order of commitment and in the meantime should be detained in custody as an undertrial prisoner.

Maung Kin, J.—The facts showing how this application comes before this Bench have been fully stated in the judgments of my learned colleagues and it is not necessary for me to repeat them. The statement read to the jury flatly contradicts the defence put forward by the accused and deposed to by his witnesses. It must, therefore, have appeared to the jury that the evidence adduced for the defence was, on the accused's own showing, false and unworthy of any consideration. That statement did not represent what the accused said owing to a mis-translation. If a correct translation of his statement was placed before the jury, it would appear to them that it was quite consistent with the evidence he adduced and that it was for them to consider that evidence and see whether it was worthy of belief. I am, therefore, of opinion that there was a misdirection in that what was put to the jury was something which was not evidence in the case. I also think that so far as the accused was concerned, the misdirection was upon a vital point in his defence, a point which, if decided in his favour, would be of material assistance to him. For this reason I think this Bench should set aside the conviction and sentence without going into the evidence in order to see whether or not the conviction and sentence are justified on the merits. The next question is whether we should go further and also pass an order we consider right. In my judgment an order for a re-trial on the former commitment is the most suitable order for all concerned and we should pass that order, if we have power to do so. I think we have that power. I am unable to agree with the learned counsel for accused that S. 12, Lower Burma Courts Act, does not give this Bench that power. In that section the words "and pass such judgment, order or sentence as it thinks right" follow immediately the words which give this Bench the power to set aside the conviction and sentence. So that after setting aside the conviction and sentence it is open to this Bench to consider further whether it will pass any other order also and if so, what order. Whether we decide to pass an additional order or no, our action must be such as is most agreeable to convenience, reason, justice and legal principles.

Let us now consider what will happen, if we pass no further order. The case is one which the Crown is not likely to drop. There will, therefore, be the re-arrest of the accused and probably other proceedings taken against him before he is again placed before a Judge and jury in this Court. We can imagine what all these will entail, the amount of public time and labour bestowed upon these proceedings, the inconvenience and injustice to the accused, who will have far more arduous work before him and incur far more expense in his defence than if he is ordered by this Bench to be re-tried on the same commitment. Again, how unjust it would be to allow such a serious criminal charge hanging over his head for longer than is really necessary. These considerations have led me to hold that an order for a re-trial would be one which would be in consonance with reason, justice and mercy. It is also in accordance with legal principles, for a re-trial in a proper case is allowed in appeal or revision under Secs 423 and 439 respectively, of the Criminal P. C. I, therefore, agree with my learned colleagues in ordering that the accused be re-tried on the former commitment.

The Act does not apply to a contract which is made by a person who is not himself an artificer, workman or labourer. A I R 1914 L B 163, Dist. [P 110 C 1]

Order.—The petitioner has been ordered to re-pay Rs. 698, balance of an advance made to him, together with costs amounting to Rs. 68.8 0 under S. 2, Workman's Breach of Contract Act, 13 of 1859, and has done so. Objection was taken to the order to pay costs, being Rs. 48.0 Court-fees and process fees, and Rs. 64 Advocate's fees. There is no provision in the Act for ordering payment of costs, and it has been several times held that payment of Court fee cannot be ordered: Emperor v. Daodu (1), Queen Empress v. Budhu (2), S. S. Criminal Ruling No. 6 of 1902, and it appears to me obvious that complainant who avails himself of the simple and summary manner of recovering his money provided by this Act is not entitled to recover large fees for an Advocate. This part of the order was certainly wrong. The Magistrate also erred in passing an order of imprisonment simultaneously with that for payment of the money, as has been repeatedly ruled and as the wording of S. 2 of the Act clearly shows. The petitioner however has from the outset contended that he is not an artificer, workman or labourer, and therefore the Act does not apply to him at all, and that is the first and a vital point to decide. The complainant now says the petitioner entered into a written agreement to personally work for them as their contractor from 1st December 1915 to 31st October 1916.

"We got labour for them and to personally supervise the felling of their teak timber felled by them in the Mawaing Forest to the Mawaing Stream Bank."

The agreement, a lengthy printed one, was filed and Cl. 22 is relied on by complainants. It runs: The contractor shall not sublet this contract or any part of it without the permission of the company and shall devote the whole of his time and attention to the work to be done by him under the agreement, and shall personally supervise such work. Complainant's manager says that on several occasions he saw the petitioner "working in the forest." The nature of the work he was doing is not specified. There is nothing to indicate that it was anything more than supervision. The Magistrate purported to follow Scin Yin v. Ah Moon Shoke (3) and held petitioner was a labourer within the meaning of Act 13 of 1859. He appears to me to have misunderstood that ruling. The respondent there was a carpenter, i. e., an artificer and it was held that he came under the Act in respect of an advance for carpenter's work which he contracted to get done, though he did not himself work with his own hands upon it but his part was limited to supervision. The decision rested upon the fact that he was himself a carpenter. If he had not been, decision would, no doubt, have been different. As pointed out in Asgar Ali v. Swami (4) the Act does not apply to a contract which is made by a person who is not himself an artificer, workman or labourer. The present petitioner is not an artificer, nor do I think he is shown to be a workman or labourer. He describes himself and is described by the complainant as a contractor, and his contract was for the supply of men and beasts to drag the timber to the stream under his personal supervision. There is no evidence that his duties under the contract extended to anything more than that, much less that he ever in fact handled the timber or drove the animals or was even competent to do either. It appears to me from the evidence that he was not a workman or labourer within the meaning of Act 13 of 1859, and that therefore the proceedings under that Act could not properly be instituted against him. The order is reversed and the fees Rs. 76-8-0 will be refunded to the petitioner.

Criminal Revn. No. 282 B of 1916, Decided on 1st March 1917, from the order of Dist. Magistrate, Rangoon, D/- 8th of August 1916.

(a) Burma Municipal Act (1898), S. 142—Committee can frame bye-laws imposing conditions on pawn-brokers.

Section 142, Burma Municipal Act, empowers Municipal Committee to make bye-laws for rendering licenses necessary for pawnbrokers and determining the conditions subject to which they shall be granted. [P 110 C 2]

(b) Burma Municipal Act (1898), S. 142—Licenses issued to pawn-brokers—Condition binding rate of interest chargeable by pawn-brokers is not ultra vires.

A condition in pawnbrokers' license issued under S. 142, Burma Municipal Act, limiting the rate of interest chargeable by pawnbrokers does modify and restrict the law which allows freedom of contract, but it is not on that account ultra vires of the Municipal Committee inasmuch as the power to limit the rate of interest is reasonably implied in the power to determine the conditions of such licenses. [P 111 C 1, 2] (c) Easements Act (1882), S. 52—Licensee cannot object to terms of license.

It does not lie in the mouth of a licensee to object to the terms of a license which gives him rights and privileges which he would not enjoy without such license. [P 111 C 1]

(d) Burma Municipal Act (1898), S. 142—Rangoon Municipality—Pawn-brokers must conform to conditions in license whatever they are.

Any one who wishes to carry on the business of a pawnbroker within the Rangoon Municipality must have a license and must carry on his business in conformity with the conditions of that license, whether or not they modify the law under which business for which no license is required are carried on. [P 111 C 2]

Higinbotham—for the Crown.

Order.—Applicant has been convicted of disobeying a bye-law made by the Rangoon Municipal Committee, by carrying on the business of a pawnbroker within the Municipality without a license from the Committee. There is no doubt upon the evidence that he was in the habit of taking goods and cattle in pawn for loans of money of small amount, and that he did carry on the business of a pawnbroker as defined in the bye laws, though that may not have been the only description of business which he carried on. Admittedly he had no license. The case put forward for him was that the Committee had not power to make the bye-laws for breach of which he has been convicted. S. 142, Burma Municipal Act empowers the Committee to make bye-laws, among other purposes.

"for rendering licenses necessary for pawnbrokers and determining . . . the conditions subject to which they shall be granted."

It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the Committee has been expressly empowered to make a bye law that no one shall carry on the business of a pawnbroker within the Municipality without a license from the Committee. It has also been expressly empowered to make bye-laws determining the conditions subject to which such licenses shall be granted and may be revoked. These conditions are embodied in Bye-law 6, which also provides that the license may be revoked for breach of any of those conditions. It was argued that the Committee had no power to impose certain of these conditions as they conflicted with the provisions of the Contract Act. The conditions objected to are 5, 4 and 10. The first limits the rate of interest chargeable on loans; the other two are as follows: 4. That the licensee shall not sell any pledge before the expiration of the time agreed upon for redemption thereof, or otherwise than in accordance with these conditions. 10. That the licensee, shall deliver all articles pledged for sums exceeding Rs. 20, and unredeemed at the time agreed upon for redemption thereof, to an auctioneer appointed by the Committee for sale; and shall not sell the same except through such auctioneer. It is objected that these two conditions give the pawnee a right of sale of unredeemed pledges which is not accorded to him by S. 176, Contract Act. Mr. Hingbotham, for the Crown, contends that the bye-laws leave the Contract untouched, and give no further right of sale than does that Act, viz., a right of sale after giving the pawnor reasonable notice.

It may be doubted if that was the intention of the framers of the bye-laws, but it appears to me unnecessary to decide whether or no the bye-laws as they stand do give a power of sale with notice, for two reasons; first, because it does not lie in the mouth of a pawnee to object to the terms of a license which gives him rights and privileges which he would not enjoy without such license, and secondly, because, in the view I take of the matter, it is immaterial whether the conditions of the license prescribed by the bye-laws do or do not modify the general law of contracts. Condition 5, limiting the rate of interest chargeable, does modify and restrict the law which allows freedom of contract, but I do not think it is on that account ultra vires of the Committee. Cl. (6), S. 142, Burma Municipal Act empowers the Committee to make bye-laws for the rates which may be demanded for hire of any conveyance hired for a period not exceeding 24 hours. It has not been, I do not think it could be, contended that bye-laws thus limiting the rates, though interfering with freedom of contract, would be ultra vires, since the Act gives express power to frame them. In the case of pawnbrokers' licenses though power to limit the rate of interest is not expressly given, I think it is reasonably implied in the power to determine the conditions of such licenses. Moreover, the Committee have clearly power to forbid the carrying on the business of a pawnbroker without a license and to determine the conditions of the license. Any one who wishes to carry on that business within the Municipality must have a license and must carry on his business in conformity with the conditions of that license, whether or no they modify the law under which businesses for which no licenses are required are carried on. This disposes of the other objection to condition 10 that it limits the right to sale through the auctioneer appointed by the Committee. In my opinion the Committee was right and I dismiss this application.

Decided on 13th June 1917.

Buddhist Law—Adoption—Kittima Apatitha—Claim based on Kittima cannot be amended in appeal by alternative claim based on apatitha—Civil P. C. (1908), O. 6, R. 17.

Kittima and apatitha are two distinct forms of adoption to which totally different considerations apply. Therefore when a claim is based on kittima adoption, it cannot be amended in appeal by advancing an alternative claim based on apatitha, inasmuch as the effect of the amendment would be to change the suit into one of a substantially different character. [P 112 C 2]

Sin Hla Aung—for Appellants.

Maung Thin—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The plaintiff sued for inheritance as the kittima son and sole heir of the deceased. The Trial Court held that the alleged adoption was not proved. On appeal the lower appellate Judge was of the same opinion and held that: "the utmost that the evidence can be held to establish in favour of the plaintiff is that the deceased Ma Kayut used to speak of him as her son and sometimes even told people that he was her adopted son (mwe za the tha) and that it was generally understood that he was her adopted son."

But there was another ground taken in the memorandum of appeal, viz., that the lower Court should at least have held that the plaintiff was an apatitha son. The learned Judge considered the question whether the plaintiff should be allowed in appeal to put forward such an alternative claim and came to the conclusion that he should be, and then proceeded to hold that he was the apatittha son of the deceased and that the fact that at the time of the death of the deceased he was living separately from her was immaterial inasmuch as the plaintiff was blood relation, a nephew of her. The case was accordingly remanded to the Trial Court with the direction that it be determined afresh. I understand this direction to be that the Trial Court should try the question as to what share the plaintiff would be entitled to as against the deceased's next of kin, as the learned Judge before giving the direction had come to the conclusion that "it is only necessary for me to decide as I do that he is entitled to some share." Before me the defendant urges that the lower appellate Court was wrong in allowing the plaintiff to make the alternative claim for the first time in appeal. So far as I can see there is absolutely no authority to justify the permission granted by the lower appellate Court. In Ma Sa Yi v. Ma Me Gale (1), which was a case of alleged kittima adoption, the question arose before this Court as to whether an alternative claim as an apatittha child should be allowed in appeal, inasmuch as the apatittha adoption was an adoption of a different character to that of the kittima form. Birks, J., pointed out that in Maung Aing v. Ma Kin (2) the Judicial Commissioner of Upper Burma expressed an opinion that such a procedure was questionable. The question however did not arise in that case. Without deciding the point Birks, J., said that assuming that there was sufficient evidence of an apatittha adoption, the fact that the claimant was living separately from the alleged adoptive mother for eleven years of her life before the latter's death was sufficient to debar her from claiming any share. But Fox, J., as the claimant made no alternative claim on the basis of her being an apatittha daughter, did not think it necessary to consider what her rights to share in the inheritance possibly might be, if she had made such a claim.

In Ma Mya Me v. Moun Ba Dun (3) it was held that an alternative claim may be made, but the point did not arise. The learned Judge held that the evidence justified the view that Ma Mya May was an adopted child but whether she was a kittima or apatittha it was unnecessary to determine, as the fact that she was an adopted child was sufficient for holding that it was preferable to grant her Letters of Administration to the estate than the opposite party who was adjudged to be unfit, though he was the natural and only son of the deceased. The case was not a regular suit but was one in which both the parties applied for Letters of Administration and the Court had to choose between the two to grant letters. In my judgment the lower appellate Court was wrong in allowing the alternative claim to be made in appeal. We are certain as to what a kittima adoption is, but as regards the apatittha form it is really difficult to say what it is exactly but, it is certain that it is different from the kittima form. In S. 16 of Kinwun Mingyi's Digest the term apatittha is described in various ways. In Tet Tun v. Ma Chein (4) Hartnoll, J., after noticing the section came to the conclusion that the principle underlying the definition of the term seems to be that an apatittha adoption is a compassionate one; which takes place in consequence of the child being destitute with no one to maintain it through abandonment by, or the decease of, its natural parents or some such similar cause. I have been referred to Mr. May Oung's book on Buddhist Law in which he submits that these views of Hartnoll, J., are not correct and gives his views at pp. 122, 123 and 129 of the book.

Whichever view is correct, totally different considerations will have to be applied in the case of an apatittha adoption to those which have to be applied in the case of a kittima adoption. The two forms are entirely different. Therefore in allowing the alternative claim to be made the Court will be contravening the rule that an amendment should not be allowed where it would have the effect of converting the suit as originally laid into a suit of a different character. Although O. 6, R. 17, which relates to amendment of pleadings is very wide in its terms, it is clearly understood that an amendment would not in general be allowed, if it changes the suit into one of a substantially different character which would more conveniently be the subject of a Independently of the provisions of O. 21, R. 63, Civil P. To such a suit the proviso to S. 42, Specific Relief Act, does not apply.

IP 113 C. 21

Ba U—for Appellants.

Maung Tin—for Respondent.

Judgment.—In execution of their decree against one Tin Ula, the plaintiffs-appellants attached two bullocks as the property of their judgment-debtor. The defendant-respondent applied for the removal of the attachment. Thereupon the plaintiffs withdrew their attachment and filed the present suit for a declaration that the two bullocks were liable to be attached and sold in execution of their decree. The trial Court decreed the suit. The lower appellate Court held that the suit, not being under O. 21, R. 63 of Civil P. C. but under S. 42, Specific Relief Act, did not lie, inasmuch as there was no prayer for consequential relief. Evidently the learned Appellate Judge thought that, as the bullocks were in the possession of the defendant the plaintiffs should have asked for their possession. It has not been contended here that the suit is one under the Civil Procedure Code. That it cannot be held to be such a suit there is no doubt, as there was no investigation of plaintiff's claim in the attachment proceedings owing to the attachment being withdrawn. The wording of R. 63, O. 21, is quite clear. Nor is it disputed that independently of a suit under the Civil Procedure Code the decree holder may sue for a declaration that the property attached belonged to their judgment-debtor. In fact this latter proposition was expressly laid down in Soerata Coloniale Italiana v. Shree In (1) following Raghunath Mukund v. Soorash K. R. Kama (2). I have followed this ruling in Chan Tat Phai v. The Lat (3). But the argument of the defendant's Advocate is that the plaintiff could not sue for a bare declaration, as the bullocks were in the possession of the defendant, and that the proviso to S. 42, Specific Relief Act applies. Exactly the same argument was advanced in Allageppa Chetty, P. L. A. N. v. Nazamat Ali Chaudhry (4) and Irwin, J., unpowered it in these words:

"I can see no reason for making any distinction between the mode in which plaintiff must establish his right if he has previously applied for a summary order and the mode in which he must establish his right if he has not applied for a summary order. In either case a declaration is sufficient. When plaintiff obtains a declaration, the Court which executed the decree must respect the declaration and give satisfaction. . . . The object of the proviso is to prevent a plaintiff from getting a declaration in one suit, and consequential relief afterwards in another. Here there is no suit for any subsequent relief. The relief must be given by the Court which sold the land in execution."

It may be said that the suit in that case was one by the claimant for the property attached but not by the decree-holder. In this case the suit is by the decree-holder. But the remarks of Irwin, J., must apply, mutatis mutandis, to this case. When the plaintiff gets the declaratory decree he asks for, he can proceed to attach the same property in execution of his previous decree and the execution Court will be bound to recognize the attachment as being just and proper. The declaratory decree will be binding on the present defendant in the subsequent execution proceedings and he will not be able to object that the plaintiff has no right to attach the property. Then there is my own ruling in K. Y. K. M. Chetty Firm v. S. N. V. R. Chetty Firm (5) in favour of the plaintiff. There I followed Sappohadi Chetty v.

Omission to give notice to the judgment-debtor of an execution sale of his property is more than a mere irregularity and renders the Court sale void: 6 Cal 103, Ref. [P 114 C 2]

Naidu—for Appellant.

Judgment.—The respondent applied on 16th August 1911 to set aside a Court sale made on 3rd March 1910. She has been successful in the lower Court, both of which found that the appellant had kept the knowledge of the sale from the respondent by fraud. The appellant was the assignee of a mortgage decree for Rs. 3,800, plus costs, against the respondent and her husband. Appellant's name was put on the record as decree holder before 2nd September 1909, on which date the warrant of attachment issued. On 3rd November 1909 all parties were either present or represented by pleaders, and it was agreed that the sum of Rs. 87-1-6 was due to the appellant. On 10th January 1910 Pleadings of both parties being present, execution was granted as prayed for. On 21st January 1910 an order was made for the sale of this property on 3rd March 1910; the respondent was not represented. No notice was even issued by the Court to the respondent as to the date of the sale. The appellant and the process server both state that the proclamation of sale was posted on respondent's house in the presence of certain witnesses. Two of these witnesses, whom both Courts have believed, have stated that that was not so, namely, that no proclamation was ever posted up in respondent's house in their presence. Both Courts have found that the respondent did not know of the sale until she learned it from a Pleader subsequently. It is contended that though the respondent did not receive a notice or that no notice issued, it was not the fault of the appellant; and that no fraud can be imputed to the appellant whereby he prevented the respondent from knowing of this sale.

I am not disposed to interfere with the concurrent findings of both the lower Courts; the fact that the property was bought by the appellant for Rs. 1,000 where as according to the price realised by the other half which had been previously sold by Court, the price should have been over Rs. 3,000, and the fact that the appellant tries but fails to prove the posting of the proclamation of sale would go to warrant the finding that the appellant was guilty of fraud and intentionally kept the knowledge of this sale from the respondent. But even if the appellant is not guilty of fraud, a Court sale without any notice having been issued by the Court renders that Court sale void; it is more than an irregularity: see the case of Ramessuri Dass v. Doorga Dass Chatterjee (1). The appeal is, therefore, dismissed.

Apart from any enactment, an agreement to refer a matter to certain specified arbitrators becomes void and of no effect if one or more of the arbitrators die or refuse to act, and thus make the agreement incapable of performance.

In such a case the Court has no jurisdiction under Cl. 4, Para. 17, Sch 2, Civil P. C. to make a reference to the arbitrators who are willing to act. [P 115 C 1]

Giles and Po Han—for Appellant.
Lentaigne—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The appellant and respondents agreed to refer a matter to the arbitration of six persons who were named, one of whom refused to act from the commencement and another died. Fourteen months later the respondents applied to the District Court to file the agreement in Court under para. 17, Sub. 2, Civil P. C. Under Cl. 4 of the paragraph the District Judge made an order of reference to the four of the six arbitrators who apparently were willing to act. It is from that order that this appeal is preferred, on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction to make the order of reference. Cl. 4 is as follows:

"Where no sufficient cause is shown, the Court shall order the agreement to be filed, and shall make an order of reference to the arbitrator appointed in accordance with the provisions of the agreement or if there is no such provision and the parties cannot agree the Court may appoint an arbitrator."

Apart from any enactment, an agreement to refer a matter to certain specified arbitrators becomes void and of no effect if one or more of the arbitrators die or refuse to act, and thus make the agreement incapable of performance. The provisions of this agreement were that there should be six specified arbitrators and the Court had no jurisdiction under Cl. 4 to make an order of reference except to those six arbitrators, which was impossible. It is contended for the respondents that para. 19 gives the Court power to act under para. 5. Para. 19 is as follows:

"The foregoing provisions, so far as they are consistent with any agreement filed under para. 17 shall be applicable to all proceedings under the order of reference made by the Court under that paragraph to the award and to the decree following thereon."

Under para. 5 the Court would have the power to appoint arbitrators in the place of the arbitrator who died and the arbitrator who refused to act; but para. 19 only comes into operation when an order of reference has been made under para. 17. The appeal is allowed and the order of the District Judge is set aside. The appellant will have her costs in both Court.

Where a surety has in fact paid off the debt, he is entitled to recover its amount from the principal and it makes no difference that the payment was made by incurring a fresh obligation to the same creditor and that the money was not actually handed over to the surety and paid by him to the creditor: 20 Mad. 322 and 14 W. Lambert—for Appellant.

Judgment.—The defendant borrowed Rs. 2,500 from the Bank of Bengal, which she secured with surety for, on 26th October 1915, payable 75 days after date, the due date was 14th January 1916. The Bank demanded payment and on 30th June 1916 the plaintiff borrowed Rs. 2,500 from the Bank on a promissory note which he executed in favour of Ma law, who endorsed the same to the Bank, payable after the three months, and the plaintiff paid the discount or interest in advance on that loan in cash. The money on that loan was taken to repay the previous loan, which was wiped out. The plaintiff then sued to recover amount. Both the lower Courts dismissed the suit upon the authority of Patti Nara. Appanatha Appan v. Marimutha Pillai (1). Therefore, in doubt, certain English authorities which show that if the surety incurs a fresh obligation, he cannot recover against the creditor as if that fresh obligation had operated as a payment of the old debt. Troylucko Nath Roy v. Kasher Nath Roy (2) is an authority in favour of the plaintiff. The question is, was the old debt paid off by the surety? This was a fresh debt which the plaintiff had contracted and, in my opinion, it matters not whether he incurred the fresh obligation to the same Bank or to another Bank. Neither does it matter that the money was not actually handed over to the plaintiff and returned to the Bank. The Bank was in fact paid off by the plaintiff with the moneys which the Bank advanced to him by way of a new loan. The appeal is allowed and there will be a decree for Criminal Appeal No. 87 of 1917, Decided on 27th April 1917, from order of Western Sub-Divl. Magistrate, Rangoon, D/- 29th January 1917, in Cr. Trial No. 472 of 1916.

(a) Penal Code (1860), S. 499—Defamation—Whole criminal law of libel in India is contained in Penal Code.

The whole criminal law of libel in India is contained in the Penal Code and defamatory statements are punishable unless they fall under one or more of the exceptions to S. 499 of the Code. [P 117 C 1]

(b) Penal Code (1860), S. 499—Exception—Maintenance proceedings—Defamatory written statement is not privileged.

A written statement filed by a respondent in maintenance proceedings is not privileged: 36 Mad. 216 and 88 Cal 880, Dix. from: [P 117 C 1]

Judgment.—This is a squalid case from which few of those concerned have emerged with any credit. Complainant was a clerk in Government service at Pyinmana, and had a daughter, hereinafter referred to as Kamala, who in 1914 was about 17 years of age. Accused was a clerk in the office of the Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals and Manickam Pillay was a subordinate in that department, being Sub-Assistant Surgeon at Pyinmana. The latter was a friend of accused and introduced him to the complainant's family. Both accused and Manickam Pillay posed as apostles of theosophy, the former being treasurer of the Burma branch. It was arranged for Kamala to go to a Theosophical College in Benares ostensibly to improve her knowledge in some branches in which she was backward and to qualify her for admission to the Benares College, she came to accused's house in September 1914 and remained there till November. After a short visit to Pyinmana she accompanied accused to India and eventually got to Benares. While in his house accused seduced her, and continued to have intercourse with her, there and on the journey. In the spring she returned to Pyinmana for the holidays, where she was found to be pregnant and on 13th August 1915 she gave birth to a child. She applied for maintenance in Pyinmana in January 1916, but accused succeeded in balking her by a plea of want of jurisdiction. In April 1916 she applied in Rangoon and accused again tried the same tactics, but was defeated, and finally on 20th July 1916 on his own admission, she obtained an order for maintenance. In the course of that case accused on 21st June 1916 filed a written statement containing certain allegations in respect of which complainant prosecuted him for defamation. He was convicted and has appealed. The alleged defamatory statements were as follows: First,

"her parents' house was near some houses of ill-fame and there were frequent disturbances at night. In order to remove her from such environments and for her health Dr. Manickam suggested that she and her mother should come and live in Rangoon", meaning thereby that complainant was indifferent to his daughter's welfare and morals and that he (accused) must come in and save his child from her father's indifference.

Now it appears to me that the meaning complainant wishes to read into this passage is extremely far-fetched and not one which the paragraph as a whole would convey to a person reading it. At this appeal complainant's counsel gave another sinister meaning to the passage, namely, that it was a covert suggestion that Kamala got her child from some one visiting the neighbouring brothels. This is even more far-fetched, and emphasizes the uncertainty whether any one reading the passage would attach to it any and what definite meaning defamatory of the complainant. The accused explains, and there is some evidence to bear him out, that the girl was hysterical and that she was disturbed at night by noises in the quarter. I do not think this passage can be held to be defamatory of complainant.

Secondly, "she and her parents were keenly intent on destroying the child yet unborn, but we both strongly forbade that. We both (i. e., accused and the Doctor) offered marriage and protection of a house to the petitioner in her plight."

This passage contains the gravamen of the charge and will be referred to later.

Thirdly, "this sort of behaviour opened my eyes to the fact that the petitioner or her immediate advisers did not desire education or protection, but wanted to extort money."

meaning thereby that complainant was practising the crime of extortion against accused. The accused alleges that by her immediate advisers he did not mean her parents, and he points with force to the fact that whenever in the written statement he refers to her parents he does so expressly. In the next place the effect of the passage and its context as a whole is that Kamala was trying to get money out of him, though he was not sure if her action was spontaneous or was promoted by her advisers. Under the circumstances it may be doubted whether the passage conveys an imputation against the complainant himself. Coming to the principal item in the charge, the statement complained of is obviously defamatory and it is for the accused to show that he was protected in making it. It is contended for him that his statement was absolutely privileged, on the strength of Potaraja Venkata Reddy v. Emperor (1), where the Madras High Court, affirming a previous decision in Alraja Naidu, in the matter of (2), held that the statement of a person accused of a criminal offence is absolutely privileged. This is not the view of other High Courts, though in a recent case Golap San v. Bhola Nath Khetry (3) the Calcutta High Court has departed from its earlier decisions and held that a complaint is absolutely privileged. In any event the Madras decision would not govern a case like the present, which was not that of a statement made by an accused person on his trial for committing a criminal offence, but a written statement filed in proceedings which, though before a Magistrate partook largely of a civil nature, by a person who was not only a competent witness, but who clearly ought to have gone into the witness-box.

It appears to me, however, that the sounder view is that which was adopted by the Court after an exhaustive examination of the authorities then available in Mya Thi v. Henry Po Saw (4), and that the whole criminal law of libel in India is contained in the Indian Penal Code, and that defamatory statements are punishable unless they fall under one or more of the exceptions to S. 499. In this case, therefore, accused must show that he made the statement in good faith for the protection of his own interest. It is contended that he has succeeded in doing so. Briefly his case is that an allegation was made in the maintenance case that the accused had endeavoured to obtain abortion: he was therefore justified in putting before the Court his version of the facts, namely, that so far from desiring abortion, he had frustrated the girl's father's attempt to procure it. It is necessary, therefore, to consider the course of the maintenance proceedings and what allegations were made therein and at what stage. I may remark that the exhibits in the defamation case were dealt with in a very slipshod manner by the Court, and neither complainant's nor respondent's advocates took the trouble to properly prove the various documents on which they relied. Both are to be regretted and as the matter is largely a formal one, I have read the whole of the proceedings in both cases and shall briefly refer to such of documents as appear to me to bear upon the point now for decision. The maintenance petition was filed on 20th April and on 29th accused's pleader objected to the Magistrate's jurisdiction. His objection was overruled on 1st May and he was ordered to file the witness story, but was directed to file written statement at once. He did so, introducing his objection as to jurisdiction and a notice to the witnesses and the petition closed the case. The 17th May was fixed for taking evidence, but for taking the evidence the District Court adjourned adjournment to date the hearing till the next day. The petitioner and her witnesses were under examination on various days from 18th May to 21st June, and a large number of documents were put in up to 8th June. It was on 21st June that the second written statement containing the defamatory statement was filed. In her evidence Kamala stated that accused's intercourse with her covered the period September to December 1914. In the latter month they were at Madras and speaking of events that happened there she said:

"The respondent consulted a native Doctor because my menses stopped. The Doctor gave some purgative and about two hours later the respondent brought me a phial with some pills. He himself administered one pill to me and he told me to take the pills regularly."

Three of accused's letters were filed, Exs. P, Q, R, written on his return to Rangoon. Exs. P and Q are dated 17th

1. (1911) 33 M.L.J. 261; 11 C. 630.

2. (1917) 20 M.L.J. 222.

January and are to the girl and her father. In the former he wrote:

"The medicine that was given to you is not for anything wonderful to come out but slowly after two months or so to give you more blood in the body and to regulate your menses etc.," and then followed directions to take it for alternative fortnights. To the father he wrote at length about the girl's scanty menses, that she had been medically examined and declared weak and anaemic and that "some pills were prescribed for increase of blood and regulating the menses properly." In Ex. R written to the girl on 21st January he said:

"Your monthly course period is 15th January. Please see if you do not get, and if not then consult the Doctor you say who visits you every morning."

These passages form the sole foundation for accused's plea that he had been charged with attempting to procure the girl's abortion. I am quite unable to hold that they amount to anything of the kind. They are certainly strong evidence to refute accused's denial of paternity. This abnormal interest in the girl's menstruation shows that he hoped that its stoppage was due to temporary causes and would be remedied by a course of medicine. There is no suggestion that when he discovered that conception had taken place he was prepared to go to the length of procuring abortion. It is true that complainant in this case when cross-examined on 9th December 1916 said:

"My complaint was that accused having put my daughter in that position was trying to cause abortion. Accused said that this was not true but that I and my daughter were wanting to abort. The accused himself gave pills to cause abortion."

This was nearly six months after the written statement in the maintenance case was filed. There is not a shred of evidence as to when complainant voiced his suspicions of accused's conduct in regard to the pills, much less any proof that he had done so before accused's written statement was filed. I can find nothing in the record to warrant the inference that when accused made the allegation complained of, he was justified in making it in the protection of his own interests in reply to a charge made against him that he had attempted to procure abortion. Still less can I find anything to indicate that he made the allegation in good faith. It is true that when Kamala wrote to him on 26th April 1915 (Ex. 18) announcing her pregnancy, she suggested his getting her some medicine to bring about a "cure," if not too late to do so. Later when the wretched girl's misery became acuter, she more than once in her letters expressed her desire that the child should not live. The one thing which throughout the case may be to accused's credit is that, whether from fear of the consequences or not, he firmly dissuaded her from taking any measures to prevent the child being born alive. As to the complainant, however, accused's allegation against him rested solely upon a single episode referred to in Manickam's evidence and his letter to accused on 29th April, Ex. 19. When the poor man first learnt the foul wrong done to him and his daughter by their traitorous friend, his natural impulse was to try and avoid publishing abroad their shame, so his first prayer to Manickam was to "try and dissolve the pregnancy." Manickam of course refused; the complainant at once acquiesced in the refusal and the request was never repeated. The letter, Ex. 19, shows clearly that on 29th April accused knew complainant had abandoned the idea, for Manickam therein assured him that he had secured the safety of the unborn child. There is clearly not the smallest justification in fact for the allegation that the girl's father was "keenly intent on destroying the child." He clearly was not, and I am amazed that accused's pleader, who had access to Ex. 19, which was in accused's possession, should make such an allegation in the written statement he drafted. Still more disgraceful is it that that pleader should repeat the allegation that the girl's parents were eager to destroy the child in a written argument which he presented to the Court on 5th July. For in his written statement of 21st June the accused withdrew his denial of liability to maintain the child, the only possible course in view of the overwhelming proof of paternity furnished by his own letters produced against him, and the sole matter in issue in the proceedings subsequent to that date was the amount of maintenance to be ordered. There was, therefore, no justification whatever for repeating the libel on 5th July, when the only question open to argument was the amount of accused's means.

The libel was cruel, none could well be crueller, and it was deliberate, not suddenly provoked by the string of cross-examination, but carefully framed in the calm of his pleader's office. He cannot shield himself behind the miserable tactics of his pleader, who not merely tolerated, but admittedly advised his avoidance of the witness-box; nor can he altogether escape the consequences of the repeated slander of 5th July. The records of these two cases show accused to be a heartless scoundrel, a canting hypocrite and a contemptible coward. I think his sentence was richly deserved and I dismiss his appeal. His bail bond will be cancelled and he will be remanded to jail to serve out his sentence.

Special Second Appeal No. 62 of 1916, Decided on 18th June 1917.

Limitation Act (1908), Sch. 1, Arts. 123, 142—Suit to set aside invalid sale of joint share and for possession is governed by Art. 142 and not by Art. 123.

A suit to set aside an invalid sale to the extent of the plaintiff's joint share and for possession of the same is governed by Art. 142, Lim. Act, and not by Art. 123 which governs suits for a distributive share of an estate.

Campagnac—for Appellants.Sin Hla Aung—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The land in dispute at one time formed part of the estate of O Pauk Ke, who died about 15 years ago leaving 16 shins of land and four children, namely, Mg. Hla Gyaw, Me Dok, Mg. Kyaw and Mg. Lon. Mg. Hla Gyaw was the eldest, son Mg. Lon the youngest son. Mg. Lon mortgaged the lands in dispute to Aung Pyu, the defendant and later on made them over in satisfaction of the mortgage debt. Some time afterwards Mg. Lon sued Aung Pyu for the redemption of the land and failed to get a decree. This was followed by the present suit in which Hla Gyaw, Me Dok and the heirs of Maung Kyaw since deceased sued Mg. Lon and Aung Pyu for 3/4ths of the lands on the ground that they formed part of an undivided estate left by O Pauk Ke and that they had an interest jointly to the extent of 3/4ths of the lands. The Sub-divisional Judge in his judgment describes the suit as one for a distributive share of an estate and this has somewhat strengthened the contention that Art. 123, Lim. Act, applies and as O Pauk Ke died 15 years before the suit it was barred by time. I do not think the Subdivisional Judge's description of the suit is correct. Although the plaintiff asked for 3/4ths, which was their joint share in the property the suit must be held to be one in which they asked the sale to Aung Pyu to be set aside to the extent of their joint share and for the possession of that share. That being the case Art. 123 does not apply but according to the ruling in Ma Ko U v. Tan E (1), Art. 142 would apply. The sale was in 1272 B. E., which would be the time when the plaintiffs were dispossessed. The suit is, therefore, not time barred.

The next point to be considered is whether as a fact there had been a division of the estate the result of which was that the land in suit fell to the share of Mg. Lon. The Subdivisional Judge held that there had been no such division. I think he was right, for the evidence shows that the three older heirs of O Pauk Ke had been working portions of the estate by arrangement without having had their shares distributed among them and that when Mg. Lon got married, he was allowed to work the lands in suit which had been worked by Mg. Kyaw, who had by that time died. The next point to consider is whether as held by the Divisional Judge, the sale to defendant Aung Pyu was with the consent of the plaintiffs. It is quite clear that of the three parties, Mg. Hla Gyaw, Me Dok and the heirs of Mg. Kyaw, Hla Kyaw, the eldest son and the eldest son of Mg. Kyaw gave their consent but that was as they say, to the mortgage. They do not appear to admit giving consent to the alleged outright transfer. The evidence is very unsatisfactory on this point but the burden is on the defendant Aung Pyu to prove the consent of all those who were interested in the property. I am unable to hold that he has discharged it.

However that may be neither the mortgage nor the sale was valid because neither was by a registered instrument as required by S. 59 and S. 54 respectively, of the T. P. Act. It is not clear whether there was at first a mortgage and then a sale or whether there was only one transaction which Aung Pyn called a sale and the plaintiffs a mortgage. However that may be the transfer to Aung Pyn whether it was a sale or mortgage was invalid and must be set aside. I allow the appeal by reversing the decree of the Divisional Court and by passing a decree that the transfer to Aung Pyn be set aside and that the defendant Aung Pyn do give the plaintiffs possession of $\frac{3}{4}$ ths of 16.50 acres which is equal to 12.37 acres. The respondent will pay costs throughout.

Judgment.—The parties in this case were divorced after a few months of married life. The divorce was followed by arbitration over the property, but the diamond earrings and necklace in dispute in this case were not included in the reference. Hayatoonnisa sued for these things on the ground that they were given her at the time of the marriage by the bridegroom's father and the bridegroom respectively. The claim to the necklace was dismissed. The Trial Judge decreed her the ear-rings but on appeal the Divisional Judge allowed her only half a pair of ear-rings. Her husband again appeals.

In the first plaint filed, the ear-rings were alleged to be part of the dower but in an amended plaint it was stated that they were a gift to her from her father-in-law. When examined in Court, Hayatoonnisa said that they were a joint gift at the time of the marriage to her husband and herself. Esoof pleaded that the earrings were a gift to himself and were intended to be a family heirloom. When he gave evidence, he said that he had told his father that he did not want money, but preferred ear-rings. The father admits that he went to buy the ear-rings with the father of the bride. The evidence leaves no room for doubt that these ear-rings were mentioned in an awbasa as amongst the wedding gifts and were made over to the newly married couple. They were worn by the bride on the marriage day and on subsequent occasions. The parties are Mahomedans resident in Burma and I think that in making the gift, Esoof's father was under the influence of Burmese customs. I agree with the Courts below that ear-rings were a gift, and with the findings of the Divisional Court that they were a joint gift. The point however, chiefly argued at the Bar is whether this gift is invalid in law on the ground that the doctrine of mushaa applies to the case. In Ameeroonissa Khatoon v. Abedoonissa Khatoon (1) their Lordships of the Privy Council say:

"That a rule of this kind does exist in Mahomedan law with regard to some subjects of gift is plain. The Hadaya gives the two reasons on which it is founded; First, that complete seisin being a necessary condition in cases of gift, and this being impracticable with respect to an indefinite part of a divisible thing the condition cannot be performed; and secondly, because it would throw a burden on the donor he had not engaged for, viz., to make a division. Instances are given by text writers of undivided things which cannot be given, such as fruit unplucked from the tree and crops uncovered from the land. It is obvious that with regard to things of this nature separate possession cannot be given in their undivided state and confusion might thus be created between donor and donee which the law will not allow."

In the later case of Mahomed Mumtaz Ahmed v. Zubaida Jan (2) their Lordships remarked:

"The doctrine relating to the invalidity of gifts of mushaa is wholly unadapted to a progressive state of society and ought to be confined within the strictest rules."

The latest case I have been able to find on the subject of gifts on mushaa is Abdul Aziz v. Fatch Mahomed Hazi (3), where a Bench of the Calcutta High Court declined to apply the doctrine on the ground that possession had been given. In this case, a gift was made by A to B of a 4-anna share in a kaimi raiyati holding, and after the gift donor and donee jointly enjoyed a the land. Mr. Abdul Rahim in his Mahomedan Jurisprudence, p. 298, points out that even according to the strict Hanafi law, a gift of an undivided share in a thing that is not capable of division without impairing its utility is valid, provided such possession is given as the nature of the property admits of. In the present suit it is not the donor that is challenging the gift, but one of the joint donees. Possession has been given, and in my opinion, it does not lie with him to say that the gift is altogether invalid. Even if the validity of the gift has been disputed by the donor, I should not have applied the doctrine of mu-baa where possession has been given. Such a doctrine is, in my opinion, unsuitable to Mahomedans who have resided for years in Burma and have become imbued with Burmese ideas. The doctrine was not even pleaded in the written statement. This appeal is dismissed with costs.

Criminal Appeal No. 109 of 1917, Decided on 19th March 1917.

Penal Code (1860), S. 75—Previous conviction subsequent to commission of offence charged—S. 75 does not apply.

An accused charged himself with enhanced punishment under S. 75, I. P. C., only if there was a previous conviction against him before he committed the offence with which he stands charged. But where the previous conviction was subsequent to the commission of the offence charged, S. 75, I. P. C., has no application.

Judgment.—I am satisfied that the evidence establishes the guilt of the accused and that the offence he committed is robbery. The learned District Magistrate has awarded him seven years' transportation, owing to there being three previous convictions against him. The use of S. 75, I. P. C., in this case is illegal, because the previous convictions are not such as come within the purview of that section. The offence of which the accused was convicted in this case was committed in April 1907, the previous convictions were in November 1909, May 1910 and November 1911, so that they are "previous" only in the sense that they were had before the conviction in the present case and they are subsequent to the commission of the offence of which the accused is now convicted. The meaning of the section is very clear. It provides that if any person, having been convicted of any offence punishable under Chas. 12 or 17, I. P. C., shall be guilty of any offence punishable under either of these parts of the same Code, he shall for every such subsequent offence be liable to the penalties therein declared. The words italicized indicate that the offence for which enhanced punishment is awardable must be one committed after the convictions by reason of which it is claimed that the accused is liable to enhanced punishment. In other words, the accused renders himself liable to enhanced punishment by reason of there having been previous convictions against him before he committed the present offence. The other convictions should not, therefore, have been taken into account. The point appears to me to be quite simple, but if authorities are required, the following may be cited: Reg v. Sakya (1), and Empress of India v. Megha (2). The conviction under S. 392, I. P. C. is hereby confirmed, but the sentence under S. 392, and 75, I. P. C. is hereby quashed.

In considering what measure of punishment should be imposed on the accused, I shall not allow myself to be influenced by the fact of there having been other convictions previous to this conviction. I shall treat this offence, as the accused is entitled to have it treated, as if before the commission of it he had a clean sheet. The sentence is altered to one of two years' rigorous imprisonment.

Sutherland—for Applicant.

Ginwala—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—The applicant, Ma. Thein Me, applied under S. 488, Criminal P. C., for maintenance against her husband. The application was dismissed on the ground that the wife had left her husband and lived separately from him for more than 4½ years and that the husband by opposing this application had shown his election, which he had, of treating the marriage as dissolved.

The parties were married in November 1906. In February 1912 the wife left her husband; in July 1912 the husband took a lesser wife; in July 1913 the wife applied for maintenance for herself and her son; maintenance for herself was refused because she delayed the progress of the case, without prejudice to her right to bring another application. In August 1913 the husband sued for restitution of conjugal rights and in December 1913 his suit was dismissed on the ground of cruelty. In July 1915 the wife made this application for maintenance. There is no doubt that after a husband's suit for restitution of conjugal rights has been dismissed the husband is liable to maintain his wife; but it is contended for the husband that the wife had deserted her husband for more than a year since the decree in that suit, and that it is clear by the husband's opposition to this application for maintenance that he has elected to treat the marriage as being dissolved under Burmese Buddhist Law. The Dhammathats (Richardson, Vol. 5, S. 17) says:

"If the wife, not having affection for the husband, shall leave the house where they were living together, and if during one year he does not give her one leaf of vegetables or one stick of fire-wood, let each have the right of taking another husband and wife. They shall not claim each other as husband and wife. Let them have the right to separate and marry again."

In my opinion that passage refers to the voluntary desertion by the wife without the consent of the husband. And the wife who is driven away from her husband by his cruelty cannot be said to have 'left the house not having affection for the husband.' A wife who refuses to rejoin her husband without sufficient reason or who is living apart from her husband by mutual consent is not entitled to maintenance; and I doubt if a husband under Burmese Buddhist Law, who is bound to maintain his wife, can evade that liability by declaring that the marriage has been dissolved by reason of the wife's absence from him. The order of the Magistrate is therefore set aside. Maintenance of Rs. 15 a month has been granted for the son and an order will be made for maintenance of the applicant at Rs. 30 a month.

Khoo Eo Khwee—Appellant.

Nanigram Jaganath Firm—Respondts.

First Appeal No. 158 of 1915, Decided on 1st February 1917.

(a) Contract Act (1872), S. 102—Negotiability of contract.

Negotiability can be attached to documents by mercantile usage. [P 126 C 1]

A document is negotiable if by the custom of the money market it is transferable as if it were cash; and its bona fide transferee obtains a good title of it (because of its currency) although his transferor might have stolen it. [P 128 C 1]

(b) Contract Act (1872), S. 102—Document of title, test of, stated.

The test whether a document is a "document of title" or a "document showing title" to goods is whether the document in question is used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorizing or purporting to authorize, either by endorsement or delivery, the possessor of the document to transfer or receive the goods thereby represented. [P 127 C 2]

(c) Contract Act (1872), S. 102—Delivery order may or may not be negotiable.

A delivery order is a document of title to the goods to which it relates and the property of the transferor in the goods passes to the transferee by delivery of the document; but when once delivery has been made to the person entitled, the delivery order is exhausted and ceases to have any effect. [P 128 C 2]

A delivery order may or may not be negotiable according to the conditions attached to it or according to the usage of trade under which it is issued: Case-law discussed. [P 126 C 2]

(d) Contract Act (1872), Ss. 102, 108 and 178—Document showing title to goods—Transferability of—Transfer of Property Act (1882) S. 137.

A document may be negotiable although it contains conditions, but when a seller of goods issues a document the real effect of which is that he will hand over certain goods to anyone producing the document provided he has them and he has been paid his price and all charges in connexion with them, no usage or custom of trade can compel him to hand the goods over if he has not the goods or has not been paid the price and stipulated charges. [P 126 C 1]

A document showing title to goods represents the goods to which it relates and the law governing its transferability is the same as the law which governs the transferability of the goods themselves and is contained in Ss. 108 and 178, Contract Act. [P 126 C 1]

Fox, C. J.—Khoo Beng Ok was a Chinese merchant who had a rice mill on the Dalla side of the Rangoon river and his office in Rangoon. By two contracts in forms usual in the trade he sold 660 bags of boiled rice to S. P. S. Hoosain Nyna, a dealer in rice. According to the terms of the contracts delivery of the rice was to be taken ex-hopper into the buyer's gunny bags; but the bags could not be removed from the mill until the price of the rice in them and other charges (if any) in respect of it had been paid for. Nyna took delivery of the rice ex-hopper and on 7th February he paid for it by giving Khoo Beng Ok a Cheffy's cheque on one of the European Banks. In exchange for this Khoo Beng Ok gave Nyna his receipted bills for the rice and an order to his godown keeper at the mill which is in the following terms:

On the same day a durwan or messenger from Nyna went to the mill to take away the rice. He did not bring the delivery order but said that on his signature the delivery order could be obtained next day in Rangoon. Khoo Beng Ok's eldest son, who was at the time in charge of the mill, referred to his father in Rangoon by telephone, and was authorized by him to allow the rice to be removed by the durwan on his signing for it. The bags were loaded into cargo boat No. 914 and shipped on the same day on the S. S. Oxfordshire for Colombo. The Bought Note and the Bill of Lading represent S. S. A. S. Sochalingam Chetty, the man who had given the cheque in payment of the rice, as the shipper, and the consignee at Colombo was S. S. A. S. Palaniappa Chetty. It does not appear what rights this firm had over the rice, but having given a cheque for the price of it, and got the shipping documents for it made out in its name, the firm in all probability had the rights of at least a pledgee in respect of it.

There is no evidence as to how Khoo Beng Ok was induced to authorize removal of the rice from his mill without production of the delivery order. His evidence was not available in the case because he died shortly after the suit was filed. He did not get back the delivery order next day or at all. There is no evidence as to his having made any attempt to get it back. On 21-5 February Nyna went to the plaintiff firm which lends money on the security of delivery orders, and told the plaintiff's son that he had to pay for rice on the following day. The terms of an advance were arranged, and next day Nyna came to the plaintiff's office with a durwan who had the delivery order and receipted bills given by Khoo Beng Ok to Nyna on 17th February. Nyna said that this man was the mill owner's durwan. The plaintiff's son gave Nyna a cheque on a Bank for Rs. 4,000 which Nyna endorsed and handed over to the durwan, to whom was also paid Rs. 1,584-10-0, and the durwan gave the delivery order and Khoo Beng Ok's receipted bills to the plaintiff's son. The latter believed that the durwan was the employee of the miller, and understood that the money and cheque were going to the miller.

Nothing happened in connexion with the delivery order until early in the following May, when it became known that Nyna had absconded. The fraud committed by him in connexion with the delivery order in suit was not the only one he committed. He apparently used forged delivery orders also, and is undergoing imprisonment on account of such offences. After presenting the delivery order in suit to Khoo Beng Ok and calling on him to deliver the rice mentioned in it, the plaintiff firm, on this being refused filed their suit for Rs. 5,584-10-0, the price of the rice under the contracts with Nyna, and for Rs. 217-12, the cost of the gunny bags and twine supplied by Nyna. They also claimed interest. They based their claim on the ground that by the custom of the rice trade the delivery order which they held was a negotiable instrument entitling the bona fide holder of it for value to the delivery of the bags of rice mentioned in it. In 1890 the Recorder of Rangoon held in Vyavon Chetty v. Oung Zay and Mohr Bros., Ltd. (1) that a delivery order from the office of a rice milling firm in Rangoon to one of its mills in the outskirts was neither (1) a document of title to the rice referred to in it; nor (2) a negotiable instrument. He also held that it had not been proved in the case that there was a trade custom prevalent in Rangoon by which holders of delivery orders for rice can claim the rice mentioned therein free from the vendor's lien for the price and the charges thereon.

The first of the above propositions was based on LeGeyt v. Harvey (2). From the recent decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Hamdas Vithaldas Durrbar v. Amarchand & Co. (3), it seems to follow that what was decided in LeGeyt v. Harvey (2) is no longer good law. The second proposition that delivery orders could not be negotiable instruments was based on Crouch v. Credit Foncier Co. (4). In that case Blackburn, J., one of the most eminent of commercial lawyers, laid down in effect that no instrument made in England could be a negotiable instrument unless it was so under the law merchant, or it had been made so by legislation. In Goodwin v. Roberts (5) in the Exchequer Chamber Cockburn, C. J., an equally eminent lawyer, expressly dissented from this proposition and held that negotiable lity could be attached to documents by the usages of a trade. The following are extracts from his judgment:

"While we quite agree that the greater or less time during which a custom has existed may be material in determining how far it has generally prevailed, we cannot think that if a usage is once shown to be universal, it is the less entitled to prevail because it may not have formed part of the law merchant as previously recognised and adopted by the Courts." We cannot concur in thinking that if proof of general usages had been established, it would have been a sufficient ground for refusing to give effect to it that it did not form part of what is called 'the ancient law merchant'."

It has been suggested by Mr. Willis in his work on Negotiable Securities, (1901), W. Willis' Law of Negotiable Securities 37 that the above two decisions are reconcilable, and that the decision in Crouch v. Credit Foncier Co. (4) was still good law, but Kennedy, J., in Beshuanaland Exploration Company v. London Trading Bank (5) and Bigham, J., in Edelstein v. Schuler and Co. (7) held that the ruling of Blackburn, J., to which I have referred, had been overruled. In a note on p. 275 of Edn. 12 of Sir William Anson's English Law of Contract it is said:

"This extension of the range of negotiability by recent usages may perhaps need confirmation by Courts of appeal."

In Gilbertson & Co. v. Anderson and Colman (6), Wilis, J., refused to attach the attribute of negotiability to a delivery order by the vendor of goods on board a ship addressed to the master purter of a ship. Whatever may be the future decision of the English Appeal Courts in England on the controverted ruling of Blackburn, J., this Court has to be guided by the decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council, and it appears to me that in Ramdas Vithaldas Durbhar v. Amerchand & Co. (3), their Lordships' decision involves the acceptance of the proposition that negotiability can be attached to documents by mercantile usage. In that case the main question was whether a railway receipt was a "document of title" or "a document showing title," but the question of negotiability was also involved, and their Lordships held that by S. 102, Contract Act, the legislature intended to assimilate other documents of title to bills of lading for the purpose of determining the right of stoppage in transit in favour of a bona fide purchaser for value. As regards the question whether the railway receipt in question was a "document of title" or a "document showing title," their Lordships remark:

"In their Lordships' opinion the only possible conclusion is that whenever any doubt arises as to whether a particular document is a 'document showing title' or a 'document of title' to goods for the purposes of the Contract Act, the test is whether the document in question is used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorising or purporting to authorise either by endorsement or delivery the possessor of the document to transfer or receive the goods thereby represented."

They held that the railway receipt in question satisfied this test and that a pledgee who advanced money on the security of a railway receipt was entitled to the goods as against an unpaid vendor. The effect of S. 137, T. P. Act, is that in the case of the documents mentioned in the explanation to it, a transfer in writing and notice to the holder of goods is not necessary in order to constitute a valid transfer of goods mentioned in them. Amongst the documents mentioned in the explanation is an order for the delivery of goods. In Anglo-Indian Jute Mills Co. v. Omademull (9), a delivery order from the agents of the Company in Calcutta to the Manager of one of its mills to deliver goods to a named firm or order was held to be a document of title, and the evidence establishing that delivery orders of the nature of the one in suit passed from hand to hand by endorsement and were sold and dealt with in the market, and that according to the invariable course of dealing in the Calcutta jute trade delivery orders were only issued on cash payment and were dealt with in the market as absolutely representing the goods to which they related free from any lien of the seller, the Mill Company were held liable to pay the plaintiffs the amounts they had advanced on the delivery order, although a post dated cheque which the buyers had given in payment for the goods was dishonoured and the Mill Company had never received payment. The company by issuing the delivery order lost its seller's lien on the goods in its possession.

The main ground of the decision was that the company had represented that the delivery order would pass and confer a good title to the goods, and they had put it in the power of the buyers to endorse the delivery order with this representation to the plaintiffs who, dealing in good faith and for value, were induced to alter their position on the faith of the representation so made. The form of delivery order in the present case differs considerably from the form in an order for delivery without any condition; in the present case the form expressly states that the order for delivery is subject to conditions, one of which appears on the front of the sheet of paper and the others on the back. Although it may be said that by it the miller undertakes to deliver the bags of rice mentioned in it to whoever produces it to the godown keeper, the document itself gives notice to anyone asked to advance money on it that he may not be able to obtain the rice at all by means of it if the rice has been destroyed by fire, and that he will not obtain it if the price and all godown rent and other charges in respect of it have not been paid. The conditions set out are sufficient to put a prudent man on enquiry as to whether the rice was still in existence and as to whether the price and all charges payable to the miller have been paid, when he is asked either to buy the rice or to advance money on the order.

With such conditions plainly stated in the order itself it is difficult to see how the miller can be held to have made a representation to every one into whose hands the documents might come bona fide that he would hand over the rice even if he had not been paid its price. The ratio decidendi in the Calcutta case does not appear to me to apply in the present case, because of the terms of the delivery order giving every one who reads them notice that the rice may not be in existence, and if in existence, may not have been paid for, and that the seller retains his lien for everything due in respect of it. No doubt a document may be negotiable although it contains conditions: a bill of lading usually contains many conditions absolving the carrier from liability for not delivering the goods covered by it, but when a seller of goods issues a document the real effect of which is that he will hand over certain goods to anyone proceeding the document provided he has them, and that he has been paid his price and all charges in connexion with them, can any usage or custom of trade compel him to hand the goods over if he has not the goods and has not been paid his price and his stipulated charges? I think not. The above appears to me to be the effect of the delivery order which we have to deal with in the present case, and the right of any one claiming under it must, in my judgment, be determined by the terms of the document itself. Under prov. 5, to S. 92, Evidence Act, a usage or custom by which incidents not expressly mentioned in a contract are usually annexed to contracts of that description may be proved, provided that the annexing of such incidents would not be repugnant to or inconsistent with the express terms of the contract. The usage sought to be applied to the delivery order in this case is that the miller who issues such a delivery order is bound to hand over the goods mentioned in it to anyone who produces the document notwithstanding he has not been paid for them. Such a usage would, in my opinion, be repugnant to and inconsistent with the express terms of the document under which the seller expressly has a lien on the rice mentioned in the delivery order until it has been paid for and until all godown rent and other charges have been paid.

How then can such delivery orders be said to have become negotiable instruments by virtue of a custom or usage in the trade when the custom or usage in the trade cannot be proved? In my judgment Khoo Beng Ok was not liable to the plaintiff and his representatives are not. So far as it goes, no doubt the evidence shows that delivery orders by mill owners to their mill managers are used to obtain advances on in Rangoon, but I should require better and more cogent evidence than was produced in this case before being satisfied that the general body of mill owners in Rangoon regard their obligations in respect of delivery orders issued by them to their mill managers in the same light as the witnesses for the plaintiff in this case. It would be surprising if mill owners had given up the distinctly advantageous position in which the decision in Vyavon Chetty v. Oung Zay and Mohr Bros. Ltd. (1) placed them. If money-lenders choose to advance money without reading and having regard to the terms of the documents on which they are asked to advance, they do so at their own risk. Khoo Beng Ok fulfilled the contract in respect of which he gave the delivery order. The order itself contains no guarantee or undertaking that he would hold the goods and not deliver to anyone except some one who produced the order. The terms of this order put every one asked to advance money on it on inquiry as to whether the goods exist, and whether the mill owner will deliver them without payment. I am unable to hold that by issuing such a document Khoo Beng Ok estopped himself from denying that he had delivered the goods to the person with whom he had contracted, or to hold that he and his representatives are liable to the plaintiff on the ground of estoppel. I would allow the appeal, set aside the decrees of the original Court and dismiss the suit, ordering the plaintiff to pay the defendants' costs of the suit and of this appeal, allowing the defendants extra costs of 10 gold mohurs a day for three days in the original Court.

Ormond, J.—The respondents are the legal representatives of Khoo Beng Ok (deceased), who owned a rice mill and sold under two contracts 660 bags of boiled rice to Nyna, a dealer in rice. On 17th February Nyna paid for the rice and the miller gave him receipted bills and a delivery order on his godown keeper (Ex. A). The document is expressed to be subject to the terms of the two contracts and directed delivery to be given to Nyna or bearer. The goods were ascertained and were the property of Nyna in the custody of the miller. Later, on the same day Nyna obtained delivery of the goods without giving up the delivery order, saying that it was in Rangoon and that he would return it the next day. Nyna at that time was in possession of the delivery order. On 22nd February Nyna fraudulently obtained from the plaintiff Rs. 5,584.10.0 on the two receipted bills and the delivery order; and in May he disappeared. The plaintiff then sued the miller to recover this amount which was also the value of the goods covered by the delivery order. The plaintiff obtained a decree and the defendant now appeals. The evidence shows that Ex. A, which is in a form well known in the trade, is transferable by delivery; that it is not issued until the goods have been paid for; that receipted bills showing such payment are attached to the delivery order and the documents are passed on; that Banks will advance money on the delivery order when they are satisfied that the goods have been paid for; and that delivery is given upon production of the document.

In the case of Vyavaran Chetty v. Oung Zay and Mour Bros Ltd. (1) (which was decided by the Recorder of Rangoon in 1890) the transferee of delivery orders, similar to Ex. A, sued the miller. He obtained a decree on the delivery order, the goods for which had been paid for; but this claim on the delivery orders, the goods for which had not been paid for, was dismissed on the ground that the delivery orders were not negotiable instruments and that the vendor had not lost his lien. It was also held in that case that the delivery orders were not documents of title—following the English decisions—but a decree was given to the plaintiff against the miller in respect of the rice which had been paid for on the ground that the miller could not have refused to deliver to his buyer and that, therefore, he could not refuse to deliver to the holder of the delivery order. The test whether a document is a document of title or merely a token of authority to receive possession, is laid down by the Privy Council in Ramdas Vithaldas Durbar v. Amerchand & Co. (3), where it is said:

"The test is whether the document in question is used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorising or purporting to authorise, either by endorsement or delivery, the possession of the document to transfer or receive the goods thereby represented."

Upon the evidence this delivery order must be taken to be a document showing title to goods. The delivery order expressly states that it is subject to the terms of the contract and that the goods are not to be removed before payment. It thus preserves the vendor's lien for the price of the goods (if not already paid for) and it shows that the person who acquires the property in the goods is subject to any liability which attaches to the original buyer under the contract. The learned Judge has held that this delivery order is not only a document of title to goods, but that it is also a "negotiable instrument", and that the plaintiff as the "holder", therefore, was entitled to recover as against the defendant; and he also held that the defendant was estopped from saying that the delivery order was exhausted by reason of delivery having been given to the buyer. The learned Judge has, I think, overlooked the fact that in all the cases where a document has been held to be a

"negotiable instrument" an essential element of the decision was that by the custom of the money market, the document was transferable as if it were cash. A bona fide transferee of cash obtained a good title to the cash (because of its currency) although his transferor might have stolen it. The document in such a case, therefore, had the element of "negotiability" properly so called; a bona fide transferee for value of the document acquired a good title even though his transferor had none. Upon this principle certain securities for money (such as bonds and scrip) have been held to be negotiable instruments, although they would not be covered by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. But a document showing title to goods is on a different footing: the document is taken to represent the goods to which it relates and the law governing its transferability is the same as the law which governs the transferability of the goods themselves. And this law, apart from any question of estoppel, is to be found in ss. 108 and 178, Contract Act. In Scrutton on Charter Parties at p. 155, Note 1, it is said:

"'Negotiable' is a term which perhaps strictly should be reserved for instruments which may give to a transferee a better title than that possessed by the transferor. A bill of lading is not 'negotiable' in this sense; the endorsee does not get a better title than his assignor. A bill of lading is 'negotiable' to the same extent as a cheque marked 'not negotiable', i. e., it is 'not transferable'."

Blackburn, J., in Cole v. North Wes. tern Bank (10) says:

"The possession of bills of lading or other documents of title to goods did not at Common Law confer on the holder of them any greater power than the possession of the goods themselves. The transfer of a bill of lading for goods in transitu had the same effect in defeating the unpaid vendor's right to stop in transitu that an actual delivery of the goods themselves under the same circumstances would have had. But the transfer of the document of title by means of which actual possession of the goods could be obtained had no greater effect at Common Law than the transfer of the actual possession."

And Lord Campbell, C. J., in Gurney v. Behrend (11) says:

A bill of lading is not, like a bill of exchange or promissory note, a negotiable instrument which passes by mere delivery to a bona fide transferee for valuable consideration, without regard to the title of the parties who make the transfer. Although the shipper may have endorsed in blank a bill of lading deliverable to his assigns, his rights is not affected by an appropriation of it without his authority. If it be stolen from him or transferred without his authority, a subsequent bona fide transferee for value cannot make title under it as against the shipper of the goods. The Bill of Lading only represents the goods, and in this instance the transfer of the symbol does not operate more than a transfer of what is represented."

The delivery order is a document of title to the goods to which it relates and the property of the transferor in the goods passes to the transferee by delivery of the document. This delivery order purported to be a document of title to certain specific goods belonging to Nyna in the custody of the defendant which were deliverable under certain contracts. But when the plaintiff acquired this title, the goods had ceased to exist and there was no title in Nyna; the plaintiff, therefore, acquired no title to any goods. No doubt the defendant, by giving delivery to Nyna without the production of the delivery order, did so at his own risk; and if Nyna had pledged the delivery order with the plaintiff before he received delivery, the defendant would be liable to the plaintiff for having wrongfully disposed of the plaintiff's property. But Nyna was then in possession of the delivery order and was the person entitled to delivery. When once delivery has been given to the person entitled, the delivery order is exhausted. Channell, J., in London Joint Stock Bank v. British Amsterdam Maritime Agency (12) says:

"If Messrs. Palmers were the persons entitled at that time to have the goods delivered to them, then it seems to me that the bill of lading would be exhausted." See also Scrutton on Charter Parties pp. 185 and 273."

Delivery having been given to the person entitled the delivery order ceased to have any effect.

Section 178 and 108, Exception 1, of the Contract Act do not help the plaintiff because there were no goods and the delivery order having become exhausted there was no delivery order. Moreover, Nyna was not, and never had been, in possession of the document by the consent of the owner (defendant); for Nyna was himself the owner of the delivery order until he took delivery and after delivery, though the defendant was entitled to have the document given up to him, it was not by his consent that Nyna retained it. As to estoppel, if A issues a mercantile document to which, by the custom of the trade, certain incidents are attached, he is estopped from denying that he is bound by those incidents, unless there is something in the document to show the contrary. Thus the maker of a delivery order which by the custom of the trade relates to goods which have been paid for, is estopped from saying that they have not been paid for and he loses his lien: Merchant Banking Company of London v. Phoenix Bessemer Steel Company (13). In Goodwin v. Roberts (5), followed by Rumball v. Metropolitan Bank (14), it was decided that upon the ground of estoppel a person who deposits with an agent a security on the face of it payable to bearer, cannot recover it from a bona fide holder for value to whom the agent had fraudulently transferred it, whether it be a negotiable instrument, recognized by law as such or not, because he had made a representation on the face of the scrip that it would pass with a good title to anyone who took it in good faith and for value. But as pointed out by Lord Selborne in France v. Black (15) and by Lord Esher in Fine Art Society v. Union Bank (16) the fact that the document in that case was treated as a "negotiable instrument" by the mercantile world was essential to the decision. And Lord Bramwell in Colonial Bank v. Cady (17) says:

"I cannot, with all respect to Lord Cairns, see any ground for applying the doctrine of Pickard v. Sears (18) in Goodwin v. Roberts (5). The plaintiff there was not making a claim inconsistent with anything he had theretofore said or done."

It clearly could not have been intended to decide that the maker of every document, which is transferable by delivery, is estopped from denying that it is a negotiable instrument, when it is not a negotiable instrument either at law or by custom. In the present case there was no implied representation by the defendant that he would deliver the goods to anyone who was a bona fide transferee for value of the document: but merely that he would deliver the goods to anyone who had a good title to the delivery order, and that an endorsement of the delivery order was not necessary in order to pass the title. If the bailee had notice that the person presenting the delivery order was not entitled to the delivery order, and he gave him delivery he would do so at his own risk. Lastly it is urged that the defendant is estopped by his negligence in not taking back the delivery order; and that by his omission to do so, he enabled Nyna to perpetrate the fraud on the plaintiff. There is no question as to the bona fides of the defendant. No duty was cast on the defendant to recover the document. Nyna was not the defendant's agent, and the defendant was not responsible for him. So far from there being any negligence on the part of the defendant, he could not possibly have recovered the document if Nyna did not intend to give it up. Nothing on the part of the defendant but actual notice to the plaintiff could have prevented Nyna from perpetrating this fraud on the plaintiff. Though the defendant might have foreseen the possibility of Nyna making a fraudulent use of the document, he could not foresee who the victim might be; and consequently he could not give notice to the plaintiff. The omission by the defendant was not the proximate cause of the loss; but rather the plaintiff's omission in not making inquiries from the defendant and satisfying himself that the document was a genuine delivery order and that the goods were in existence: see the judgments of Bramwell and Brett, J.J., in Berendse v. Bennett (19).

I would allow the appeal, set aside the decree and dismiss the suit with costs to the defendant in both Courts. On the original side the plaintiff was given extra costs of 10 gold mohurs a day for three days—the defendant should have there extra costs.

For the purpose of granting sanction for a prosecution on the ground of perjury, depositions to which the procedure laid down in S. 260 Criminal P. Order.—In this case there was an enquiry under S. 476 Criminal P. C., resulting in the order for the prosecution of the applicant for perjury under S. 193, I. P. C., in respect of certain statements made by him in Criminal Regular No. 128 of 1916 of the Second Additional Magistrate's Court, Moulmein. The statements were made in the course of a deposition which was not read over to the applicant in the presence of the accused or his pleader. The learned Sessions Judge has on the authority of Nga San Myin v. Emperor (1), recommended that the Magistrate's order directing the prosecution of the applicant be set aside.

The case cited is supported by Mohendra Nath Misser v. Emperor (2), which followed Kamachinathan Chetty v. Emperor (3), and Jyotish Chandra Mukerji v. Emperor (4). In the last case Jenkins, C. J., in dealing with the argument that S. 360 was directory and not obligatory, observed:

"Such a departure from the terms of the Criminal Procedure Code might lead to considerable embarrassment, and place a serious impediment, in the proper administration of justice, for there are cases in which it has been held that, for the purposes of a prosecution on the ground of perjury, depositions to which the procedure laid down in S. 260 has not been applied, cannot be properly used."

There is a contrary view expressed by Miller, J., in In re Bogra (5), where the Madras case cited above was disapproved. The disapproval was expressed in these words:

"When the deposition has been read over to the witness and he has admitted it to be correct, there seems to be no good reason why that admission should not, so far as he is concerned, be regarded as a proof of its correctness. I cannot see why a deposition irregularly recorded is necessarily to be treated as a nullity for all purposes even as against the man who made it and who has admitted that it represents what he said."

The difficulty in following Miller, J., lies in the facts that under S. 91, Evidence Act, the document embodying the deposition is the only evidence of the statement charged having been made, and that under S. 80 of the same Act it is admissible only when it was taken in accordance with law. As stated in the judgment of the Upper Burma case above cited, it is from this point of view that the illegality arises. I am of opinion with due deference that Miller, J.'s view cannot be adopted. The Upper Burma case, as supported by Calcutta and Madras as shown above, should therefore be followed. I, therefore, accept the Sessions Judge's recommendation and set aside the Magistrate's order directing the prosecution of the applicant for perjury.

buffaloes and made them over to Maung Ne Dun to tend on payment of eight baskets of paddy. One of these animals was vicious and was known to be vicious both by her and Ne Dun. Whilst the buffaloes were in charge of a small boy named Maung Thin, son of Ne Dun, they gored to death one of Maung Shwe The's buffaloes. Maung Shwe The sued Ma Myaing and Maung Thin for damages: the Township Judge held that Ma Myaing was not liable and dismissed the suit against her, but the appellate Court reversed this decision. The District Judge based his judgment on the negligence of Ma Myaing in not seeing that her buffaloes' horns were cut, and in not taking care that a mere boy was not left in charge of them. The real point in issue was whether Ma Myaing, having made over her buffaloes to Ne Dun's charge, was any longer responsible for any damage they might cause. Ne Dun accepted the charge of the animals with knowledge of their nature. The appellate Court did not consider the real issue in the case at all, and in failing to do so, acted with illegality according to the ruling in Zeya v. Ma On Kra Zan (1). The answer to the question as to whose the responsibility is in a case such as the present must, I think, depend on whether Ne Dun after taking charge of the buffaloes for hire was Ma Myaing's servant. Ne Dun was an agister who received Ma Myaing's buffaloes to tend on hire. He was exercising an independent calling at the time the goring took place and was not under orders from Ma Myaing. He seems to me to have been in the position of a bailee and not of a servant. In Milligan v. Wedge (2), the facts were that the owner of a bullock employed a drover to drive it from Smithfield where he had bought it. The drover employed a boy, through whose careless driving mischief was caused. It was held that the owner of the bullock was not liable. Coleridge, J., said:

"The true test is to ascertain the relation between the party charged and the party actually doing the injury. Unless the relation of master and servant exists between them, the act of the one creates no liability in the other."

The negligence in the present case was that of Ne Dun, who left his young son to look after fourteen buffaloes. The decree of the District Court is set aside and that of the Township Court is restored.

Special Government Appeal No. 105 of 1916.
Decided on 4th May 1917.

(a) Limitation Act (1903), Sec. 1, Art. 142—Suit for possession on ground of dispossession—Limitation runs from date of dispossession—Suit is governed by Art. 142.

Where a plaintiff's claim is based on the ground that he and his predecessor have been dispossessed or discontinued possession, the period from which limitation runs is the date of dispossession or discontinuance of possession, and the burden is on the plaintiff to show that he or his predecessor's title has been in possession within 12 years of the date of suit, and the article applicable to the suit is Art. 142 Limit. Act.

(b) Limitation—Statute of Limitation applicable to suit—Objection of simple laches does not apply until expiration of time allowed by law—Laches and acquiescence—Difference between.

Where there is a Statute of Limitation applicable to the suit, the objection of simple laches does not apply until the expiration of the time allowed by the statute. But acquiescence is a different thing: it means more than laches. If a party who can object lies by, and knowingly permits another to incur an expense in doing an act under a belief that it would not be objected to and a kind of permission may be said to be given to another to alter his condition, he is said to acquiesce.

Judgment.—Both the lower Courts have held that the defendant-respondent did encroach on the plaintiff-appellant's lands to the extent sued for, by building on it. The main defence is, however, involved in the question whether Art. 142 or 144, Limit. Act, applies. The plaintiff alleges that he was in possession when the encroachment took place in 1908 or 1909, and that he was thereby dispossessed of the land taken up. Following the ruling of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Mohana Chunder Mozoomdar v. Mohesh Chunder Neoghi (1) a Division Bench of this Court in Moung Ya Gyaw v. Ma Nywe (2) has held that if a plaintiff claims on the ground that he and his predecessors have been in possession but have been dispossessed or have discontinued possession, the period for which limitation runs is the date of dispossession or discontinuance and the burden is on the plaintiff to show that he or his predecessors-in-title have been in possession within 12 years of the date of suit. No other ruling of this Court contrary to that ruling has been cited before me. It must, therefore, be held that Art. 142 applies and that the onus is upon the plaintiff to show that he was dispossessed within 12 years of the date of the suit, that is to say, that the defendant built her house within that period.

On this point the Court of first instance held that the defendant did build her house about six years before the suit. The District Court on appeal disagreed with that finding. The plaintiff's witnesses on this point are Maung Po Thaing, Maung Tun Baw, Maung Po Thin, Kannuswami and Rahim Bux. The Township Judge believed the evidence of the first three, but did not attach much importance to the evidence of the last two. The District Judge explained away the evidence of the three relied on by the Township Judge by holding in effect that they had nothing to go on in their recollections of the time when the encroachment took place. In my view Maung Po Thaing's evidence is absolutely reliable. The witness is a joint sub-registrar and a pensioned thugyi and has lived long at Kyauktan in his official capacity as a talk thugyi and has had much to do with the buildings of that place. He remembers that in 1892 there was a space of ten feet between the two houses which were respectively standing on the two sites in question. "The man on the north of it," he says, "owned five feet of it; the man on the south of it owned five feet of it." The next thing he remembers is that about six or seven years ago the defendant's present house was built by her husband, since deceased, the plaintiff having built his present house before then. The witness goes on to say that the plaintiff built his house exactly on the space taken up by the old house, but that the defendant's husband built his, taking up not only his five feet of the vacant space between the two houses but also one foot of plaintiff's land. Maung Po Thaing also remembers that 17 years ago there was a dispute between the owners of the two houses as regards the boundary line within the two houses and he settled it. Here the witness is talking evidently about the predecessors-in-title of the parties to this suit. He therefore has had much to do with the two sites and remembers a great deal about them. He has held a responsible position in which he must have had many opportunities of looking into matters concerning the small group of houses known as the town of Kyauktan. I do not think that such a person's evidence can lightly be disregarded, when he says that a certain house was built such and such a time ago. It cannot be said that he said so in an irresponsible way. He must be credited with some sense of responsibility and must be taken to have thought over the matter and given the time after due consideration. That he assigns no reason for remembering the date of defendant's building is not a matter which can be used against his testimony. It was for the defendant to ask the necessary question. Again, it must be borne in mind that Maung Po Thaing says that the plaintiff's present house was built before the defendant's present house. The plaintiff bought that site with the old house thereon in July 1902 and the suit was brought on 9th October 1915, a little over thirteen years from the date of the purchase. This being so, Maung Po Thaing's estimate of the length of the time that has elapsed since the building of defendant's house must be held to be reliable. This fact will be presently developed into one of great importance in this case. Regarding the evidence of Maung Tun Baw and Po Thin the learned District Judge says that if their evidence stands alone, he would agree with the Township Judge that it should be accepted but that he thinks Ah Waing's evidence is against their testimony.

Now I think that Ah Waing's evidence when analysed carefully is not reliable one way or the other. I have no doubt that he had a good reason to remember the date of the defendant's building of the present house before the reason assigned by the District Judge but the question is whether as a fact he remembers it or not. I do not think that he does. Ah Waing says that the plaintiff's present house was built five or six years before the defendant's present house. If that was all he says, there would be no doubt that his evidence supports Maung Po

Thaing, Tun Baw and Po Thio, for the plaintiff's deed of purchase is dated July 1902 and the present house must have been built after the purchase. But Ah Waing goes on to say that the defendant's house was built 12 or 13 years ago. This cannot be true in view of the date of the plaintiff's deed of purchase; if what he said previously is true, if both the statements are true, the witness has driven himself into an absurdity, for the plaintiff would then appear to have built the house five or six years before the date of his purchase. Ah Waing's evidence is therefore unreliable, although it may be said that he appears to be an honest witness. In the result it is, in my opinion, the proper thing to place reliance upon the evidence of Maung Po Thaing and the other two Burman witnesses. I therefore hold that the plaintiff succeeded in discharging the onus that was on him. Counsel for the defendant argued that, even if the plaintiff's case was established in its entirety, the defendant should not be compelled to pull down her house which she had occupied for so long, but that she should be ordered to pay such compensation as was reasonable under the circumstances. The reason urged for this contention is that the plaintiff waited six or seven years before he filed his suit, without having previously made any complaint. Mr. Broadbent cited Brommo Moyee Debia Chowdhraim v. Komondinee Kant Banerjee (3) and Nil Kant Sahoy v. Jujoo Sahoo (4). In the first case there were two appeals, in the second of which the suit was to have a privy erected upon a very small bit of land, about four cowries demolished.

Both the lower Courts had concurrently held that the privy had been erected for seven years or so with the consent of the plaintiffs. The consent appears to have been inferred from the facts that the plaintiffs had been aware of the facts that the privy was erected, and that they allowed it to be completed and to remain standing for many years. The learned Judges of the High Court held that the consent had been rightly inferred and dismissed the appeal of the plaintiffs. In the second case the plaintiff claimed to enforce his right to an easement. Upon the facts it was held that he had not proved such use as would be necessary for the purpose of establishing the right of easement claimed, but the learned Judge went on to say:

"We will add that, supposing that the plaintiff had the right which he alleges in this case, he could not be allowed in equity to stand by and see the defendant building a house and erecting a chubootaran before he complained in any way of his right being infringed by those acts. He was bound at once to do his best to prevent the defendant from putting a permanent obstacle in the way of the enjoyment of his rights. If he silently stands by and permits himself to go to the expense of erecting a building upon his own land before he complains, a Court of equity ought to be every day to listen to his complaint when the consequence of giving effect to that complaint will be to cause a very considerable damage and loss to the defendant."

With due respect I am unable to accept the law as laid down in either of these cases, for in my opinion it is too general in expression and too wide in effect. The law was laid down in somewhat similar terms to that in the above cases by a Superior Judge in Gopi v. Bisheshar (5):

"It is unnecessary for me to build upon his land and with the knowledge that the building is being erected, stand by and does not prevent the other from doing so, then, no doubt, equity comes in, and by the rules of equity, which in this respect are the same as the rules of law, he cannot object that either person," and their Lordships of the Privy Council in Beni Ram v. Kundal Lal (6) remarked that it was to be regretted that the loose and inadequate statement of the rule of equity reported in Gopi v. Bisheshar (5) should have been accepted apparently without much consideration by the learned Judges of the High Court. I shall first of all deal with the English law on the subject of laches and acquiescence:

"A plaintiff in equity is bound to prosecute his claim without undue delay. This is in pursuance of the principle which underlies the statutes of limitation, vigilantibus et non dormientibus lex succurrit. A Court of equity refuses its aid to stale demands, where the plaintiff has slept upon his right and acquiesced for a great length of time. He is then said to be barred by his laches. The defence of laches however is only allowed where there is no statutory bar. If there is a statutory bar, operating either expressly or by way of analogy, the plaintiff is entitled to the full statutory period before his claim becomes unenforceable. (Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 13, p. 105, S. 203)."

But there appears to be a distinction between laches and acquiescence. In Archbold v. Scutty (7) Lord Wensleydale points out the distinction in the following words:

4. (1878) 20 W. R. 325.

5. (1881) A. W. N. 100.

6. (1891) 21 All. 41 = 2, 1 A. 28 (P. C.).

7. (1861) 2 H. L. C. 30.

"I take it that where there is a Statute of Limitations, the objection of simple laches does not apply until the expiration of the time allowed by the statute. But acquiescence is a different thing; it means more than laches. If a party, who could object, lies by and knowingly permits another to incur an expense in doing an act under the belief that it would not be objected to and so a kind of permission may be said to be given to another to alter his condition, he may be said to acquiesce; but the fact of simply neglecting to enforce a claim for the period during which the law permits him to delay without losing his right, I conceive, cannot be any equitable bar."

With these observations must be read what was said by the same learned Judge and Lord Chancellor Cranworth in Ramsden v. Dyson (8). There both their Lordships declared that if a stranger builds on the land of another supposing it to be his own and the owner does not interfere but leaves him to go on, equity considers it dishonest in the owner to remain passive and afterwards to interfere and take the profits. But if a stranger builds on the land of another knowingly, there is no principle which prevents the owner from insisting on having back his land, with all the additional value which the occupier has imprudently added to it; and Lord Wensleydale added that, if a tenant does the using same thing, he cannot insist on re-to give up the estate at the end of his term. It was his own folly to build. This was stated in the Allahabad case of Uda Begam v. Inamuddin (9) as the effect of the observations of their Lordships and was adopted as law applicable to India.

"These dicta" say the learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court, "of the highest authority illustrate the application of the general rule. There must be something more than a mere delaying in instituting proceedings to deprive a man of his legal remedies."

Then the learned Judges in dealing with the facts of the case proceed to say that the appellant, knowing that the respondent was building on her lands, abstained from commencing proceedings for one or two years, that the respondents must have known that they had no claim to the land and that they could hardly have doubted that it belonged to the appellant, and that the delay in bringing the suit was therefore not sufficient to deprive the appellant of her right to relief. In Beni Ram v. Kundan

Lal (6) their Lordships of the Privy Council adopted the principle laid down by Lord Chancellor Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale in Ramsden v. Dyson (8). In Fatehyab Khan v. Mahammad Yusuf (10) the suit was for the removal of a building erected by the defendants upon certain land over which the plaintiffs alleged that all the residents of the mohalla where the parties lived had from time immemorial exercised a right of way to and from their residences, besides using it for social gatherings and other common purposes. Ramsden v. Dyson (8) was followed and Edge, C. J., observed on the facts:

"It appears to me that the acquiescence cannot possibly arise here. It is not suggested that there was any evidence that the plaintiffs had given their actual consent to the building; and the only evidence of acquiescence can be that they did not immediately protest. It appears to me that the defendants in creating this building must have known perfectly well that they were building upon a courtyard which their neighbours had a right sue."

It is clear from the foregoing that besides the plaintiff's delay in instituting proceedings the Court would have to go into the question as to whether or not the person building had reasonable grounds for supposing that the land built on was his own land. In Muhammad Umar Daraz Khan v. Maru (11) Karamat Hussain, J., following Beni Ram's case (6), laid down the law as follows:

"In order to constitute acquiescence and to raise the plea of equitable estoppel an abstinence from interference is not enough. In addition to this there must also be a mistaken belief in the builder that the land upon which he was building was his own property."

So that the defendant may show that he did not build on the land of another knowingly, but under a mistaken belief that it was his. Turning to the question of the fact whether the defendant's husband knew that he was building on a portion of the plaintiff's land or whether he had reasonable ground for believing that he was doing so on his own land but that he had made a mistake, I am unable to come to any other conclusion than that the defendant's husband built the house taking in a portion of the plaintiff's land knowingly and that there was no possibility of a mistake having occurred as to whose property that portion was. Maung Po Thaig's evidence makes it clear that originally there was a well-defined boundary between the two houses in the shape of a fence, and that there was vacant space, 5 feet wide on either side of the fence and that when the defendant's house was re-built, not only was his own vacant space taken up, but a foot of land beyond the fence. This evidence is, in my opinion, reliable. Maung Po Thaio is the only witness in the case who could speak with some knowledge of the place and he speaks very clearly on all the matters he was examined. I hold therefore that the defendant's husband built his house knowing that he was thereby encroaching upon a portion of the plaintiff's land and that there was no possibility of his having made a mistake in thinking that the portion was his. The appeal is allowed. The decree of the District Court is set aside and that of the Court of first instance restored. The defendant-respondent will not however be ordered to pay any costs in any of the Courts, as I think the plaintiff should have brought his suit earlier than he did.

Judgment.—The plaintiff presented a plaint on the original side of this Court whereby he claimed Rs. 824 on a pro note and stated that he desired to proceed under O. 37 of the Code. The plaint was returned to be presented to the proper Court, i. e., the Small Cause Court. The plaintiff now appeals from this order rejecting his plaint. He contends that because R. 2, O. 37, refers to all suits upon bills of exchange, hundis or promissory notes, and because O. 37 does not apply to the Small Cause Court, he is, therefore, entitled to institute his suit in the Chief Court. S. 15 of the Code says: "Every suit shall be instituted in the Court of the lowest grade competent to try it," and S. 16, Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, says:

"A suit cognizable by a Court of Small Causes shall not be tried by any other Court having jurisdiction within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Court of Small Causes."

The suit was one on a promissory note for Rs. 824 and was cognizable by the Court of Small Causes and that Court was competent to try the suit. O. 37 lays down certain rules of procedure which are applicable only to the Chief Court, and such rules of procedure can only be applied after the plaint has been admitted. The rules do not in any way alter the nature of the suit, nor the jurisdiction of the Court. The Chief Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the plaint and it was rightly rejected. This view was adopted in the case of Doulatram Vaidyas v. Holo Kanya (1). The appeal is dismissed with two gold mohurs costs.

He employed the plaintiff to do the stevedoring for him at Moulmein on such ships as should go there. Defendant 1, Commotto, became a partner with Dominic. Then Dominic died and Commotto took defendant 2, McDonald, into partnership with him. The defendants became the stevedores for the London shipowners in the place of Dominic and Co. The plaintiff's agreement with Dominic and Co. was to last five years. Before the termination of the five years the plaintiff entered into a stevedoring agreement with these defendants on 17th January 1913 and these defendants terminated that agreement on 13th March 1913. The plaintiff then instituted a suit on 11th April 1913, in which he sets out his agreement with Dominic and Co. and also his agreement with these defendants and asks for an injunction to restrain the defendants from preventing him from doing stevedoring work under these agreements at Moulmein. One of the defences taken in that suit was that the plaintiff had no right of suit because he was merely Dominic's agent and the suit was dismissed on that ground. The plaintiff then filed the present suit for damages for breach of the agreement between the plaintiff and these defendants. The suit has been dismissed on the ground that these damages having accrued at the time that the first suit was instituted the present claim is barred under O. 2, R. 2, sub-Cl. 3; and it is also dismissed on the ground that, as regards the plaintiff's claim for battens supplied, his claim is res judicata, i. e., that the plaintiff is debarred from suing in his own name. We think the learned District Judge has misunderstood the plaintiff's claim as to this. Plaintiff's claim is for damages against the defendants for breach of contract made between the plaintiff and the defendants. The former suit was dismissed because it was taken to be a suit on the Dominic contract; in the present suit he is suing on a contract between plaintiff and defendants.

It is contended by Mr. Shaw for the defendants that this suit was rightly dismissed under O. 2, R. 2, sub-Cl. 3, because the plaint in the former suit shows that his cause of action there was based not only on the Dominic contract but also on the present contract. We agree with him that that would be a proper construction of that plaint, but it clearly was not so construed by the Court that dismissed that suit, and the view taken by the Court in that suit was the view that was pressed upon it by the defendants' Advocate. For the purposes of res judicata we clearly must construe the plaint in the same way that the Court that decided that suit construed it, i. e., that it was based solely on the contract between the plaintiff and Dominic and Co., and had nothing to do with the present contract. Consequently O. 2, R. 2, sub-Cl. 3, has no application and this suit was wrongly dismissed. The appeal is allowed, the decree is set aside and the case will be sent back to be retried on its merits. There will be a refund of the appellate court-fees under S. 13, Court-fees Act, and costs ten gold mohurs allowed.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit in which the defendants-respondents were sued on a pro-note in their representative capacity. The pro-note was executed by K. Y. Cassim, since deceased. Defendant 1 is the elder brother, and defendants 2 and 3 are daughters of the deceased. Defendant 4 is the deceased's nephew. Defendant 3 is a minor and appeared by her guardian ad litem even in this Court. She was 11 years old, when the suit was filed. Of the defendants the first three only are the heirs of the deceased, defendant 4 Mahomed not being an heir at all. The plaintiffs claim that the suit is not barred by limitation on the ground that defendant 1 made two part-payments which save limitation as against all the defendants. Defendant 1 did not appear to contest the suit. I have to take it that the alleged part-payments have been proved as the suit has been decreed as against defendants 1 and 4. The finding has not been assailed here either. Now it has been held in Arjun Ram Pal v. Rohima Banu (1) that the payment of interest by one of his heirs on a debt due by a deceased person does not save limitation against the other heirs. But it is alleged that defendant 1 made the part payments on his own behalf as well as on behalf of defendants 2 and 3 as their duly authorized agent, inasmuch as he was then the manager and head of a joint family of which defendants 2 and 3 were members. This the latter defendants deny. And there is not a scrap of evidence to show that defendant 1 was such a head. Moreover although the case-law shows that the head of a joint Hindu family might have the necessary authority, it does not appear that the same rule prevails among the Mahomedans.

The learned Judge below observed in his judgment that it is not alleged that defendant 1 was the natural guardian of either of defendants 2 and 3. But it has been argued before me that defendant 1 was the lawful guardian of defendant 3 and as such was a person who falls within the meaning of the words "agent duly authorized in that behalf" in Ss. 19 and 20 Limitation Act, as defined by S. 21 (1) of the same Act. Ss. 107 and 109 of Wilson's Digest of Anglo-Mahomedan law show that failing all the female relatives mentioned in S. 107, the custody of a minor girl under the age of puberty belongs to the father, and failing him to the nearest male paternal relative within the prohibited degrees, reckoning proximity in the same order as for inheritance. In Mahomedan law puberty is presumed on the completion of the 15th year in the case of both males and females, unless there is evidence to show that puberty in the particular case was attained earlier. Defendant 3 was only 11 years old at the date of the institution of the suit and as the part payments were made nearly three years before, she must have been about eight years old then.

1. (1912) 14 I C 128

Defendant 1 was, therefore, the natural guardian of the person of the minor defendant, which means according to the books that the guardianship is for custody and education. I find also that even if the minor defendant had attained puberty defendant 1 would be the guardian of her person (failing father), executor of father's will and father's father H. H. S. provided the minor is unmarried. See S. 111 of Wilson's book. But this is not, in my opinion, sufficient for the purposes of S. 21 (1), Limitation Act. I think defendant 1 should be the guardian of the minor's property as well, because the act in question of his is sought to be made binding on the minor's estate.

Section 112 of Wilson's book gives a list of the natural guardians of the property of a minor indicating the order of priority among them. The father's brother is not included in that list and the section goes on to say that failing all of these it is for the Court to appoint a guardian or guardians. I hold, therefore, that defendant 1 was not "a person duly authorised within the meaning of S. 51 (1), Limitation Act. The result is that the payments made by defendant 1 cannot bind defendants 2 and 3. The appeal is, therefore, dismissed as against defendants 2 and 3 with costs. Defendants 1 and 3 have not appeared before this Court and as against them the plaintiffs ask for interest at 6 per cent. per annum from the date of institution of the suit till realization. They say that they ask for that in their plaint and the learned Judge below failed to deal with their prayer.

Section 34 (2) provides that where a decree is silent with respect to the payment of further interest from the date of the decree to the date of payment, the Court shall be deemed to have refused such interest, and a separate suit therefor shall not lie. The matter must, therefore, be treated as if the lower Court had exercised its discretion and refused to give interest, unless perhaps the plaintiff can show that the silence of that Court upon the point was due to an oversight or mistake, but there is nothing to show this. That being the case, the proper course is to follow the case of Hiralal Ichhalal Majumdar v. Desai Narainlal Chaturbhujdas (2) of which the facts were similar to those in this case, and which decided that the High Court was right in declining to allow the prayer. The appeal is dismissed as against respondents 2 and 3 with costs, the costs in this Court being confined to one advocate's costs, as at the hearing. Mr. Das appeared for both and Mr. Judge, though set down as an advocate for respondent 3, did not appear. The appeal against respondents 1 and 4 as regards the interest asked for is dismissed. The lower Court's decree against them will stand. There will be no order as to costs in their favour, as Mr. A. C. Dhar who, the list shows, was appearing for respondent 1 did not appear and defendant 4 was absent.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Criminal Revn. No. 49-B of 1917, decided on 27th April 1917, from order of Sub-Div. Mag. Yandoon, D/- 23rd January 1917.

(a) Evidence Act, (1872) S. 91—Applicability of—Contents of special diary under S. 172 Criminal P. C. (1898).

S. 91, Evidence Act, has no application to matters entered in a special diary under S. 172, Criminal P. C. [P-138 C 2]

(b) Evidence Act, (1872) S. 91—Statement to police—Proof of—Oral evidence—Admissibility of.

Oral evidence is admissible to prove statements made to the Police by witnesses who heard them made: 19 All. 390 commented on. [P 138 C 1]

Order.—The petitioner has been convicted of giving false evidence in a judicial proceeding. He appealed, through an Advocate, on the facts and his appeal was dismissed. He now applies in revision on the ground of inadmissibility of certain evidence. The facts are that a bundle of stolen clothing was found by a police Officer in petitioner's presence on the premises which he occupied, and he told the Police Officer that the bundle had been left there by one Abdulla Meah. At the trial of Abdulla Meah petitioner gave the evidence in respect of which he has been convicted. That evidence consists of two main parts—one is to this effect:

"I know nothing in this case. I do not know about Police seizing a bundle of clothes. No bundle of clothes was found either in my possession or in the building where I lived;" the other is:

"do not state before any Police Officer that accused Abdulla Meah entrusted to me a bundle of clothes."

There was evidence against the petitioner of persons who saw the clothes found in his presence on his premises and of persons who heard him make the alleged statement to the Police Officer. No question has been raised as to the admissibility of the evidence on the first point, and, therefore, the conviction was justified, and it is really unnecessary to decide as to the admissibility of the evidence on the second point which has been questioned. I have, however, considered the point raised and will decide it. It was this, that a Police Officer investigating an offence under Ch. 14, Civil P. C. is bound to incorporate in the diary prescribed by S. 172 (the special diary) the statements of the witnesses examined by him; consequently by S. 91, Evidence Act, no evidence of such witnesses, statements shall be given except the diary itself. This somewhat startling proposition is based upon some remarks of the Judges in Queen Empress v. Mannu (1), where four Judges held that all statements reduced to writing under S. 161, Criminal P. C., should be in the special diary and not elsewhere. Two other Judges, however, held to the contrary that such statements if entered in the diary are not an integral part of it and are not privileged, but an accused person or his agent is entitled to see them.

The point being especially dealt with in this case was the power of the Court to allow an accused person to see, or to have copies of witnesses' statements when such statements were recorded in the special diary. So far from the case being an authority that matters contained in the special diary can only be proved by production of the diary, the entire Full Bench held the exact opposite, namely, that entries in the special diary cannot by themselves be taken as evidence of any date, fact or statement therein contained. It appears to me clear that S. 91 has no application to matters embodied in a special diary for if it had, no proof at all could be given of such matter, inasmuch as S. 172 forbids a special diary being used as evidence except for certain limited purpose. This view has been expressed with respect to such lists in Solai Naick, In re (2), where it was held that even if the narrative of an extensive fact must by law be reduced to writing, it may still be proved by oral evidence. At the conclusion of their judgment the learned Judges remarked:

(1) (1897) 19 All. 390.

(2) (1917) 34 Mad 349 = 5 I O 178.

"We need hardly point out that if the provisions of S. 91 were to apply to the case of a search list prepared under S. 103, Criminal P. C. the results would be startling and there would be grave risks of miscarriage of justice in many trials in criminal cases."

The results would be still more startling and absurd if the Legislature should be interpreted as having enacted that most of the most vitally important matters relating to the investigation of criminal offences should, by being reduced to writing, be excluded altogether from proof at the trial. So far as this Province is concerned, the Executive Government have forbidden the incorporation in special diaries of witnesses' statements in extenso (see para. 613, Burma Police Manual). Even were that not so, the provision in S. 172, Criminal P. C. that the circumstances ascertained in the investigation should be noted in the special diary, could not, in my opinion, be held to require the statements of witnesses to be taken down as they are made in that diary, and if the Allahabad decision really affirmed the contrary, which I doubt, I most respectfully express my dissent from it. There is, in my view, no rule whatever excluding oral evidence being given of statements made to the Police by witnesses who heard them made. Accordingly the evidence as to that part of the present case was also admissible. The application is dismissed.

Judgment.—The following genealogical table will show the relationship between the parties:—

It will be seen that both Mra Do Aung and Mi Hla Ma, now dead, were eindaung-yis before they married each other. Mra Do Aung had by his former wife a son, Nyo Aung, who is said to be alive. Mi Hla Ma had by her former husband two daughters, Ma Tha Da Bon and Ma Than Dha Rhi, of whom the former died before the suit leaving three children of whom Aung Baw was one. He married Mi So Ma Shwe, the defendant. He too died before the suit leaving Mi So Ma Shwe his widow. Mra Do Aung and Mi Shwe Ma got three children of whom Gaung Ma and San Ma Kyi died before the suit, also Mi San Rhi Ma, but the latter left Mi Pein U, a daughter, who is the plaintiff. According to the defence Gaung Ma and San Ma Kyi left children of their own but we are not concerned with them in this suit. The land in suit was jointly acquired property of Mra Do Aung and Mi Hla Ma. The plaintiff Mi Pein U claimed to have three-fifths share in it as the surviving grand-daughter of Mra Do Aung and Mi Hla Ma sued to redeem that share for Rs. 42 from Mi So Ma, who was in possession. The ground of the suit appears from the following allegation:—Mra Do Aung and Mi Hla Ma mortgaged the whole land in suit for Rs. 70 to Shwe Eik Ke and Mi Ah Nyo, husband and wife respectively. After their deaths, Mi Than Da Bon and Mi Than Dha Rhi, daughters of Mi Hla Ma by her former husband, redeemed the property for the mortgage amount with the consent of the other heirs of Mra Do Aung and Mi Hla Ma. What the plaintiff meant by this last allegation was that those two sisters took over the mortgage from the original mortgagees and came to stand in their shoes and their interests in the property came to be those of the mortgagees under that mortgage. After this so-called redemption the two sisters entrusted the land into the possession of Aung Baw, a son of Mi Tha Da Bon. Aung Baw died possessed of it and his widow the defendant was now in possession. The plaintiff as the sole surviving grand-daughter of Mrs Daw Aung and Ma Hla Ma by their daughter, Mi San Rhi Ma, now sued Mi So Ma Shwe for redemption of what she claimed to be her share in the ancestral property, namely, three-fifths.

Mi So Ma Shwe, the defendant's case was that her husband, Aung Baw, and she bought the property from Shwe Eik Ke about thirty years before the suit and that the suit was barred by limitation. The first point to consider is whether there was a mortgage of the property by Mrs Do Aung and Mi Hla Ma to Shwe Eik Ke and his wife. I have no doubt in my mind that the evidence of Mi Than Dha Rhi and of Maung Hla Pyu, son of Shwe Eik Ke, who is himself 67 years old proves conclusively that Mrs Do Aung and his wife did mortgage it and that it is not true that they sold it. The next point is whether Mi Than Da Bon and Mi Dha Rhi took over the mortgage from Shwe Eik Ke and his wife. Here again Mi Than Dha Rhi's evidence makes it clear that she and her sister did do so. The third point for consideration is, how the land got into the possession of Aung Baw. Mi Than Dha Rhi says that she and her sister entrusted the land into the possession of Aung Baw. There is no reason why this old lady should not be believed. This evidence creates at least a prima facie case against the defence. There being no evidence to the contrary on the side of the defence, the prima facie case so proved must be accepted. I shall, therefore, accept it. In these views the suit cannot be barred by limitation, for when it is treated as a suit for redemption of the mortgage, it is well within time. When it is treated as a suit for redemption from the mortgagee's trustee, there is no question of limitation. The possession of the defendant does not count as it was of very recent origin.

The only other question left for consideration is whether the plaintiff can claim three-fifths in the property. The property is of one marriage, and the plaintiff belongs to that marriage. There are those who belonged to the other two marriages. The division has to be between the children of these three different marriages. Counsel for both sides have agreed, and it is correct, that the children of the marriage during which the property was acquired should get two out of four shares and the children of the other two marriages one each lot. The plaintiff as representing the offspring of the marriage during which the property in suit was acquired will be entitled to sue for redemption of half of the property. The decree passed by the District Court is varied to the effect that the plaintiff is allowed to redeem only half of the land in suit. There will be no order as to costs in this Court, as both parties have been successful partially. But the appellant will pay costs in the lower Courts.

May Ba—for Appellant.

A. B. Banerji—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The respondent was plaintiff in a case in the Township Court of Kyauktan fixed for hearing on 12th October 1915. He went to Kyauktan for the case, but as he heard that there was a criminal warrant out against him in Rangoon, he returned to Rangoon leaving a clerk behind to inform the Court of what had happened. The clerk went to the Court, but the Judge held that as he had no power-of-attorney from the plaintiff he could not legally put in an appearance for his master. The suit was, therefore, dismissed for default. There was no appearance on the part of the defendants either. On 12th November 1915, the plaintiff applied to have the order of dismissal set aside saying that he had to go back to Rangoon suddenly, owing to a criminal warrant being out against him there and that the clerk he had sent to the Court did not inform him of the dismissal order until "now". Apparently the Court did not notice that the application was out of time by one day and no objection was taken by the defendant on the ground of limitation. The Court set aside the dismissal order, finding that the plaintiff had sufficient excuse for not being present on the 12th October. The defendant invoked the revisional powers of this Court under S. 115, Civil P. C., on two grounds, namely, (1) that the Township Court should not have entertained the application of the plaintiff, as it was time-barred on the face of it, and (2) that that Court erred in holding that the plaintiff had sufficient excuse for not appearing on the date fixed. At the hearing ground (2) was given up by the learned counsel for the defendant. He, however, very strongly pressed ground 1. He contended that the provisions of S. 3, Lim. Act, are mandatory and in view of the stringent requirements of the section, which casts upon the Judge the duty of applying the rules of limitation even when they are not pleaded, the Township Court failed to exercise a jurisdiction vested in it by law.

The learned Advocate for the plaintiff urged that S. 115 of the Code gives discretionary power to the High Court to interfere or not and that the Court is not bound to act in every case. When the plea, he contended, is one of limitation raised for the first time in revision, the Court should not interfere. He read out passages in the notes to S. 115 of the Code by Woodroffe in support of his argument, and I may now deal with the cases upon which, I gather he laid especial stress. In passing, I may say that in this case there is no question of the Township Court having exercised its discretion under S. 5, Lim. Act, for there was no application under that section before him:

Vasudeva v. Chinnasami (1). In this case the District Court admitted an appeal presented out of time on certain grounds. It was held that the High Court could not interfere on revision, Turner, C. J., saying, "We cannot interfere on revision with an exercise of discretion".

Sunder Singh v. Dora Shankar (2). The head-note which correctly represents the ruling is that the fact that a Court, having power to decide whether or not a certain matter was barred by limitation, wrongly decided that it was not barred and proceeded to deal with it affords no ground for revision under S. 622 (now S. 115) Civil P. C. The third case is Ramgopal Jhoonjhojwallah v. Joharmall Khemka (3). There it was held that an error by the Small Cause Court on a question of limitation does not justify the interference of the High Court under S. 115 of the Code. The 1th and last case which may be noticed is Avunda Lall Addy v. Deendra Lall Addy (4), where it was held that a wrong decision on a question of limitation is not open to revision by the High Court. These cases are distinguishable from the case before me, inasmuch as it is one in which there has been no decision on the question of limitation at all. It is a case in which the learned Judge of the Township Court has failed to discharge his duty in that he did not look into the question, whether the application was within time or not. Mr. Mya Bu for the defendant cited Har Prasad v. Jafar Ali (5), where it was held that a Court, which admits an application to set aside a decree ex parte after the true period of limitation, acts in the exercise of its jurisdiction illegally and with material irregularity within the meaning of S. 622 of the Code of 1882 and such action may, therefore, be made the subject of revision by the High Court. Mahmood, J.'s observations in that case are especially instructive.

"The term 'jurisdiction', as used by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Amir Hassan Khan v. Shoo Bahadur Singh (6)", he said,

"in its broad legal sense may be taken to mean the power of administering justice according to the means which the law has provided, and subject to the limitations imposed by that law upon the judicial authority."

In Kailash Chandra Halder v. Bissonath Paramanic (7) it was held that where the lower Courts have entertained an application which is on the face of it barred by limitation without adverting to the question of limitation, the High Court can interfere in revision. Pathe-ram, C. J., observed:

"The period of limitation which is fixed for making this application is 90 days, so that the time had long expired on the 18th September, and the only way in which the matter could then be brought within the period of limitation was by the operation of S. 18, Lim. Act. S. 18, Lim. Act, has not been dealt with by the District Judge in his judgment, and unless he could come to the conclusion that he could deal with it in that way and as it appeared on the face of this record that the matter was barred, unless it could be brought within that section, it appears to us that he had no jurisdiction to deal with the matter and, therefore, we have jurisdiction to interfere under S. 622, Civil P. C."

The two last cases cited above clearly show that where the lower Court has not applied its mind, as in this case, to the question of limitation, the High Court has the right to interfere in revision. On the question whether the provisions of S. 3, Lim. Act, are mandatory, the last word has been said by the Special Bench of seven Judges of the Calcutta High Court in Balaram v. Mangta Dass (8), where six of the Judges held that the provisions of a similar section of the old Limitation Act are mandatory, where the bar appears to be on the face of the plaint and there are no questions of fact involved. There is one more argument of Mr. Banurji, which I might deal with. That is that assuming that the lower Court acted improperly and with material irregularity in admitting the application which was on the face of it out of time, the High Court should not interfere, as the defendant did not raise the plea of limitation, for the effect of the interference by this Court would be to prevent the plaintiff from bringing his suit owing to its being now time-barred and thus cause an injustice to him.

This contention was based upon Dayaram Jagjivan v. Govardandas Dayaram (9) and it is a sound one as a proposition of law. But the difficulty is that the facts do not fit in with it. The suit was upon a pro-note dated 1st September 1914 and it would not be barred by limitation until 1st September 1917, so that the plaintiff has quite a long time left in which he may bring a fresh suit. I hold that the present application should be allowed on the ground that the original application to set aside the dismissal order was out of time and it is accordingly allowed with costs.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for the cancellation of a deed of sale. The plaintiffs allege that in 1277 B. E. they were unable to pay a debt amounting with interest to Rs. 150 and that they, therefore, executed a deed of sale of land in suit. They further allege that it was agreed between them and the defendant that if they paid the defendant the sum of Rs. 180 at any time within three years from the date of the deed of sale, the defendant was to return the land by causing a mutation of names to be made in the Revenue Registers. As regards the embodying of this agreement in the deed of sale, they say that they asked defendant to do so several times but the defendant said that it would not matter and that trusting the defendant they signed the deed of sale. Rs. 180 but the defendant refused to re-transfer the land. They then got a copy of the deed from the Registration Office and found that there was nothing about the arrangement in it. These are the allegations of the plaintiffs. It will be seen that they do not allege that they were asked to sign on the false representation that the deed contained provisions regarding the arrangement for the return of the land within three years on the repayment of Rs. 180. The last allegation that on a copy being obtained the document was found to contain nothing about it, seems to pre-suppose that the plaintiffs thought that it contained a clause regarding it but that is not borne out by the evidence he tenders. I think I am justified in saying that the plaintiffs' case is not that there was fraud in that the defendant fraudulently induced them to sign the deed in the belief that it contained a clause for a re-purchase within three years.

I will quote the trial Judge's summary of the evidence on their side, as, in my opinion, it is a correct summary:

"The plaintiffs called five witnesses. The evidence of petition-writers Maung Po On and Maung Po Thaw tends to show that the parties came and requested them to write a bond for the sale of a piece of land for Rs. 180 by the plaintiffs, Maung Chet and his wife, to the defendant Maung Shwe Hla and the bond was read out when it was written, then the plaintiffs requested them to add one condition in the bond to redeem the land within three years on payment of Rs. 180 and they informed the plaintiffs that the bond would become invalid, if the required condition be (sic) added in it. The witnesses further state that they heard the defendant Maung Shwe Hla promising the plaintiffs to redeem the land on payment of Rs. 180 within three years, when they asked the plaintiffs to execute another bond but the parties did not turn up after they had left. This was supported by the evidence of Mg. Kua Gyi, Ng. Mya and Mg. Hman."

It is unnecessary to comment upon the conduct of the petition-writers in telling the plaintiffs that the insertion of the condition would invalidate the deed of sale. That is neither here nor there. The defendant has nothing to do with that conduct. The fact remains that the plaintiffs signed the deed of sale knowing it to be a deed of absolute sale, nothing more or less, and that they were told to have another document embodying the condition but they did not do so. It is evident that they relied on the verbal promise made by the defendant to allow them to re-take the land on payment of Rs. 180. If there was this promise and the defendant broke it afterwards, there would be fraud in the popular sense, but not necessarily as understood in law, unless it is proved that the defendant from the outset never intended to perform the promise, a state of circumstances, given in S. 17, Contract Act, as constituting fraud. There is, however, nothing to show that the defendant did not intend to perform the promise from the outset. Therefore it must be taken upon the evidence as summarised above that the plaintiffs signed the deed of sale knowing it to be what it was and that as stated in their plaint they trusted the defendant. Plaintiff Po Chet's evidence that he signed the deed, thinking it contained the condition he now sets up, cannot be believed for it appears to me that it is the result of desire to get over the ruling in Maung Bin v. Ma Hlaing (1). Apart from the question of fraud, it is clear from that ruling that the oral agreement to allow repurchase cannot be proved by parol evidence. If there was fraud practised upon the plaintiffs by the defendant at the time of the execution of the deed parol evidence would be admissible under prov. 1 to S. 92, Evidence Act. In the case quoted above, Fox, J., observed:

"The fraud relied on was fraud subsequent to the execution of the deed of sale. Notwithstanding the remarks of Melville, J., in Paksh Lal v. Lakshman v. Lakshman (2), the wording of S. 92, Evidence Act, appears to me to make it quite clear that it is only fraud in connexion with the entering into and execution of the document which is contested that can be proved by oral evidence."

The fraud, if any in this case, is fraud subsequent to the execution of the deed and cannot, therefore, be proved by parol evidence. After a very careful consideration of the case it will be seen that I have been unable to agree with the following observations of the learned District Judge:

"It is nothing but fraud on the part of the defendant if he comes now and seeks to evade his obligation by taking advantage of either the plaintiffs' carelessness or his own cunning in not having reduced that obligation to writing."

The first part is incorrect law and the second is not justified by the evidence. I have held that the failure to fulfil the promise is no fraud unless from the outset the promisor intended not to fulfil it and that there is no evidence of the latter circumstance. For the above reasons I hold that the plaintiffs' suit must fail. The appeal is allowed. The decree of the District Court is set aside and that of the Township Court restored. The respondents will pay costs throughout.

Judgment.—The plaintiffs-appellants sued the defendants-respondents for damages for wrongfully refusing paddy tendered by the plaintiffs under a contract. The paddy was rejected on the ground that it was not up to the quality contracted for. The paddy was Bengal hill paddy which was shipped from Calcutta and the contract was for August shipment. The learned Judge on the original side found that the statement in the Bill of Lading that the goods were shipped on the 30th August was not evidence in this case, and that it was impossible to give the plaintiffs a decree because they had prevented the defendants from placing their side of the case before the Court, i. e., of taking samples or having a survey.

The paddy was sent to defendants' mill in 11 cargo boats, one of which was three days at the defendants' mill and the remaining 10 were from 7 to 15 days there. The plaintiffs have given evidence that the paddy came under a Bill of Lading dated 30th August and arrived in Rangoon on 5th September. The date on the Bill of Lading is very strong prima facie evidence of the date of shipment: see Bowes v. Shand (1). If the defendants had any reason for thinking that the date of shipment was not correct, the onus lay on them to rebut it by taking evidence in Calcutta. S. 38, Contract Act, only requires the seller to give the buyer a reasonable opportunity of examining the goods and this defendants clearly had. They took sample from each boatload as it arrived and informed the plaintiffs that it was not up to quality: see Ruttonsey Morarji v. Jamnadas Pitamberdas (2). The merits of the case must, therefore, be gone into by this Court.

UPPER BURMA J. C'S. COURT

A. I. R. 1918 Upper Burma 1 (1)

RIGG, J. C.

Nga Tun Sein—Applicant.

v.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Criminal Revn. No. 194 of 1917. Decided on 6th July 1917.

Whipping Act (1909), S. 3—Whipping must be given in lieu and not in addition to imprisonment.

Under S. 3, Whipping Act, a sentence of whipping may be passed in lieu of any punishment to which the offender may be liable under the Penal Code, but it cannot be passed in addition to such imprisonment, and the intention of the law is infringed by ordering a man to be whipped after he has already served part of a sentence of imprisonment. [P. 1 C. 2]

Order.—Tun Sein, a youth of 19 years of age, was convicted under S. 380, I. P. C., of the theft of property worth Rs. 12.3.0 and sentenced to five months' rigorous imprisonment by the Township Magistrate, Sathwa. The sentence was far too severe, and in view of the youthfulness of the offender was unsuitable.

The Magistrate failed to consider whether S. 562, Criminal P. C., ought to be applied to the case, or whether a sentence of whipping would not be more appropriate than one of imprisonment. The attention of Magistrates has frequently been drawn to the undesirability of sentencing young men to imprisonment where it can possibly be avoided. On revision before the District Magistrate the conviction was upheld but the sentence of imprisonment was altered to one of 30 stripes. At the time the order on revision was passed, the accused had already served a month and a half in the jail, and that term would have been more than sufficient punishment for the offence he had committed. The order of the District Magistrate, in altering the sentence from one of imprisonment to one of whipping is an illegal order. Under S. 3, Whipping Act, a sentence of whipping may be passed in lieu of any punishment to which the offender may be liable under the Penal Code, but it cannot be passed in addition to such punishment. The effect of the District Magistrate's order was to sentence the accused both to a term of imprisonment and to whipping. It has recently been pointed out in Emperor v. Po Wan (1) that the intention of the law is clearly infringed by ordering a man to be whipped after he has already served part of a sentence of imprisonment.

Contract Act (1872), Ss. 134 and 137—Suit against principal debtor and surety—Service of summons not effected on principal debtor—Plaintiff applying for his dismissal from suit—Principal held to be discharged—Plaintiff held to have no further right of suit against surety—Civil P. C. (1908), O. 9, R. 5.

Plaintiff sued a principal debtor and the surety for the price of goods sold. Service of summons could not be effected upon the principal debtor and the plaintiff applied that he should be dismissed from the suit. The suit proceeded against the surety alone and the plaintiff obtained a decree:

Held: that the legal consequence of the act of the plaintiff was to discharge the principal debtor within the meaning of S. 134, so that he had no further right of suit against the surety.

L. K. Mitter—for Applicants.

C. G. S. Pillay—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—The plaintiffs sued to recover the price of goods sold. Defendant 2 was the principal debtor and defendant 1 was the surety. The plaintiffs were unable to serve defendant 2, they applied that he should be dismissed from the suit and proceeded against the surety. They obtained a decree in the Court of the first instance which was reversed in appeal on the ground that the principal debtor having been discharged by the creditor, the creditor could not recover from the surety. Against this the plaintiffs now come to this Court in revision on the ground that the ruling relied upon by the lower appellate Court was not sound law. The lower appellate Court referred to Maung Pho Tha v. Ko Min Pyn (1). It is urged that the defendant did not abandon his claim or waive his claim against the principal debtor but that it should be taken that he was unable to ascertain the principal debtor's residence and that the order of the Court was passed under O. 9, R. 5, Civil P. C., and various Indian rulings of which Nathabhai Tricamlal v. Ranchodlal Ramji (2) is the latest, are relied upon. In that suit it was held that there was some difficulty in serving defendant 1 whose name was struck out; as a year had not elapsed, presumably this was done if not at the request, at least with the consent, of the plaintiff, and that the striking off of defendant 1's name was a procedure under O. 9, R. 5, rather than under O. 23, R. 1. It was said that "all the authorities in all the Courts of India who have had this question under consideration, . . . are in agreement that the mere omission of the plaintiff to pursue his suit against one of the defendants with the result that that defendant's name is struck off and the suit dismissed against him under O. 9, R. 5, does not discharge the surety, provided the suit be still in time against the principal."

The terms of O. 9, R. 5, Civil P. C. are as follows:

"Where, after a summons has been issued to the defendant, or to one of several defendants, and returned unserved, the plaintiff fails for a period of one year from the date of the return made to the Court by the officer ordinarily certifying to the Court returns made by the serving officers, to apply for the issue of a fresh summons and to satisfy the Court that he has used his best endeavours to discover the residence of the defendant who has not been served, or that such defendant is avoiding service of process, the Court may make an order that the suit be dismissed as against such defendant."

And Cl. 2 lays down that in such a case the plaintiff may, subject to the law of limitation, bring a fresh suit. I am at a loss to understand how a Court can be said to be adopting a procedure under this section which expressly enables it to take certain action after the period of one year when it takes that action before the expiry of the year. But assuming the view taken in the Bombay case to be correct, it would appear that there the Court struck defendant 1's name off without any application in that behalf by the plaintiff. In the Lower Burma case relied upon by the lower appellate Court, it was pointed out that in the Indian cases there referred to, the plaintiff did not, by his own act, relinquish his claim, whereas in that case he expressly waived his claim against the principal, and the same distinction was drawn in the case of Williams, F. G. v. King, T. (3), where the plaintiff's advocate told the Judge that his principal debtor had absconded, he would waive claim against the principal and would obtain decrees against the sureties. I think that that distinction is sound. In the present case, the diary shows that the plaintiff informed the Court distinctly that he waived his claim against the principal debtor. . . . This entry in the diary was made on 26th February 1916, the suit having been filed on 8th January 1916. I am of opinion that this amounted to much more than mere forbearance within the meaning of S. 137, Contract Act. It was an act or omission the legal consequence of which was to discharge the principal debtor within the meaning of S. 234, for it was a distinct waiver of the plaintiff's claim against the principal debtor and the plaintiff had no further right of suit against the principal debtor. There are no grounds for interference on the facts and this application must be dismissed with costs.

(a) Limitation Act (1908), Arts. 165 and 181—Application by judgment-debtor to recover property delivered to decree-holder in excess of decree is governed by Art. 181 and not by Art. 165.

An application by judgment-debtor to recover possession of immovable property of which he has been dispossessed by the decree-holder in excess of the decree falls under Art. 181 and not Art. 165, L. M. Act. [P & C 2]

(b) Interpretation of Statutes—Language—Language of statute not covering case in express terms—Position of parties and context in which language is used should be considered.

In a technical matter where the language of the Statute relied upon does not in express terms cover the case, it is of the highest importance to realize the position of the parties and the context in which the language is used. Where the interpretation sought to be put upon the words is arrived at by implication and by reference, the Court ought not to adopt a construction which has a restricting and penalizing operation unless it is driven to do so by the irresistible force of language. [P & C 2]

L. K. Mitter—for Appellants.

Judgment.—The respondents, having obtained a decree for redemption of a usufructuary mortgage, paid the money into Court and the mortgaged land was made over to them on 5th January 1916 by the bailiff of the Sub-Divisional Court. On 20th May 1916 the judgment-debtors filed an application in the Sub-Divisional Court, alleging that the land made over by the bailiff was very much in excess of the land affected by the decree. The Judge dismissed the application on the ground that Art. 165, Sch. 1, L. M. Act, applied and that, more than 30 days having elapsed since the judgment-debtors had been dispossessed, the application must fail. The lower appellate Court confirmed this decision and the judgment-debtors now come to this Court in second appeal. There is no doubt that the cases relied upon by the lower appellate Court were authority for the view taken by it. In both Har Din Singh v. Lachman Singh (1) and Ratnam Ayyar v. Krishna Doss Vithal Doss (2) it was held that an application by a judgment-debtor, who had been dispossessed of immovable property and disputed the right of the decree-holder to be put into possession, was included in the terms of Art. 165 as well as an application by a third person dispossessed. This view appears to have been generally entertained until February 1916, when it was expressly dissented from in the case of Abdul Karim v. Islamunissa Bibi (3). It appears to me that the reasoning on which this latter decision is based is sound. The Judges said that in a technical matter of this kind where the language relied upon does not in express terms cover the case, it is of the highest importance to realize the position of the parties and the context in which the language is used.

Where the interpretation sought to be put upon the words is arrived at by implication and by reference, the Court ought not to adopt a construction which has a restricting and penalizing operation unless it is driven to do so by the irresistible force of language. It was pointed out that, in the case of a person who was not a party to the suit the decree in which was being executed, an alternative remedy was open, since such person could apply either under O. 21, Rr. 100 and 101, or could bring a suit within 12 years. If he adopted the former alternative this was a privilege accompanied by restrictions, e. g., the application must be made within 30 days. The judgment-debtor, however, is expressly precluded from making an application under the provisions of Rr. 100 and 101, O. 21; nor can he file a separate suit since by the provisions of S. 47, Civil P. C., all matters in question between him and the decree-holder must be decided in execution and not by a separate suit. The effect of the earlier decisions would be that where a decree-holder succeeded in getting possession of a substantial area of immovable property under colour of the decree, the judgment-debtor would be deprived for ever of all title to such property if he did not make a summary application within 30 days. I agree with the learned Judges who decided this case that such a result was certainly never enacted in direct terms and that it is safe to assume that the legislature never intended it. I am of opinion that this application was governed by Art. 181 and not by Art. 165, Sch. 1, L. M. Act, and in this view the decrees of the Courts

Criminal Revn. No. 758 of 1917, Decided on 13th October 1917.

Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 145 and 435 (3)—To deprive High Court of power of interference in revision proceedings must be proceedings under Ch. 12, in fact.

Orders passed under Ch. 12, Criminal P. C., are not subject to revision, being expressly excluded from the operation of S. 435 of the Code by Cl. (2) of that section. But in order to make the provisions of S. 435, Cl. (3) applicable, that is to say, to deprive the High Court of the power of interference in revision, the proceedings must be proceedings under Ch. 12 of that Code in fact, and not only in name. [P 4 C 1]

Razak—for Applicants.Mitter—for Opponents.

Judgment.—This is an application to deal in revision with an order of the Headquarter Magistrate, Yamethin, passed or purporting to be passed, under the provisions of Ch. 12, Criminal P. C. The application is resisted on the ground that orders passed under Ch. 12, are not subject to revision being expressly excluded from the operation of S. 435 of the Code by Cl. 3 of that section. There is no doubt that this is the case and any conflict of opinion which may exist in India appears rather to be due to questions affecting the construction of the charters of Chartered High Courts than the meaning of S. 435, Criminal P. C. But there can be no doubt that in order to make the provisions of S. 435, Cl. (3), applicable, that is to say, to deprive the High Court of the power of interference in revision, the proceedings must be proceedings under Ch. 12 of that Code in fact, and not only in name. For instance in Maharaj Tewari v. Har Charan Rai (1) it was pointed out that the mere adding as a postscript to proceedings which were throughout taken under Ch. 8, Criminal P. C. that a final order has been passed under S. 145, will not make that order a proceeding under Ch. 12 of the

1. (1904) 25 All 144.

Code. The only point for decision here is whether the proceeding was under Ch. 12, Criminal P. C. It is alleged that there is no finding that there was likely to be a breach of the peace. It is true that there was no such finding in the final order, but in an order in the diary under 19th June 1917, the Magistrate recorded an order that from the papers filed it appeared that a dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace, existed. The procedure followed appears to have been in accordance with that laid down in S. 145, Criminal P. C.

The final order is attacked on the ground that the Magistrate went into questions of title and decided accordingly. But it is clear that the Magistrate did endeavour to ascertain and decide which of the parties was in possession and although he would seem to have decided erroneously in coming to a conclusion by questions of title, there is in fact a distinct finding that Aung Baw and Min Din were in possession of the land at the time of the order. I have no hesitation in holding that the proceedings were under Ch. 12, Criminal P. C., and this Court is not entitled to interfere in revision. The application must, therefore, be dismissed.

Limitation Act (1908), S. 15—Partial stay of execution amounts to stay of execution within meaning of S. 15.

A partial stay of execution e. g., a stay of execution in respect of a particular property against which execution is sought, amounts to a stay of execution within the meaning of S. 15, so that in computing the period of limitation prescribed for an application for execution of a decree, the time during which the execution of the decree has been partially stayed should be excluded.

Judgment.—On 13th May 1909 petitioner applied for execution of a decree which he held against respondent. Execution of that decree, in respect of one of the lands against which execution was claimed, was stayed by order of the Court from 24th June 1909 to 31st August 1910. On 14th May 1913 petitioner applied for execution by the arrest of respondent. Respondent was served with notice but failed to appear and petitioner took no further action at that time. On 9th March 1915 petitioner applied for transfer of the decree to another Court for execution, and the decree was transferred but execution was not effected. On 5th January 1916 petitioner again applied for transfer of the decree and respondent set up the defence that execution was time barred because more than three years had elapsed between the applications of 13th May 1909 and 14th May 1913. The District Court missed the point of this defence, and found that the application of 5th January 1916 was within time because the application of 14th May 1913 was a step-in-aid of execution. Respondent appealed to this Court, which held that the application of 14th May 1913 was time barred because it was made more than three years after the application of 13th May 1909. I am now asked to review that decision on the ground that the period between 24th June 1909 and 31st August 1910, during which execution was stayed by order of the Court, ought, under S. 15, Lim. Act, to have been excluded in computing the period of three years from 13th May 1909 allowed by Art. 182 for the application of 14th May 1913. I have heard counsel on both sides and I am of opinion that this contention is correct. Respondent's learned advocate suggests that a partial stay of execution, such as occurred in this case, cannot be regarded as a "stay of execution" within the meaning of S. 15 of the Act, but he has cited no authority to this effect.

In the case of Rungiah Gounden & Co. v. Nanjappa Row (1), decided before the amendment of S. 15, Lim. Act, the learned Judges of the Madras High Court said:

"It is only reasonable and proper that in computing the period of limitation prescribed for an application for execution of a decree, the time during which the . . . execution of the decree or a portion of it has been stayed . . . should be excluded."

and that view seems to have been adopted by the legislature in the amendment of S. 15 of the Act. The case of Lal Gobind Nath v. Bhikar Sahu (2) has been cited as an authority for the proposition that

"a stay of execution against one judgment debtor gave the decree-holder the benefit of S. 15 as against the other judgment-debtors also," but an examination of the judgment shows that it is not so, and I have been unable to find any case in which the question whether or not a partial stay of execution is sufficient to give rise to the operation of S. 15, Lim. Act, has been decided. S. 15 says that "in computing the period of limitation prescribed for any application for the execution of a decree the execution of which has been stayed by injunction or order . . . the time of the continuance of the injunction or order shall be excluded," and the question which I have to decide is whether in this particular case execution was "stayed" within the meaning of that section. The section itself does not say that execution must have been wholly stayed, and I do not think that I should be justified in reading into the section more than it actually says.

There can be no doubt that in the present case execution was stayed, although it was stayed only in respect of one particular plot of land and not in respect of any other form of execution which might be open to the decree-holder, and as I can find no authority or reason for holding that the section ought to be construed so as to exclude such a case from the benefit of its provisions, I hold that in the present case the period of such stay, namely, the period between 24th June 1909 and 31st August 1910, ought to have been excluded in computing the period of limitation allowed by Art. 182 for the application of 14th May 1913. If that period be excluded, that application was filed well within three years after the application of 13th May 1909 and was within time, and if the application of 14th May 1913 was in time so also were those of 9th March 1915 and 5th January 1916. It follows that the decision of this Court in Civil Appeal No. 7 of 1917 was wrong. That decision is, therefore, set aside and the respondent's appeal is dismissed with costs. Respondent will pay petitioner's costs in respect of the present proceedings, advocate's fee to be one gold mohur.

Maung Pwe and others—Appellants.

U Inguya and another—Respondents.

Second Appeal No. 370 of 1916, Decided on 22nd April 1918.

Buddhist Law (Burmese)—Succession—Pongyi cannot inherit from lay relatives, after ordination.

A pongyi or rahan divests himself of all worldly possession at the time of his ordination and thereafter is incapable of inheriting property from his lay relatives. [P 6 C 1]

Pershad for C. G. S. Pillay—for Appellants.Tha Gyew—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The plaintiffs, U Inguya and U Nyannawun, are Burmese Buddhist priests. They sue their cousin Maung Pwe for partition and possession of their two-thirds share of the undivided estate of the common grandfather Tha Byo. Tha Byo had three children one son Maung Gyi and two daughters Ma Cheik and Ma Nge. U Inguya is a son of Ma Cheik, U Nyannawun of Ma Nge, and Maung Pwe of Maung Gyi. The plaintiffs' case is that the lands in suit, which belonged to Tha Byo, remained undivided in the hands of his descendants and are now in the possession of Maung Pwe, and that they, as representing Tha Byo's two daughters, are entitled to recover two-thirds of the estate from Maung Pwe who represents the son. Plaintiff 2 U Nyannawun also alleged that Maung Pwe had been paying him one-third of the produce of the land annually as his share of the income, and because Maung Pwe had refused to pay in the year 1275, he claimed to recover twenty baskets of paddy from Maung Pwe as arrears. Maung Pwe replied that Burmese Buddhist priests cannot inherit from their lay relations, that he had been in adverse possession of the lands for over twenty years, that the plaintiffs relinquished their rights in his favour some sixteen years ago and that even, if the plaintiffs could inherit, they would not be entitled to the shares which they claimed.

The trial Court framed issues as to (1) whether the plaintiffs, being pongyis, could inherit from their lay relatives, (2) whether their claim was barred by limitation, (3) whether they had relinquished their rights in favour of Maung Pwe, (4) what share they would be entitled to, supposing that they could inherit, and

(5) whether plaintiff 2 was entitled to recover arrears of his share of the produce. After recording evidence, the Court found on the authority of the ruling of this Court in Ma Pwe v. Maung Myat Tha (1) that the plaintiffs being pongyis could not inherit from their lay relatives and on this finding dismissed their suit. The plaintiffs appealed to the District Court which, holding on the authority of Mi Taik v. U Wiseinda (2) that it was settled law that pongyis could inherit, set aside the judgment and decree of the trial Court and directed that the suit should be re-admitted and decided on the merits. The trial Court then found that in view of the fact that the last of Tha Byo's children died some thirty years ago and Maung Pwe had been in undisputed possession ever since, the plaintiffs' claim was barred by limitation.

The plaintiffs again appealed, and the District Court held that the claim was not barred by limitation and again remanded the case for trial on the merits.

The trial Court then found that Maung Pwe failed to prove that the plaintiffs had relinquished their rights in his favour, and holding on the evidence that the plaintiffs succeeded in proving that they were each entitled to one-third of the estate and that plaintiff 2 was entitled to recover from Maung Pwe one-third of the produce of the lands from 1275 B. E. onwards, gave judgment for plaintiffs with costs. Maung Pwe appealed but his appeal was dismissed with costs. He now comes to this Court in second appeal under the provisions of S. 100, Civil P. C., and he still alleges that under Burmese Buddhist Law a priest cannot inherit from his lay relatives. The rulings of this Court on this point have undoubtedly been conflicting. In Ma Pwe's case (1), cited above, the learned Judicial Commissioner, Mr. Burgess, held that a Burman on entering the monastic order retained no interest in the property which he possessed before his ordination. In Mi Taik v. U. Wiseinda (2) another Judicial Commissioner, Sir George Shaw, expressed the opinion that there was nothing in Burmese Buddhist Law to prevent a monk from acquiring by inheritance property which he proceeds to devote to religious purposes. In U Tilawka v.

1. (1891-01) U B R 2 p. 51.

2. 2 Chan Toon's Leading Cases 235.

Nga Shwe Kan (3) my learned predecessor Mr. McColl said:

"I think it is clear that a monk is debarred by the rules of his order from mortgaging property descended from his ancestors, and indeed from owning such property."

All doubt in the matter seems now to have been set at rest by the decision of the Chief Court of Lower Burma in the case of Shwe Ton v. Tun Lin (4). In that case the question before the Full Bench for decision was whether the next-of-kin of a pongyi are entitled on his death to inherit from him lands, which he received after his ordination (a) as inheritance, or (b) as a gift. In order to decide the first part of this question the learned Judges found it necessary to decide whether a pongyi can inherit lands from his lay relatives after his ordination, which is the very question which arises in the present case. On this point the judgment of the Chief Court is as follows:

"We are not prepared to hold that a pongyi can inherit from his lay relatives. When a pongyi or rahan is ordained, his severance from his family is so complete that, if he was a married man before, he is regarded as having divorced his wife. He is certainly cut off as completely from his original family as if he had been adopted into another family. We consider it inconsistent with a pongyi's personal status that he should inherit from his natural family with whom all ties of relationships have been annulled."

This ruling supports the opinion of my learned predecessor and I have no hesitation in following it. Plaintiff 1 in the present case was admittedly ordained before his mother died, so there can be no doubt that he could not inherit from her and it is as her heir that he claims a share in the land in suit. His claim must clearly fail. Plaintiff 2 says that his parents both died when he was a child. If this is true he had already acquired the status of heir before he was ordained, and the question arises whether or not, after his ordination, he can still claim to be heir to his parents. There can be no doubt that Burmese Buddhist priests divest themselves of all worldly possessions at the time of ordination. That being so, plaintiff 2 must have divested himself of his rights as heir to his parents and grand parents when he entered the priesthood, and he cannot now claim to be heir to Tha Byo. His claim to a share of Tha Byo's estate must, therefore, fail. But if he had no right to the land, he clearly had no right to any share of the produce, and the contribution of twenty baskets of paddy which he alleges Maung Pwe paid to him as his share of the produce must be regarded as a charitable gift, which is what Maung Pwe says it was. As a matter of fact it was not Maung Pwe who gave the paddy, but Maung Pwe's tenants, and the evidence goes to show that they gave it not by direction of Maung Pwe but as a result of the influence of the pongyi. However that may be, it seems clear that plaintiff 2 had no right to demand the payment and his claim under this head also must be dismissed. I find, therefore, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to claim any share of the estate in suit or of the income thereof and I set aside the judgments and decrees of the lower Courts and dismiss the plaintiffs' suit with all costs.

Criminal Revn. No. 687 of 1917, Decided on 25th September 1917.

Burma Municipal Act (1898), Sec. 2 (c) and 142 (d)—Lodging house need not be let in lodgings—House occupied to any extent in common by members of more than one family is still lodging house.

A lodging house need not be let in lodgings: it is still a lodging house if it is occupied to any extent in common by members of more than one family. The persons living in the lodging house are lodgers, whether they pay rent or not and the owner of the lodging house receives them when he allows them to occupy the building. [P 8 C 1]

H. M. Latter—for the Crown.

Judgment.—The applicant has been convicted and fined Rs. 30 under S. 142, (d), Burma Municipal Act for failing to take out a license for a lodging house kept by him. The application states that the learned Magistrate has erred in law in holding that the petitioner was bound to take out a license under the Lodging-house Bye-laws, although it was not proved that he received any lodgers in his house or rented any portion of his house to others. Apparently it is the contention of the learned advocate for the applicant that a lodger is a person who occupies rooms in a lodging-house upon payment of rent, and that it has not been shown that any rent was paid in respect of the premises here referred to. It is also urged that the premises do not constitute a lodging house, and that whatever the meaning of the term "lodging-house" might be, the bye-laws framed by the Mandalay Municipality already showed that the Municipality did not contemplate treating a building of the kind here in question as a lodging-house or requiring its owner to take out a license for it. It appears that the applicant is the owner of certain hackney carriages and that the premises are occupied by the drivers of these hackney carriages and the syces attending to the ponies which draw them. The Magistrate states that the applicant admitted that he kept 12 drivers, 6 syces and 2 watermen in the premises. He called witnesses who deposed that they drove the carriages on hire, that charges for food only were deducted from their wages, and that they did not pay any rent for the house.

"Lodging-house" is defined in S. 2 (6), Municipal Act, as a building or part of a building which is let in lodgings or occupied to any extent in common by members of more than one family. It is clear, therefore, that lodging-house need not be let in lodgings; it is still a lodging-house if it is occupied to any extent in common by members of more than one family. By a footnote it is explained that if there are kitchens, privies or other conveniences in common, the building will be a lodging-house, and I have no doubt that this is the case whether or no rent is paid either as rent or otherwise. It seems probable here that the fact that the applicant provides his employees with house room is taken into consideration in fixing their wages, and if this is so, no doubt their wages are less than they would be if they had to find lodgings for themselves, and in that case they certainly pay rent indirectly for the lodgings. But the definition does not make the question whether a building is a lodging-house or not depend upon the letting for rent; it is sufficient that the building is occupied in common by more than one family. I cannot see that the Lodging-house By-laws contemplate any condition of affairs inconsistent with or narrower than the terms of S. 2 (6), of the Act. The persons living in the lodging-house are lodgers whether they pay rent or not, and the owner of the lodging-house receives them when he allows them to occupy the building. No doubt the definition is extremely wide, and the servant's quarters of a private house having a common latrine or kitchen would come within it. But this Court has to interpret the law as it is laid down, and it seems to me that there is no doubt as to the meaning of the words of S. 2 (6), Municipal Act. The application must be dismissed.

Judgment.—This is an application to revise an order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Madaya, passed, or purporting to be passed, under S. 145, Criminal P. C. It is objected that an order passed under the provisions of that section and proceedings under Ch. 12, Criminal P. C. are not subject to revision in view of the terms of S. 435, Cl. 3, of the Code. This is no doubt the case, but that section does not deprive the High Court of jurisdiction, unless the proceedings are in fact, and not merely in name, proceedings under Ch. 12, Criminal P. C. There is a very general consensus of opinion of the High Courts in India on this point, see, for instance, Jhingai Singh v. Ram Pratap (1) and In re Pandurang Govind Pujari (2). Here there was an application by a person alleging possession of certain lands, that his possession was being interfered with by certain persons and that there was likely to be a breach of the peace. The Magistrate upon this in the diary recorded an order:

"I think I should take action under S. 145, Criminal P. C. Issue notices to respondents to put in written statements."

A written statement was put in and the Magistrate, then without further enquiry, held that one of the respondents and one other person having been prosecuted and acquitted under S. 447, I. P. C., under S. 403, Criminal P. C., he and the other respondents were not liable to be tried again in respect of the same subject-matter, and he dismissed the application. The order was clearly wrong. Proceedings under S. 145 do not constitute a trial and are not in the nature of a trial. They are in the nature of Police proceedings in order to prevent the commission of offences, and the fact that there have been criminal charges brought by one or other of the parties against each other, so far from being a bar to action under Ch. 12, constitutes evidence which may possibly prove the danger of disputes which it is desired to prevent. The order of the Magistrate is set aside and he is directed to proceed according to law, that is to say, to follow the procedure laid down in S. 145, Criminal P. C., and pass orders.

The provisions of O. 22, R. 6, though they cover the case where a judgment is delivered in ignorance of the fact that a party has died between the conclusion of the hearing and the delivery of judgment, also provide for the delivery of judgment where the Court is aware of such death, and they make it clear that the death of a party is not sufficient cause for refusing to deliver judgment or allowing the withdrawal of a suit which has been completed in every respect except for such delivery of judgment. C. G. S. Pillay—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—One Ma Tin filed a suit in the District Court, Magwe, sitting at Yenangyasing, against her husband, Maung Po Kan, for divorce and for partition of property. The suit was defended and proceeded to trial, witnesses were examined and arguments heard, and on 22nd December 1916 was adjourned for judgment till 3rd January 1917. On that date it was again adjourned for the same purpose till 20th January 1917. It appears that on 17th January 1917 the defendant died, and on the 20th January the plaintiff applied for leave to withdraw the suit. On this the Judge passed the following order:

"Plaintiff applies to withdraw the suit on the ground that the defendant died on 17th January 1917. She applies under O. 23, R. 1, and asks for permission to institute a fresh suit in respect of the property. Under O. 23, R. 1 (ii), plaintiff is permitted to withdraw from her suit on payment of the defendant's costs, with liberty to institute a fresh suit in respect of the property claimed."

On the 26th January one Ma Kin Nyun, claiming to be adopted daughter of the deceased, applied for pronouncement of judgment making her legal representative in place of the deceased. This application was refused and she now comes to this Court in revision under S. 115, Civil P. C. The application is in effect that the District Judge acted with material irregularity in allowing the withdrawal of the suit without sufficient grounds. The Judge's order does not state why permission was granted to the plaintiff to withdraw the suit. It is clear that Cl. (2) (a), O. 23, R. 1, did not apply and that he can only have given permission under Cl. (2) (b). This clause lays down that permission may be given where the Court is satisfied that there are other sufficient grounds for allowing a plaintiff to institute a fresh suit for the subject matter of the suit or part of a claim. It is clear that the meaning of this is that a suit may be withdrawn where there are sufficient grounds for allowing the plaintiff to withdraw from a suit in order to institute a fresh suit for the subject matter thereof, or to abandon part of a claim continuing the suit as far as the balance of the claim is concerned. It is obvious here that the defendant having died, there could be no question of the plaintiff bringing a fresh suit for a divorce, nor did she desire to abandon a part of her claim continuing the suit for the balance. It would seem, therefore, that O. 23, R. 1, under which the Judge purported to act, had no application. Possibly the Judge was under the impression that the suit abated upon the death of the defendant, but if this was so, he would seem to have been in error in view of the terms of O. 22, R. 6, and if the suit abated, this was clearly not a reason for allowing its withdrawal. The provisions of O. 23, R. 1, are not to be arbitrarily applied.

They have been framed to allow a plaintiff to obtain an adjudication where, owing to some formal defect, or for other sufficient grounds, which must be bona fide grounds, urged in good time and not to the prejudice of the defendant, the plaintiff would but for this rule fail in his suit and be unable to obtain the assistance of the Courts in enforcing a just claim. The provisions of O. 22, R. 6, though no doubt they cover the case where a judgment is delivered in ignorance of the fact that a party has died between the conclusion of the hearing and the delivery of the decision, also undoubtedly provided for the delivery of judgment where the Court is aware of such death, and they seem to me to make it clear that the death of a party is not sufficient cause for refusing to deliver judgment or allowing the withdrawal of a suit which has been completed in every respect except for such delivery of judgment. It was pointed out in Ramacharya v. Anantacharya (1) that the practice in English Courts of equity was in such cases to disregard the fact of the death of a party occurring while the Court was considering, and to deliver judgment and draw up the decree as though he was still living and the judgment of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland is quoted with approval in which it is stated that

"nothing is better settled than that where a cause is heard and merely stands over for consideration, the Court will pronounce judgment though the plaintiff or defendant died" and in Surendra Keshub Roy v. Doorgasoondery Dossee (2), quoted in the same case, the Privy Council, notwithstanding the death of one of the parties pending consideration, delivered judgment and remitted the case to the Indian Courts for disposal without requiring the record to be amended. It is argued for the respondent that O. 22, R. 6, merely lays down that judgment may, in such case, i.e., after the death of one of the parties, be pronounced. The rule is not mandatory and this Court should not interfere if the Court fails to pronounce judgment, as a discretion is vested in it to deliver or not to deliver judgment. But this discretion must be exercised judicially, and I think it is clear that the Judge did not have the provisions of O. 22, R. 6, in his mind at all, nor did he purport to act under that rule. The case of Mahipat Shamlu v. Nathu Vithoba (3) may be referred to. It appears to be on the face of it desirable that judgment should be delivered in the present suit, which will then decide various matters in dispute between the parties by which the legal representatives of the defendant will be bound, whereas, otherwise, it will be necessary for one or the other of the parties to bring a fresh suit and to go largely into the same matters though upon a different cause of action. In allowing the plaintiff to withdraw her suit, the Court acted in the exercise of its jurisdiction with material irregularity within the meaning of S. 115 (c), Civil P. C., and there will be an order setting aside the order of the District Court allowing the suit to be withdrawn and directing the Court to proceed to deliver judgment. The respondent will pay the costs of this application.

Criminal Revn. No. 391 of 1917. Decided on 10th July 1917.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 213 and 215—Charge framed by committing Magistrate—Magistrate finding after hearing evidence that there are no sufficient grounds for putting accused to trial can cancel it.

A Committing Magistrate has a discretion, even after he has framed a charge, of cancelling it, if after hearing the evidence for the defence he considers that there are no longer sufficient grounds to put the accused on his trial. If he entirely disbelieves the evidence for the prosecution, however numerous the witnesses may be, he ought to discharge the accused. If he is in doubt as to their credibility but the evidence, if believed, would be sufficient for a conviction, he should not take on himself the functions of a superior Court, but commit the case for Sessions.

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 213—Direct evidence justifying conviction—It is not necessarily sufficient reason for commitment.

The fact that there is direct evidence against an accused person which if believed would justify a conviction is not necessarily a sufficient reason for committing a case to Sessions. [P 11 C 2]

(c) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 215—Point of law.

Semble.—The absence of evidence to warrant a commitment is a point of law. [P 12 C 1]

Maung Tha Gywe—for Applicant.

Judgment.—This is an application under S. 215, Criminal P. C., to quash the order of commitment to Sessions of Nga Hmyin. The grounds for making the application are briefly: (1) that the evidence is quite insufficient to justify the order of commitment, (2) that the Magistrate has failed to consider whether the evidence is reliable or not, and has not exercised a discretion vested in him by law, and (3) that in his reasons for commitment, he has not shown that he has considered the evidence. S. 210, Criminal P. C., directs a Magistrate to frame a charge if, after taking evidence, he is satisfied that there are sufficient grounds for committing the accused for trial, while S. 213 (2) gives him the power to cancel the charge if after hearing the evidence for the defence, he is satisfied that there are not sufficient grounds for the commitment. If he decides to commit, he is also bound to record briefly his reasons for so doing. In his reasons the Magistrate mentions briefly the evidence for the prosecution and defence and then says: "as there is direct evidence against Nga Hmyin,

I consider that he should stand his trial before the Court of Sessions."

The fact that there is direct evidence against an accused person, which, if believed, would justify a conviction, is not necessarily a sufficient reason for committing a case to Sessions. In the matter of the petition of Inshman v. Inshman (1), Mathwood, J., said:

"The object of the law in providing that the inquiry shall be held by a Magistrate before the accused has to undergo a trial in the Court of Sessions, seems to be to prevent the commitment of cases in which there is no reasonable ground for conviction. The provision of the law formulated, on the one hand, to save the subjects from prolonged anxiety of undergoing trial for offences not brought home to them; and on the other hand, to save the time of the Court of Sessions from being wasted over cases in which the charge is obviously not supported by such evidence as would justify a conviction. I am of opinion that the power given to Magistrate, ... extends to the weighing of evidence and the expression 'sufficient grounds' must be understood in a wide sense."

In In re the petition of Kalyan Singh (2), it was said that the proposition that Magistrates, who had before them evidence that discloses a case for trial in some Court to which they might commit it ought to commit, is dangerously large. These cases were followed in In re Bai Parvati (3), where the High Court held that where a Committing Magistrate finds that there is no evidence or that the evidence tendered for the prosecution is unworthy of credit it is his duty to discharge the accused. In Shobha Ram v. Emperor (4) one of the learned Judges laid down the test to be applied as to whether a commitment ought to be made or not as this—assuming that the whole of the evidence telling against the accused is true, is there a case which a Judge at a trial could leave to the jury. If there is any evidence that calls for an answer, however great the preponderance in favour of the prisoner may be, the commitment is proper. With due respect to the opinion of the learned Judge, I venture to think that the proposition laid down is too wide, and is inconsistent with the provisions of Cl. (2), S. 213. The Magistrate has a discretion even after he has framed a charge of cancelling it, if after hearing the evidence for the defence he considers that there are no longer sufficient grounds to put the accused on his trial. If he entirely disbelieves the evidence for the prosecution, however numerous the witnesses may be he ought to discharge the accused. If he is in doubt as to their credibility but the evidence if believed would be sufficient for a conviction, he should not take on himself the functions of a superior Court, but commit the case.

It is however, a waste of time and unfair to the accused to commit him to Sessions, where there is no reasonable probability that he will be convicted. The next point for consideration is whether this Court has power to quash a commitment once made, on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify such a commitment. In Emperor v. Nga Taung Thu (5) it was held that although both the police and the Committing Magistrate thought that the evidence for the prosecution was not credible, the commitment could not be quashed as no point of law was involved. A different view has been taken by the Calcutta High Court. In Jogeshwar Ghose v. King-Emperor (6) it was held that the absence of evidence to warrant the commitment is a point of law and may furnish a good ground for setting aside an order of commitment. The learned Judges said:

"Insufficiency of evidence has never been treated as a ground for quashing a commitment, but this Court, following the principle laid down by the Courts in England, has held that the absence of evidence to warrant the commitment is a point of law and may furnish a good ground for quashing the commitment. The Court has to consider whether there is such evidence as would justify the case going before a jury."

In Sheobux Ram's case (4), cited above the Judges also considered the same question. In the determination of fact there may be error of law. It was pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council that when there is no evidence to go to a jury, that does not raise a question of fact such as arises on the issue itself, but a question of law for the consideration of the Judge: Anangamanjari Chowdhurani v. Tripura Sundari Chowdhurani (7). In the present case, there are six eye-witnesses who profess to have seen the accused dash a stone against the deceased man's head. There may be good reason for disbelieving all of them, but the Magistrate has not stated that he did not believe them, and I cannot interfere with the order of commitment. I think, however, there are sufficient reasons for allowing bail, and I direct that Nga Hmyin be released on his furnishing two sureties in Rs. 150 each for his appearance before the Court of Session.

Second Appeal No. 390 of 1917, Decided on 6th May 1918.

Tort—Defamation—Person charging another with offence and without delay making complaint to police or Court—He is protected from action for defamation in respect of allegations in charge Dismissal of complaint—Remedy of accused—is to obtain sanction under Criminal P. C. S. 195 or suit for tort, malicious prosecution.

Where one man charges another with an offence and without unreasonable delay makes that charge the subject of a complaint to the police or to the Court, he is protected from an action for defamation of character in respect of allegations contained in the charge. If the complaint is dismissed the accused has two remedies one by obtaining sanction for the prosecution of the complainant for bringing a false charge, and the other, if he has suffered loss or injury, by a suit for damages for false and malicious prosecution. [P 14 C 1]

G. S. Pillay—for Appellant.

Tha Gywe—for Respondent.

Judgment.—Plaintiff sued for Rs. 100 damages for defamation of character, on the ground that the defendant had falsely charged him with setting fire to his, defendant's, house. The defence was that the charge was true. The first Court gave plaintiff a decree for Rs. 60. On appeal the lower appellate Court stated that the suit was for damages for malicious prosecution according to the plaintiff-respondent's advocate, and on the authority of certain Indian cases dismissed the plaintiff's suit. The plaintiff now comes to this Court in second appeal under S. 13, Upper Burma Civil Courts Regulation. The plaintiff-appellant urges that his suit was not or was not merely for damages for false and malicious prosecution, and no statement of his advocate in the lower appellate Court could alter the nature of the suit which was to be ascertained from the record. This is undoubtedly the case. The plaint as filed alleged in para. 2 that the defendant had come to the plain-ciff's house, while the plaintiff was asleep with the headman and village elders, and had charged the plaintiff with having set fire to his house. The plaint went on to state that the defendant was on bad terms with the plaintiff, that the charge was false, that the plaintiff had been defamed thereby and had suffered loss and injury. The case was at first dealt with ex parte, but the defendant appeared later and was allowed to defend the suit. The Judge of the lower appellate Court says in his judgment that "the plaintiff was too premature. He had not even waited to see what the result of the information given to the police would be."

But there is nothing on the record to show when the information was laid with the police; and though the defendant appeared and was examined before issues on 21st July 1916, the suit having been filed on 1st July 1916, and then stated that he had lodged a complaint with the police, in his cross-examination when examined as a witness, he admitted that this suit had been filed before he had made his complaint to the police. It would seem, therefore, that the suit could not have been a suit for damages for a false and malicious prosecution since, at the time it was filed, no step had been taken towards prosecuting the plaintiff; the cause of action cannot therefore have been a prosecution which had not even reached the stage of a report to the police at the time the plaint was filed. The judgments relied upon by the lower appellate Court appear to lay down that unless and until cognizance is taken of a complaint by a Court and some action is taken to require the plaintiff to appear and answer a charge, it cannot be said that there is any prosecution and there can, therefore, be no right of action for damages on the ground that there is a prosecution which is false and malicious. This view appears to have been dissented from in the Bombay case of Ahmedbhai v. Framji Edulji (1) and in the case of Bishun Pergash v. Fulman Singh (2) a Bench of the Calcutta High Court in 1914 examined the case-law on the subject and expressly dissented from the view taken in the Calcutta and Madras cases relied upon by the lower appellate Court. I am bound to say that there appears to me to be much force in the arguments by which the learned Judges in this later case arrived at their conclusions. It is not necessary to refer to them in detail because, as has been pointed out above, this suit was not a suit for damages for malicious and false prosecution. But I have referred to these cases because there appears to be another question arising in this suit which is referred to in two at least of the cases cited which appear to be of importance, and that is whether an action for defamation would lie against a defendant in respect of a charge which has formed the subject of a complaint to the police or to Court. In the case of Bishun Pergash v. Fulman Singh (2) cited above the plaintiff also claimed damages for defamation, but the Judges refused to consider this claim on the ground that it was not put in issue and for other reasons.

In the case of Golap Jan v. Bhula Nath (3) however it was held that even if the complaint to the Magistrate was defamatory, still the complainant was entitled to protection from suit and this protection was the absolute privilege awarded in the public interest to those who make statements to the Courts in the course of and in relation to judicial proceedings. This view of the law appears to be correct. Defamation of character is not a ground for claiming damages for false and malicious prosecution which may be granted upon proof of actual loss or damage. The law provides sufficient protection for an accused person in the prosecution of a complainant who has deliberately brought a false charge. But if this is the case, it appears to me to be more than doubtful whether a plaintiff is entitled to sue for damages for defamation on the ground that the allegations which formed the subject of the complaint to the police or Magistrate had been previously made outside the Court, and whether if he were so entitled the effect would not be to deprive the complainant of his privilege and would not be opposed to public policy. A person who had reason to believe that an offence had been committed, would be very seriously and unfairly handicapped if he were bound to keep his reasons to himself and to go to Court without making any enquiry into the truth of his suspicions, under penalty of having to meet an action for damages if he did not follow this course. opinion therefore that the defendant-respondent having taken his complaint to the police and to Court, so far as the record shows, without unreasonable delay was protected from an action for defamation of character in respect of allegations contained in his subsequent complaint. This being so, the plaintiff-appellant's suit was bound to fail. He had, when the complaint was filed and was dismissed, two remedies, one by obtaining sanction for the prosecution of the defendant for bringing a false charge, and the other, if he suffered loss or injury, upon the authority of the Calcutta case of 1914 cited above, by a suit for damages for false and malicious prosecution. In this view of the case the appeal is dismissed with costs throughout.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 35—Decree not appealable—No appeal, lies on question of costs—Appeal, maintainability.

An appeal does not lie on the question of costs where there has been no appealable decree.

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 24—Order under S. 24 read with S. 15 of Upper Burma Civil Courts Regulation is not appealable.

An order passed under the provisions of S. 24, Civil P. C., read with S. 15, Upper Burma Civil Courts Regulation, is not a decree and is not appealable. No appeal, therefore, lies from an order as to costs forming part of such order.

Judgment.—The respondent in the course of a suit against the appellants for an injunction, applied for a temporary injunction, and being dissatisfied with the progress made by the Court which was trying the suit, applied to the Divisional Court praying that the suit should be transferred to the file of the District Judge, and that the Divisional Judge should take upon his own file the application for a temporary injunction. The Divisional Judge, without referring to, or noticing the latter application, transferred the suit to the file of the District Judge and directed that the present appellants who had opposed the application should pay the costs, fixed at Rs. 50. Against this order requiring them to pay costs, the defendants appeal.

A preliminary objection is taken by the respondents that an appeal does not lie against the order of the Divisional Judge directing the appellants to pay costs. I think there is no doubt that this view is correct. The appellants relied on various Indian cases, among others Ranchordas Vitthaladas v. Bai Kasi (1) where it was held that, where the Original Court has made an erroneous order for costs under a misapprehension of fact and law, an appeal lies from such order although the appellant complains of nothing else but the order for costs so erroneously made. And in other cases, e. g., Kuppuswami Chetty v. Zamindar of Katsahasti (2) and Dildar Ali Khan v. Bhawani Sahai Singh (3), it was held that an appeal may be entertained on a question of costs only, when a matter of principle is involved, since costs are awarded in the exercise of the discretion of the Judge with reference to general principles. But it does not appear to me that any of these cases are authority for holding that where there is no appealable decree, the Court may entertain an appeal on a question of costs. In each of the Indian cases which I have referred to there was an appealable decree and the appeal was entertained as against that part of the decree which dealt with costs. Here the order of the Divisional Judge was an order passed under the provisions of S. 24, Civil P. C., read with S. 15, Upper Burma Civil Courts Regulation, and the order was not a decree and was not appealable. No appeal, therefore, lies.

Second Appeal No. 74 of 1917, Decided on 15th October 1917.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), Sch. 2, Para 1—General principle is that award is final—Principle should not be departed from where Court itself acts as arbitrator.

The general principle is that an award is final and cannot be questioned except upon such grounds, as corruption or an illegality apparent upon the face of the award, as are set out in Sch. 2, Civil P. C., and there is no reason for departing from the principle where the Court itself has been appointed and has accepted the office of arbitrator. [P 15 C 2; P 16 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), Sch. 2, Para 1—Court acting as arbitrator—Its award is in itself decree.

Where the Court itself is appointed to act as an arbitrator, no separate award need be passed inviting the parties to put in objections before passing a decree; such an award in itself is a decree. [P 15 C 2]

(c) Civil P. C. (1908), Sch. 2, Para 1—Examination of documentary evidence and inspection of ground by Court—Parties agreeing to abide by decision without calling witnesses—Decision is in nature of award—Appeal does not lie.

Where the parties to a suit agreed that after the Judge had examined the documentary evidence and inspected the ground he should give his decision without any witnesses being called, and that they would abide by his decision.

Held: that the decision was in the nature of an award and that no appeal lay against it. [P 15 C 2]

S. Mukerjee—for Appellants.

C. G. S. Pillay—for Respondents.

Judgment.—This was a suit to recover possession of a certain piece of land, together with mesne profits. The defendant filed a written statement in which he traversed the statements in the plaint, and an issue was framed. The parties then filed a number of maps and an application, in which they stated that they agreed that after the Judge had examined the documentary evidence and inspected the ground, he should give his decision without any witnesses being called, and they agreed to abide by this decision as final. The Judge accordingly visited the site and gave the plaintiff a decree as prayed for. The defendant, Maung Kala, then appealed. The District Judge held that the Judge had been appointed sole arbitrator in the dispute, and that the District Court could not question his decision. The defendant now comes to this Court in second appeal under S. 100, Civil P. C. It is urged that the submission by the parties did not amount to a submission to arbitration, that if it was, the award was subject to the procedure laid down in Sch. 2, Civil P. C., that the Judge of the first Court exercised a double function as arbitrator and Judge and that the award did not operate by itself and ripen into a decree, that the plaintiff should have been dismissed upon the plaintiff-respondent's producing no evidence, that the alleged wrongful dispossession and damage claimed has not been established, and that the Judge of the lower appellate Court should have decided the appeal upon its merits.

There appears to be good authority for the view taken by the District Court. It was held in Barkanta Nath Goswami v. Sita Nath Goswami (Sita Nath v. Barkanta Nath) (1) that when, after the hearing of the suit had commenced before a Munsif, both parties agreed to leave the questions in dispute between them to the determination of the Court after the Court had made a local inspection, and also agreed not to raise an objection to the same or to prefer an appeal, the decision of the Munsif is in the nature of an award and that no appeal lay to the District Judge. Further that no appeal lay from the decision of the District Judge to the High Court, though the High Court might interfere under S. 115, Civil P. C. Much the same view was taken in the Madras case of Nidamarthi Mukkanti v. Thammanna Ramayya (2). At p. 117 of Sarpi's Law of Arbitration, 1916, it is stated that where the Court itself is appointed to act as an arbitrator, no separate award need be passed inviting the parties to put in objections before passing a decree, such an award in itself is a decree and an objection to the award can be raised only by way of appeal against the decree to the appellate Court. The authority for this is said to be Nimmagadda Peda Naganna, In re (3), which is not available in this Court. If the law as laid down therein is correctly summarized, this appears to dispose of the objection that the parties should be given an opportunity of putting in objections before passing a decree, and it would seem probable that any appeal could only attack the award upon the grounds set out in Sch. 2, Civil P. C., as grounds for invalidating an award.

It does not appear that in the District Court any such grounds were set out. The general principle is that an award is final and cannot be questioned except upon such grounds, as corruption or an illegality apparent upon the face of the award, as are set out in Sch. 2. Civil P. C., and I see no reason for departing from the principle where the Court itself has been appointed and has accepted the office of arbitrator. It would seem from a perusal of the maps filed by the parties that they did sufficiently substantiate the plaintiff's case, and I think the District Court was justified in refusing to interfere. The appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—The three accused have been convicted and sentenced, the first to six months' rigorous imprisonment under S. 366, I. P. C. and the second and third to three months' rigorous imprisonment each under Ss. 366 and 114, I. P. C. The case was tried by the District Magistrate and no appeal lies, but this application for revision proceeds upon the ground that the Magistrate committed irregularities in the trial of the case which resulted in the admission of inadmissible evidence and the exclusion of admissible evidence, that the accused were prejudiced by these irregularities and that the Magistrate took a perverse view of the evidence. There is undoubtedly a tendency on the part of Courts in Upper Burma to ignore the strict provisions of S. 162, Criminal P. C. or to attempt to give them a meaning which they do not possess. The statements of witnesses recorded by the police in the course of an investigation cannot be used in any way whatever in the course of the trial which results from that investigation, except in the one way laid down in S. 162, Criminal P. C., with the single exception referred to in Cl. 2. Where therefore the statement taken down in writing by the police does not refer to the cause of the death of the person making it, as set out in S. 32, Cl. 1, Evidence Act, such statement can only be used when a witness is called for the prosecution on the request of the accused, if the Court thinks it expedient in the interests of justice after the accused has been furnished with a copy thereof. It is very desirable that the provisions of S. 162, Criminal P. C. should be clearly understood and strictly complied with. Here the witness Ma Nyun was called for the prosecution and she made a statement which was evidently thought to be more favourable to the accused than the statement which she had made to the police.

Her statement to the police was then read to her by the Court and she was asked whether it was correct, and she was cross-examined by the Court after she had admitted the correctness of the statement. This procedure was entirely unwarranted and the whole of this witness's evidence from the time her statement to the police was put to her must be excluded. The investigating Sub-Inspector was also called at the conclusion of the trial and was examined as to the investigation made by him. He was asked whether one of the witnesses for the defence, who had deposed in Court to the carrying of letters between the complainant and the accused and who had been examined by the police, had made any such statement to him. He was apparently referred to her statement as recorded by the police and stated that she had made no such statement. He was also examined as to admissions and statements made to him by the accused. It is true that under S. 172, Criminal P. C., the Court may send for the police diaries of a case under enquiry or trial and may use such diaries, not as evidence in the case, but to aid it in such enquiry or trial. It is clear, however, here that it was not the diaries referred to in S. 172, Criminal P. C. which were referred to and there was no provision of law which allows a police officer to give evidence of admissions made to him by an accused person of the kind here recorded. As to the admissible evidence upon the record it does not appear to me that there would be good grounds for interference in revision. The prosecution evidence was certainly open to serious criticism but so also was that for the defence. It was open to the Magistrate to believe the one and refuse to believe the other, and the mere fact that he did not give detailed reasons in every case for believing the prosecution witnesses in the face of improbabilities and discrepancies in their evidence, or that he did not give reasons for refusing to believe the defence witnesses in every case would not be sufficient reason for interference in revision.

I think there is no doubt that the complainant exaggerated the resistance offered by her and that she was probably not carried kicking and screaming through the town of Myingyan and into the house of one of the accused. She has probably also not told the truth in denying any previous acquaintance with the accused. The evidence of the witnesses who say that they saw the Gharry being driven through the town and deposed to what they say they saw is also open to serious criticism. On the other hand the evidence of a school fellow of the accused as to his relations with the girl was probably evidence of a person anxious to get his school fellow out of trouble, and the witness Ma Saw Myaing who deposed to the carrying of letters had been selling in the bazaar for about two years at the stall of the accused I's mother and therefore also undoubtedly had cause for trying to help him. There seems to be no doubt that the complainant received a bruise upon her cheek and an abrasion upon her knee and that she was suffering from fever for a day or two after the occurrence. The defence story that she was to all intents and purposes engaged to the accused I and that a marriage was to take place before long does not explain why she should have been taken away by the accused I with a show of force but really with her own consent, as the defence suggest. D.W. 10 Maung

Kywe, who was called apparently to prove that the girl's father did not believe the story of the abduction or thought that the accused was justified in behaving as he did, seems to me to have gone too far. I find it difficult to believe that the father would have said in order to show his friendship for the accused I "even if he kills my daughter I do not mind."

Surely the best person to have proved the wishes of the father would have been the father himself. I think, however, that the record does show that the father had been at one time, if he was not at the time of the abduction, on friendly terms with the accused I's family. It is possible that the boy hoped to marry the complainant, that either on account of the winning of a large prize in a lottery or for some other reason he saw little hope of getting his wishes gratified in a legitimate manner and, therefore, had recourse to force. It appears to me that the evidence, apart from that which was not admissible, was sufficient to prove the charges, but the Magistrate undoubtedly committed serious irregularities and from the reference in the judgment to another abduction case which had come to the Magistrate's notice and from the failure to refer the facts which undoubtedly told in favour of the accused, it does appear to me that he was influenced by what he thought to be the general lawlessness of Burmese youths and failed to give due weight to the circumstances which in this case told in favour of the accused and that the latter were prejudiced thereby. In my opinion that in the circumstances of the case justice will be done if the convictions are maintained, but the sentences are reduced to the period already undergone and there will be an order accordingly.

Civil P. C. (1908), S. 20 (c)—Suit on contract—Place of contract not within jurisdiction—Court can try suit if place where contract was to be performed or money was payable is within jurisdiction.

J. C. Chatterjee—for Appellant.

D. Dutt—for Respondent.

Judgment.—This was a suit upon a promissory note. The suit was filed in the District Court, Mandalay, and the plaintiff alleged that the note had been executed in Mandalay. The defendant denied that he had been present in Mandalay at the time, or had executed the note. In the course of the hearing the Judge had reason to believe that the note was not executed in Mandalay, and framed an issue accordingly. The plaintiff produced one witness who gave evidence that the note was executed in Taunggyi, and upon this the District Judge returned the plaint under O. 7, R. 10. The plaintiff now comes to his Court in appeal. The point does not appear to be free from difficulty, and the rejection of the plaint did not necessarily follow as a matter of course, as the District Judge appeared to think, upon proof that the note had been executed outside the jurisdiction of the Court. S. 20, Civil P. C., provides that a suit may be brought in a Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the cause of action wholly or in part arises. What was meant by this was explained in the third explanation to the corresponding S. 17 of the old Code, and although that explanation has been omitted in the present Code, it has been omitted because the present Code expressly gives jurisdiction where the cause of action wholly or in part arises. Expln. 3 to S. 17 of the old Code settled the signification of the term "cause of action" in the case of suits arising out of contract: see Salig Ram v. Chuba Mal (1). It is true that the place where the contracts in the present suit was made was not within the jurisdiction of the Court; but the Court still had jurisdiction if the place where the contract was to be performed, or where in its performance the money to which the suit relates was expressly or impliedly payable, was within the jurisdiction of the Court.

It is apparently urged by the plaintiff-appellant that the cause of action did arise in Mandalay because it was not merely the promissory note but previous transactions. But it appears to be clear that the plaint as it stands was based on a promissory note only; as it was filed within three days of the expiry of the period of limitation, the previous promissory note in substitution of which the note sued upon is said to have been executed would not have afforded a cause of action, nor would the previous transactions in the course of which the money became due. The main contention of the plaintiff-appellant, however, is that the contract was to be performed in Mandalay or that in its performance the money to which the suit related was impliedly payable in Mandalay. It is clear that the money was not expressly made payable in Mandalay and the Court certainly did not have jurisdiction from any express agreement that the contract was to be performed there. The only question, therefore, which remains was whether the money was impliedly payable in Mandalay. The only Indian case which I have been able to find is that of Raman Chettiyar v. Gopalachari (2), but this case appears to be exactly in point. There a note payable on demand and not payable at any specified place—a description to which the note in the present suit answers—had been executed within the local limits of the jurisdiction of the Tanjore Court by the defendant, who resided at Tanjore; the plaintiff, residing at Kumbakonam, brought his suit in the Kumbakonam Court, and the question was, had that Court jurisdiction. Both the Judges held that it had not. Sir Arnold White, C. J., said:

"I do not think it necessary to decide whether the question of the implication of payment in a particular place is to be considered only with reference to the terms of the contract, or whether the circumstances in which the contract was made may also be taken into account. I assume that for the purpose of applying Expl. 3 (S. 17 of the old Civil P. C.) you must look at the contract and at the fact, which existed at the time the contract was made and then determine whether, having regard to the terms, the contract was one which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction."

And the Judge went on to say that in deciding that the Court had jurisdiction, the District Judge appeared to have had only in mind the ordinary rule that a debtor should follow his creditor. He said:

"I do not think this general rule can be relied on as controlling the express words of a Statute prescribing the conditions which give a Court

1. (1912) 34 All 49=11 I C 712.

2. (1908) 34 Mad 223.

local jurisdiction. Such a view would involve the proposition that unless the contract or the circumstances in which the contract was made, gives rise to a contrary implication, a creditor may sue in any Court within the local jurisdiction of which he happens to be when his right to sue arises."

a conclusion which, I think there can be no doubt, would be quite inconsistent with the express provisions of S. 17. Miller, J., was also of the same opinion and said:

"But it seems to me clear that by the phrase 'expressly or impliedly payable, we are to understand payable according to the terms of the contract, which are expressed or can be inferred from a construction of the language, or from the circumstances.'"

Both Judges held that illus. (b) to S. 17, which is repeated as illustration to S. 20 of the present Code, was a useful guide to interpreting the meaning of the section, since if the plaintiff's place of residence gave rise to an implication as to the place where the money to which the suit relates was payable, it would have been entitled to sue B and C at Suola (Sir Arnold White, C. J.); or, as Miller, J., remarked, the framers of the Code had an excellent opportunity of making it clear in drafting illus. (b) that a plaintiff should be allowed to sue at his place of residence to recover debts due to him in pursuance of contracts made elsewhere in the absence of a contrary to the contrary, and the fact that they did not avail themselves of the opportunity supported, in his opinion, the view taken. I think there is no doubt that this view is correct. The fact that the defendant had previously bought goods from the plaintiff in Mandalay and had paid for them in Mandalay, if it is a fact, though the evidence of the witnesses called by the defendant to prove transactions which had taken place outside the jurisdiction of the Court seems to throw some doubt on it, was not sufficient in my opinion to show that there was an implied contract to pay the money in Mandalay. The plaintiff's only witness says that as the plaintiff asked him to write to the defendant to pay a debt on an old on-demand note, he took a form from the plaintiff and sent it to the defendant to Taunggyi who returned it from Taunggyi duly filled in, and he then sent the defendant the old on-demand note. This is the contract sued on, and the circumstances are not sufficient, in my opinion, to prove an implied contract to pay in Mandalay. I may add that, although it is true that under S. 61, Negotiable Instruments Act, where a promissory note is payable on demand and is not payable at a specified place, no presentment is necessary in order to charge the maker thereof, the ordinary rule that a debtor must seek his creditor is not given effect to in S. 70 of the same Act, which provides that a promissory note not payable at a specified place must be presented for payment at the place of business, if any, or at the usual residence, not at the residence of the maker. I see no reason to interfere and dismiss the appeal with costs. W.S. B.N. Appellants' counsel.

In view of the difference in the conditions of social life in India and in England, it is doubtful whether and to what extent the presumption that when a bond is on a money bond to two or more obligees, they are tenants in common and not joint tenants of the debt with the consequence that the discharge by one obligee cannot be set up as a defence against the other obligee since for his share of the debt, which in England prevails only in cases in which equitable relief is claimed, should have effect given to it in India.

M. Johannes—for Appellant.

Pillay and Pershad—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The plaintiffs' case was that he had mortgaged certain land to the two defendants and the deceased husband of defendant 1, that he had redeemed the mortgage by payment of the mortgage money to defendant 1, but defendant 2 refused to deliver possession. Defendant 1 admitted the claim, while defendant 2 stated that as he had not received the mortgage money, he was entitled to retain possession of the land. The Court of first instance held that the defendants mortgagees were partners and that defendant 2 was bound by the payment to defendant 1, and decreed the plaintiff's suit. Upon appeal the District Court apparently held that there was fraud and dismissed the suit, and the plaintiff now comes to this Court in second appeal under S. 13, Upper Burma Civil Courts Regulation. It is clear that neither in his written statement nor in his examination before issues did defendant 2 plead fraud, and there does not seem to be any suggestion throughout the evidence that the plaintiff was acting in collusion with defendant 1. There were in fact no grounds whatever for the conclusion arrived at by the lower appellate Court, which was clearly wrong. The facts are not in dispute. The mortgage document was produced and admitted, and in it, after the description of the land, it is set out that U Pa Si, Ma Po and Maung Po Mya deliver Rs. 325 to Maung Nyan Mo and receive the said lands in mortgage with possession.

"If it is required to redeem the lands, the redemption shall be made only after three years from the date of execution of this document."

There is the usual clause as to interference by third parties, and the document is signed by the three persons named as mortgagees. The evidence does little more than prove the mortgage and the redemption thought it appears from it that defendant 2 was the son-in-law of defendant 1 and her deceased husband, that at one time they lived together and that up to the time of Maung Pa Si's death, defendant 2 worked with defendant 1. Defendant 1 said in her evidence that defendant 2 was merely an agent of her husband; she did not attempt to prove it, and he is clearly described in the document as mortgagee. Defendant 2 gave evidence that the mortgage money belonged jointly to him and to his father-in-law and mother-in-law, who had a joint income and did joint business and no partition had been made up till the time of suit. There appears to be no authority for the view taken by the Court of first instance that the defendants were partners, though they may have occupied a position analogous to that of partners. They were co mortgagees or co-promisees and in the absence of fraud or collusion the only question which arises is whether the mortgagor is entitled to redeem by making payment to one of them, and whether payment to a co-mortgagee has the effect of discharging the joint debt. Upon this question there appears to be a difference of opinion in the Indian Courts. The latest reported case is that of Umes Chandra Banerjee v. Dinabandhu Mahanti (1). It was there held that payment to one of several joint mortgagees was not a good payment as against the plaintiff and another co-mortgagee. Reliance was placed on Husainara Begum v. Rahmannessa Begum (2), in which it was stated that the principle of law applicable to cases of this description was fully explained. The explanation referred to shows that the principle is based upon the English presumption of equity, that when a claim is on a money-bond to two or more obligees, the presumption is that the obligees are tenants-in-common and not joint tenants of the debt, with the consequence that the discharge by one obligee cannot be set up as a defence against the other obligee suing for his share of the debt, and the doctrine stated by Wills, J., in Steeds v. Steeds (3) is quoted with approval, that "although the mortgagees take a joint security each means to lend his own money and to take back his own."

It was added:

"There is nothing to indicate that the intention of the parties was that each of the persons in whose favour the mortgage obligation was created was a creditor for the whole."

Whether co-promisees are joint or several is a question of fact. In view of the difference in the conditions of social life in India and in England, it appears to me to be doubtful (as stated in Cunningham and Shephard's Contract Act, Edn. 11, at p. 182) whether and to what extent, this presumption, which in England prevails only in cases in which equitable relief is claimed, should have effect given to it in this country. Although in Umesh Chandra Banerjee v. Dinabandhu Mahanti (1) referred to above, the mortgagees are referred to as joint mortgagees, it was held that in view of the terms of the mortgage instrument which stated explicitly that the mortgagors would pay the loan to the two mortgagees, they were thus under an obligation to tender to both the mortgagees. In the present case there is no such stipulation and the presumption (assuming, but not admitting that it is applicable in India) that the mortgagees were tenants-in-common, which is a rebuttable presumption, appears to me in the present suit to be rebutted by the evidence. Both the mortgagees agree that at the time of the mortgage they were working together, and defendant 2's statement, that they held their property jointly and that there was no division, has not been contradicted and may be accepted as correct.

But there appears to be a still further conflict of opinion as to whether in the case of joint promisees, payment of one discharges the debt. In Mannava Anna-purnamma v. Uppala Akkayya (4) the Full Bench, by a majority of two Judges to one, held that one of several payees of a negotiable instrument can give a valid discharge of the debt without the concurrence of the other payees. From this view the Chief Justice dissented, and his opinion has been referred to in the case of Umesh Chandra Banerjee v. Dinabandhu Mahanti (1), quoted above as a weighty dissent which appeared to the Judges of the Calcutta Bench to enunciate the correct rule on the subject. The learned Chief Justice of Madras held that S. 38, Contract Act, dealt with the case of an offer which was not accepted, and although the last paragraph of the section is general and is not restricted to an offer which has not been accepted, apparently the legislature were not contemplating the legal consequences of an offer which had been accepted, but the legal consequences of an offer which had been refused; and the Chief Justice thought that it was impossible to infer from this enactment that the legislature intended to lay down by implication that the acceptance of payment by one of several promisees operated as a discharge of the claims of the others. But I am bound to say that the opinion of the majority of the Bench appears to be more in conformity with reason. If it is admitted that an offer to one of several joint promisees, whether accepted or not has the same legal consequences as an offer to all of them, the only possible conclusion appears to be that the acceptance of the offer discharges the obligation. It seems to me that the answer to the question can be found within the four corners of the Contract Act, and that it is not necessary therefore to look to the general law. Even if this view is not correct, it appears to me that, apart from the presumption referred to above, which is of doubtful application in India, there can be no real question as to what the law is; the only question is as to what the facts in each particular case are. I hold therefore that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed. If the presumption is admitted to arise that the creditors were tenants-in-common, and not joint tenants it was rebutted in this case; and if the presumption does not arise, a fortiori the mortgagees were joint promisees and the payment to one of them discharged the whole debt. The appeal must therefore be allowed and the decree of the Court of first instance is restored with costs throughout.

Sinwa Naung—Defendant—Respondent.

Civil Appeal No. 225 of 1917, Decided on 14th October 1917, against the order of Dist. Judge, Myitkyina.

(a) Kachin Hill Tribes Regulation (1 of 1895) Ss. 1 (3) and 4—Regulation does not apply outside defined hill-tracts.

The Kachin Hill Tribes Regulation applies to Kachins in the defined hill-tracts and does not apply outside those hill-tracts. [P 22 C 2]

(b) Kachin Hill Tribes Regulation (1 of 1895) S. 11—Suit triable outside hill tract—Jurisdiction of ordinary civil Courts is not superseded.

Section 11 of the Kachin Hill Tribes Regulation applies to suits triable within a hill tract by an officer exercising jurisdiction therein. It is permissive and gives the Special Court power to try any suit of the nature described, but it does not lay down, and it cannot be inferred, that where a suit is triable outside a hill-tract, the jurisdiction of the ordinary civil Courts is superseded. [P 22 C 2]

Lentaigne and Pillay—for Appellants.

Judgment.—This was a suit upon a mortgage which was filed in the District Court, Myitkyina, by the plaintiffs, a Chinese firm carrying on business in Bhamo and Mogaung. The defendant is a Kachin described in the plaint as residing in Kansai, Kamaing Subdivision, Myitkyina District. It is apparently admitted that Kansai is a hill tract as defined in Kachin Hill Tribes Regn. 1 of 1895, that is to say, a hill-tract to which that regulation has been extended. The plaint was returned by the District Judge to the plaintiff on the ground that he had no jurisdiction, and the order directs that the plaint be returned for representation to the proper Court, which under the Kachin Hills Regulation is the Court of the Assistant Superintendent, Kamaing. This appeal is under O. 43, R. 1 (a), Civil P. C. The District Judge held that the suit was one between a Kachin as defined in the Kachin Hills Regulation and a non-Kachin, that the subject-matter of the suit lay in the Kachin Hills and that the defendant was a permanent resident there. The suit was, therefore, in the opinion of the District Judge, controlled by S. 11 of the Kachin Hills Regulation and should be tried by the Special Court established under the Kachin Hills Regulation and under the special law and procedure laid down therein. The grounds of appeal are that the District Judge was in error in holding that the District Court, of Myitkyina, had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit, that the cause of action arose at Mogaung which is not a hill-tract and as such the District Judge had jurisdiction, that the Judge erred in holding that the suit was barred under S. 11 of the Kachin Hills Regulation, and that he should not have returned the plaint for presentation to the Assistant Superintendent, Kachin Hills Tracts Kamaing.

The extent of the Kachin Hill Tribes Regulation is laid down in S. 1 (3) of the Regulation, which declares that it shall extend to such hill-tracts and shall apply to such hill tribes as the Local Government may by notification direct, and sub-S. 3 goes on to declare that S. 11 shall apply to all persons who may be parties to a suit or other proceeding of a civil nature in which any of the parties is a member of a hill tribe to which Regulation applies. The wording of this clause is not perhaps very clear, but there seems to be no reason for supposing that it extends, or was intended to extend, the operation of the Regulation beyond the local area to which by CL (3), S. 1, it is specifically extended. The District Judge, Myitkyina, would appear to interpret this clause as extending the operation of the Act to members of a hill tribe outside the hill tracts. If that is so, apparently a Kachin ordinarily resident in a hill-tract might come to Mandalay, contract debts in the bazaar and plead the Regulation as a bar to the jurisdiction of the Local Courts in the Mandalay District. Apart from the actual wording of the Regulation, it appears to me very improbable that it was the intention of Government that this should be possible. It is true that the regulation is extended to such hill tribes as the Local Government may, by notification in the Burma Gazette, direct, and by a notification, Political Department No. 17, dated 29th July 1914, the Lieutenant-Governor directs that the regulation shall apply to the undermentioned hill tribes in certain defined tracts, namely, Kachins and others. I think that this notification must be taken to mean what it says, that is to say, that it applies to Kachins in the hill-tracts defined and does not apply outside those hill-tracts. S. 3 defines what enactments are in force and apply to members of a hill tribe in a hill tract, and declares that no other enactment shall be deemed to apply to members of a hill tribe in a hill-tract.

It seems to me that it would be impossible to interpret this section as meaning that the enactments as set out in the schedule apply to members of a hill tribe outside a hill-tract without straining the plain meaning of the words. S. 11, which is referred to in S. 1 of the Regulation and on which the learned District Judge relies, lays down that the Deputy Commissioner and every Assistant Commissioner exercising jurisdiction within a hill tract may try any suit or other proceeding of a civil nature between parties any one of whom is a member of a hill-tribe. Nothing is said about the subject-matter of suit or about one of the parties being a permanent resident in a hill tract. This section, therefore, clearly applies to suits triable within a hill-tract by an officer exercising jurisdiction therein. It is permissive and gives the Deputy Commissioner or Assistant Commissioner power to try any suit of the nature described but it does not lay down, and it cannot be inferred, where a suit is triable outside a hill-tract, the jurisdiction of the ordinary civil Courts is superseded. S. 9, Civil P. C., declares that the Courts shall have jurisdiction to try all suits of a civil nature excepting suits of which their cognizance is either expressly or impliedly barred, and S. 20 lays down that subject to certain limitations, every suit shall be instituted in the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction, among other things, the cause of action wholly or in part arises, and there can be no doubt that the plaintiff may select the forum in which to bring his suit, provided that he complies with the provisions of S. 20. Here it is his case that the mortgage upon which he sued was executed in Mogaung, that is to say, within the jurisdiction of the District Judge of Myitkyina. There is no doubt therefore that even if the Kachin Hill Tribes Regulation extends beyond the limit of a hill tract, the fact that it lays down that the Deputy Commissioner or Assistant Commissioner may try a suit, cannot be a bar to the jurisdiction of the ordinary civil Courts. There will, therefore, be an order setting aside the order of the District Judge and directing him to admit the plaint and proceed to deal with it according to law. Costs will follow the final result.

Nga Po Kyan—Convict.

Criminal Revn. No. 76 of 1918, Decided on 23rd April 1918.

Burma Excise Act (1917), S. 37—Manufacture of tari not prohibited or restricted in a district—S. 37 does not apply to possession of tari manufactured in such district.

In a district in which the tree-tax system is not in force and in which consequently the law does not prohibit or place any restriction upon the manufacture of tari it cannot be unlawfully manufactured and S. 37 does not, therefore, apply to the possession of tari manufactured in such a District. [P 25 C 2]

H. M. Lutter—for the Crown.

Judgment.—This is one of seven cases in which the accused have been convicted and sentenced to pay fines under S. 37, Burma Excise Act (Burma Act 5 of 1917). The charge in each case was that the accused had been in possession of less than four quarts of tari which had been illegally manufactured and that such possession was within five miles of a licensed tari shop. The District Magistrate is doubtful whether the convictions can stand. Burma Act 5 of 1917 only came into force on 1st October 1917, and though the law in respect of the possession of tari does not appear to have been materially altered, this result has been arrived at by a somewhat different method to that followed in the Act which has been superseded. For the purpose of the present case it is sufficient to point out that unfermented tari has been declared to be alcoholic liquor and that alcoholic liquor is included in the meaning of the term "excisable article," while "manufacture" includes the tapping of tari producing trees and the drawing of tari from trees, S. 2, sub Ss. (a), (f) and (m). The manufacture of excisable articles is forbidden except under the authority and subject to the conditions of a license granted under the Act by S. 12 (a) of the Act, and by a notification of the Financial Department No. 71 dated 18th September 1917, the Local Government has been pleased to exempt from the provisions of S. 12 of the Act tari where the tree tax system is not in force.

The District Magistrate reports that the tree tax system is not in force in his District. The provisions of S. 12 (a) do not therefore apply to tari and there is no other provision in the Act making its manufacture illegal. S. 37 of the Act provides a penalty for the possession of an excisable article which the person possessing it knows or has reason to believe has been unlawfully manufactured. It is clear, therefore, that in a District in which the law does not prohibit or place any restriction upon the manufacture of tari it cannot be unlawfully manufactured and S. 37 does not therefore apply to the possession of tari manufactured in such a District. The District Magistrate has expressed doubt as to whether the possession was lawful in view of the fact that it has not been shown that the tari had been collected in unsmoked or unlimed pots. This doubt however has reference to another set of facts. S. 16 (1) of the Act provides that the Local Government may by notification prescribe a limit of quantity for possession of any excisable article and in exercise of the authority so granted the Local Government has by Financial Department notification No. 77 dated 18th September 1917, prescribed a limit of four reputed quart bottles in the case of tari; where the quantity of tari exceeds four quart bottles its possession is an offence punishable under S. 30 (a) of the Act subject to further exceptions made by Notification No. 72 referred to above, of which the Cl. 1 permits possession of tari intended for the manufacture of gur, jag-gery molasses or sugar, in a District where the tree-tax system is not in force if the tari is drawn either in smoked pots or in pots treated with lime. But inasmuch as in each of the cases here referred to the quantity of tari found was less than four quart bottles, it is clear that no offence was committed, however the tari may have been drawn. The convictions and sentences are set aside and fines must be refunded.

Maung Su—for Appellants.

H. M. Lutter—for the Crown.

Judgment.—This is a case of a kind which, though fortunately not common, is not unique. The deceased was believed to be possessed by an evil spirit and was beaten to death by four persons acting, it is alleged, under the mistaken belief that by beating her, she would be cured of her unnatural illness. Appellant 1 who is a Burmese sayu has been sentenced to death, and the other two appellants have been sentenced to transportation for life under S. 302, I. P. C. Accused 4 was sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 50 or to suffer three month's rigorous imprisonment under S. 323, I. P. C., and this accused has not appealed. The facts of the case are briefly as follows:

Ma Chon, mother of Ma Me Te, called in appellant 1, who happened to be visiting the village, to attend her daughter, Ma Me Te, who had a sore upon her leg. The appellant, who apparently professes to be a specialist in the cure of witchcraft, took with him the two other appellants, fellow villagers of the deceased, and one of them, Nga Shwe Pyan, a lover of Ma Me Te. He was also accompanied by Ma Me Tin, accused 4 who was said to be a notkadaw, described as a person who acts as a spirit medium, capable of becoming possessed by a not. Appellant 1 Po Tha, appears immediately to have assumed that the girl was possessed by an evil spirit and gave her a betel leaf to chew, and when she said that the leaf tasted hot, he declared that she was possessed by a spirit which must be exorcised by beating her. He and his companions thereupon beat and kicked her for a short time. She received several contusions described by the medical witness, and the treatment was evidently brutal enough to cause the mother, Ma Chon, to weep. Appellant, Po Tha, thereupon said the spirit had gone into Ma Chon. She was tested in the same way with a betel leaf and was then beaten from about 10 o'clock that night until just before dawn, when she succumbed to her injuries.

Although there is nothing on the record to show that appellant 1 was called in to drive out an evil spirit, the evidence in fact being that he was not called to do so but to treat an ulcer, it appears to me possible that there may have been some suspicion on the part of the mother or the girl's relations that she was possessed. The man, who called in appellant 1 says he was called for that purpose, and there seems to be no doubt that he professed to be able to cure such cases. It is also difficult to understand the conduct of the appellant, Shwe Pyan, in beating the girl to whom he was paying his addresses and subsequently her mother and of the villagers who, though they say they remonstrated, did not, as they certainly could have done, interfere more effectively and put a stop to the beating, if they had nothing more than appellant 1's word to induce them to think that the girl and her mother were "possessed." But whether this is so or not there is no evidence upon the record that either the girl, Ma Me Te, or her mother, Ma Chon, gave any consent to the treatment to which they were subjected. On the contrary it seems clear that Ma Chon at least protested that she was not possessed by an evil spirit and that she should not be beaten. The learned Sessions Judge in convicting the accused has referred to the case of Nga Po Kyaw v. King-Emperor (1), in which the persons who inflicted a fatal beating upon a woman alleged to be possessed by an evil spirit were found to have committed an offence under S. 304-A, I. P. C., and the Sessions Judge has questioned the correctness of that decision. But it was expressly stated in the judgment of my learned predecessor in that case that the evidence left no doubt that the girl's mother and her relatives contemplated that she should be beaten, and that the girl herself voluntarily submitted to that treatment. The girl would seem to have been suffering from hysteria or some similar complaint for years, and among her own people she was universally believed to be under the domination of an evil spirit that had located itself in her body.

The case therefore differs from the present case in important particulars. Here there is no evidence upon the record that the girl was suffering from anything but an ulcer on her leg, or that there was any reason which would lead her relations to suppose that she was possessed of an evil spirit. As I have said above, it is possible that they did so, but there is not a particle of evidence to that effect. The woman whose death was caused, it is not suggested and there seems to be no reason whatever to suppose, was afflicted in any way. The only reason given for leading appellant 1 and his assistants to suspect that she was possessed and to turn their attention to her was that she performed the perfectly natural act of weeping, probably loudly, when she saw her daughter being severely beaten. Neither she nor her daughter consented, and the evidence indeed goes to show that Ma Chon, so far from consenting, protested vigorously against being suspected of being possessed and beaten in consequence. I have read the judgment of the Sessions Judge in Criminal Appeal No. 61 of 1893 which is referred to in Po Kyaw's case (1). It appears there that the girl had been afflicted for five years or so with hysteria or some form of hysterical mania; she was subjected to severe beating with sticks while in this condition by her relations. It does not appear that she submitted or consented to the treatment. The learned Sessions Judge held that it was clear that the accused had no intention of causing bodily injury likely to cause death, nor had they any knowledge that they were likely to cause death. No reason whatever was given for this conclusion, but it was not questioned by the learned Judicial Commissioner who remarked:

"The fact that the deceased died from the shock of the beating need not necessarily enter into the consideration of the question of punishment and that death may have been accelerated by disease of the heart, but anyhow the appellants have not been convicted of the offence of causing death."

From the extracts of the medical evidence given in the judgment of the Sessions Judge in that case, it was apparent that there were very severe contusions on the body of the woman extending from the nape of the neck down to the thighs, and also on both shoulder joints extending to the elbows, that there must have been a repeated and protracted beating which was dangerous to life and which might have caused death.

The medical witness thought that the woman's death was caused by severe shock produced by the injuries sustained. Her heart was a little fatty and that might have accelerated death. The accused were sentenced by the Sessions Judge to two years' rigorous imprisonment, which was reduced by the Judicial Commissioner for the reasons quoted in Po Kyaw's case (1) to six months' rigorous imprisonment.

Mr. Burgess found that the beating was administered in perfect good faith, but as he went on to say it was carried out to excess and no precautions were taken to guard against misadventure, it is clear that he used the words "good faith" in some other sense than that with which they are used in the Penal Code. As S. 52 lays down that nothing is said to be done or believed in good faith which is done or believed without due care and attention, it seems obvious that the beating carried out to excess, without precautions to guard against misadventure, cannot have been administered in good faith. Nor do I think that the finding of the Sessions Judge was necessarily endorsed by the Judicial Commissioner or can be accepted, in the absence of any reasons, as authority for holding that where a number of persons

1. (1902-03) U B R.

G. N. D.
Advocate High Court
Jammu & Kashmir

inflict a beating upon a woman which in the ordinary course of nature is sufficient to cause death or which is likely to cause death, it can be assumed that there was no intention to cause death or to cause such injuries. Intention is a question of fact which must be decided upon the circumstances of each particular case. It may be a legal fiction as for instance where knowledge is presumed in the case of a person who is intoxicated and intention is the inference drawn from such knowledge, or it may be proved by evidence of the particular circumstances in each case.

It appears to me further that in considering the question of sentences in the case referred to, Burgess, for whose opinion I in common with other Judges of this Court have a great respect, did not deal with the whole aspect of the matter. It is no doubt incontrovertible that there is no reason for punishing ignorance as ignorance, but where a person is convicted of a brutal crime of a kind repugnant to the natural instincts of mankind, it is necessary to pass a sentence which will punish such brutality even where it proceeds from ignorance, and I am not aware that any protest has ever been raised against the provisions of the law under which persons who have taken part in proceedings sanctioned possibly by ignorance but also by a belief in certain religious teachings, are subject to very severe penalties, e.g., in the case of suttee. It appears clear, moreover, that the occurrence of a case in 1917, even more brutal than that dealt with in Criminal Appeal No. 64 of 1893, goes to show that the punishment there considered appropriate has not had the effect of putting a stop to the practice complained of. The fact in the present case that the deceased woman did not consent to be beaten makes S. 304-A, I. P. C. inapplicable. If there was no intention to cause death or knowledge that death would ensue, the appropriate section would appear to be S. 325, I. P. C. If there was, the question is whether S. 302 or S. 304 applies.

As to appellant I, he described himself as a saya or doctor, and it must, therefore, be presumed that he had some knowledge, however slight and empirical, of the effects of violence upon human beings. The evidence goes to show that the deceased woman actually died while being beaten; the witnesses who went into the house as soon as the appellants had left it, found her dead. The evidence is that the woman was kicked with the bare heel, beaten and slapped with the fist or open hand, and also that her feet and hands were joined by a rope by which she was lifted from the ground and dropped. Although the witnesses did not depose to this last treatment in the Committing Magistrate's Court, it seems unlikely that they can have invented it, but whether it took place or not it is obvious from the medical evidence that the woman received injuries from which she could not possibly have recovered. She was a woman of 45 years of age or more, of weekly physique. The ordinary lay person looking at her would consider that she was somewhat weak. Her whole body and head were covered with a mass of bruises. Death was due to internal haemorrhage and shock, and the Medical Officer said that these were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause the death of a normally healthy person.

I think it is impossible to believe that appellant I did not know that the treatment to which this woman was subjected was likely to cause her death. The question whether he intended to cause such injuries is not so easy to answer. Assuming that he did believe that she was possessed by an evil spirit, his primary intention no doubt was not to cause the patient's death but to drive the spirit out. There is no doubt that a belief in witchcraft is extremely common among Burmans, and it is difficult to imagine that if they did not think that the treatment of Ma Chon was justified and that it would have the desired effect, the villagers would not have interfered early in the proceedings. That they did not interfere is however no evidence that the conduct of the appellant was not unnecessarily brutal. Great stress has been laid by the learned advocate who has argued this appeal on the reply made by appellant I to remonstrances, that he was not beating the woman but was beating the spirit and that the woman would not be marked by so much as a scratch. But it appears to me that very much stronger evidence would be necessary to prove that the appellant acted in the bona fide belief that the laws of nature would be suspended in this particular instance for his convenience. It is necessary to assume a certain standard of common sense among all persons accused of committing crime, in the absence of a plea or evidence of insanity or mental deficiency.

But I do not think that it is necessary to convict the appellant under S. 302 of murder. He certainly had no intention, as far as can be judged, to kill the deceased and the intention, which may be inferred from knowledge, is not an intention which must necessarily be inferred in every case. Up to a certain point the appellant's acts, though in the circumstances probably criminal, did not endanger life and I do not think that it is necessary to infer that because he went beyond that point, he intended to cause injuries which he knew to be likely to cause death. Each of the blows struck by himself was probably comparatively light, and the prevailing intention throughout would seem to have been to drive out the spirit. In any case the reasons given by the learned Sessions Judge for passing the capital sentence appear to me to be too remote to be sound, and it was pointed out in Nga Tet Kyu v. Emperor (2) that when the discretion as to punishment is vested in the Judge, it is his duty to exercise it and not to compel the executive Government to interfere by way of remission. The sentence of death is very appropriately imposed in cases where from motives of revenge, anger or the like a person causes death by such means as make it clear that it was his intention that his victim should not escape. In the case of appellants 2 and 3 the same remarks apply, with this qualification that they were probably acting under the instructions and influence of appellant 1 and that they had not the same means as he had of judging of the effect of their acts. I think however that in treating the deceased woman as the evidence shows they did treat her, the woman herself being elderly and weakly, they must have known that they were likely to cause death. The convictions and sentences are set aside, and in lieu thereof, appellant 1, Po Tye, is convicted of an offence punishable under S. 301, I. P. C., part 2, and Nga Po Tye sentenced to undergo transportation for seven years. Nga Shwe Pyan and Nga Pyaing are convicted of an offence punishable under S. 304, I. P. C., part 2, and sentenced to undergo two years' rigorous imprisonment each.

Second Appeal No. 41 of 1916, Decided on 15th September 1916.

Civil P. C. (1908), O. 47, R. 4 (2) (b)—Provisions of O. 47, should be strictly construed.

The provisions of O. 47, Civil P. C., should be strictly construed, and no application for review of judgment on the ground of discovery of new matter or evidence which was not within the knowledge of the applicant or could not be adduced by him at the first trial should not be granted without strict proof of such discovery. (P. 24 C. 1)

In Favour of Appellants.

C. G. N. P. C.—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The plaintiffs sued to obtain a share in certain land which they claimed formed an undivided estate. Their claim was resisted on the ground that the land was joint family property. The plaintiffs' suit was dismissed in regard to two out of three pieces of land. The plaintiffs then applied for a review on the ground that they had discovered new evidence to prove that the lands were joint family property. This evidence consisted of copies of settlement registers and maps. Notice was issued to the defendants who objected to the application which was, however, granted, and the Court, admitting this evidence, proceeded to give the plaintiffs decrees as prayed for. On appeal to the District Court the defendants objected to the admission of the application for review. The District Court, however, dismissed the appeal and the defendants, or three of them, now come to this Court in second appeal under S. 100, Civil P. C.

It was a ground of appeal in the District Court, as it is a ground here, and as it was a ground of the defendant's objection to the review, that there was no reason why the evidence which the plaintiffs sought to produce after judgment had been delivered should not have been produced in the first instance. To this there appears to be no answer. Settlement maps and registers are public documents the existence of which is known to every one, and a careful litigant would certainly examine these registers and maps before embarking on litigation. O. 47, R. 4 (2) (b), expressly lays down that no application for review shall be granted on the ground of discovery of new matter or evidence which the applicant alleges was not within his knowledge, or could not be adduced by him when the decree or order was passed or made, without strict proof of such allegation. There was here, not merely no strict proof of such allegations; there was no proof whatever; there was not even an affidavit. No witnesses were examined and the Judge was clearly committing a very serious illegality in admitting the application for review in defiance of the provisions of O. 47, R. 4. It is necessary that the provisions of O. 47, should be strictly construed, and that parties should not be at liberty to make up, at any time, for indolence or carelessness before coming to Court, by putting in evidence after judgment which they might have put in, if they had exercised due diligence, at the trial. The order allowing the review was clearly an improper order and must be set aside. There was, in the absence of the evidence adduced, no evidence to justify a decree in respect to two pieces of the land and the original decree of the Township Court must be restored with costs throughout.

Civil P. C. (1908), O. 21, R. 90 and O. 43, R. 1—Order dismissing application to set aside sale is not decree—Appeal against order of District Judge lies to Divisional Court—Upper Burma Civil Courts Regulation (1896), S. 12 (3).

An order dismissing an application to set aside a sale under O. 21, R. 90, Civil P. C., is not a "decree" and therefore an appeal against such an order of the District Court lies to the Divisional Court, even in cases in which the value of the subject-matter is above Rs. 10,000. [P 28 C 2]

H. M. Lutter—for Appellant.C. G. S. Pillay—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The respondent in execution of a decree for over Rs. 56,000 against the appellant had two oil wells sold. The appellant applied under O. 21, R. 90, to have the sale set aside on the ground of material irregularity. The District Court set aside the sale of one well but confirmed the sale of the other. Against that order the appellant has appealed to this Court. I think it is clear that the appeal lies to the Divisional Court. S. 12 (13), Upper Burma Civil Courts Regulation, runs:

"An appeal from a decree of a District Court shall, when the value of the suit in such Court is Rs. 10,000 or upwards, lie to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner and in any other case to the Divisional Court. . . ."

Thus it is only appeals against decrees that lie to this Court. The order appealed against, though it relates to the execution of a decree in a matter arising between the parties, is not a decree because an appeal lies against it, is an appeal against an order S. 2 (2), Civil P. C. under O. 43, R. (1) (j). The appeal therefore lies to the Divisional Court. Reliance is placed on Civil Appeal No. 74 of 1916 between the same parties which related to the execution of the same decree, which was entertained by the learned Judicial Commissioner, but in that case the order appealed against was passed under O. 21, R. 83, and an appeal did not lie as an appeal against an order and therefore, the order was a decree. The memorandum of appeal is returned for presentation to the Divisional Court. The appellant will pay the respondent's costs in this Court.

Second Appeal No. 220 of 1916, Decided on 19th March 1917.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 80—Suit against clerk for recovery of money lost through his carelessness—Suit cannot be instituted without notice under S. 80.

Plaintiffs sued defendant, the Bench Clerk of a Subdivisional Judge, for the recovery of a sum of money which they alleged had been lost through his carelessness in losing or concealing an application for the execution of a decree, which became time-barred through the loss:

Held: that the suit could not be instituted without giving the defendant a notice under S. 80 Civil P. C. [P 30 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 2 (2)—"Adjudication"—Meaning of.

The adjudication referred to in the definition of a decree in S. 2 (2), Civil P. C., is an adjudication granting or refusing any of the reliefs claimed in the plaint and embodied in a formal declaration. [P 29 C 2]

(c) Civil P. C. (1908), Ss. 80 and 97—Decision that notice under S. 80 is necessary before institution of suit does not necessarily amount to preliminary decree.

The decision in a suit that a notice under S. 80 Civil P. C., was necessary before the institution of the suit does not amount to a preliminary decree, where the plaintiff alleges that he has given notice, and the decision is not therefore appealable. [P. 30 C. 1]

C. G. S. Pillay—for Appellants.

S. Mukerjee—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The respondent, Maung Gyi, was the Bench Clerk of the Subdivisional Judge, Yamethin. The appellants sued him for the recovery of a sum of money they alleged they had lost through his carelessness in losing or concealing an application for an execution of a decree, which became time barred through the loss. They asserted in the plaint that about 10th February 1915 they sent the defendant, Maung Gyi, a notice under S. 80, Civil P. C., but denied that any notice was necessary. The receipt of the notice was not admitted, and a preliminary issue was fixed as to whether such notice was necessary or not. The Subdivisional Judge decided that it was and on appeal the decision was upheld. The date of the decision of the Subdivisional Judge was the 19th January, and the 7th February was fixed for the hearing of evidence. On the 5th February, the appeal was filed and was decided the same day. On the 7th, the appellant failed to produce any evidence and their suit was dismissed under O. 17, R. 3. The final order was one rejecting the plaint under O. 7, R. 11 (d). The rule did not apply to the case, as there was no statement in the plaint from which it appeared that the suit was barred by law. The District Court dismissed the appeal. In his judgment the District Judge pointed out that O. 17, R. 3, had no application to the case as the hearing had not been adjourned at the instance of the appellants, but at the same time he said that the appellants had no valid excuse for not producing their evidence on the date fixed for hearing.

The appellants appeal to this Court on the ground that there has been a substantial error in the procedure of the Subdivisional Court in not granting an adjournment on payment of costs for the issue of subpoenas to their witnesses after the dismissal of the appeal on the 5th February. Two other points have been argued at the hearing: (1) whether notice was necessary to Maung Gyi under S. 80,

Civil P. C., and (2) whether the lower appellate Court had power to decide the point, as the decision of the preliminary issue was not, it is contended, a decree. As regards the latter points, I am of opinion that the lower appellate Court erred in entertaining the first appeal. Decree is defined in S. 2 (2), Civil P. C., as the formal expression of an adjudication which, so far as regards the Court expressing it, conclusively determines the rights of the parties with regard to all or any of the matters in controversy in the suit, and the decree may be either preliminary or final. In the present case there was no formal expression of adjudication, and none was ever asked for and refused. Undoubtedly if the expression "matters in controversy" be interpreted in its widest sense, it would include every question in dispute between the parties. The result of such an interpretation would be that the parties would be bound to appeal under S. 97 of the Code against every issue that was decided against them in the course of the trial, and litigation would be prolonged indefinitely. O. 15, R. 3, provides that where the parties are at issue on some question of law or fact and issues have been framed, if the Court is satisfied that no further argument or evidence than the parties can at once adduce is required upon such of the issues as may be sufficient for the decision of the suit, the Court may proceed to determine such issues, and if the finding thereon is sufficient for the decision, may pronounce judgment accordingly whether the summons has been issued for the settlement of issues only, or the final disposal of the case, provided that where the summons has been issued for the settlement of issues only, the parties or their pleaders are present and none of them objects.

Under S. 33, a decree must follow on the judgment. A decree of this kind may be either a final or preliminary decree: it is based on some preliminary point or points that are held to govern the whole case. Besides this O. 21, Rr. 12-18, specify cases where a preliminary decree can be passed. If these provisions are borne in mind, it will be seen that the adjudication referred to in the definition of a decree is an adjudication granting or refusing any of the reliefs claimed in the plaint, and embodied in a formal declaration. All that the decision of the Subdivisional Judge amounted to was to declare that the notice was necessary. The appellants said that notice had been given, and an appeal against the Subdivisional Judge's decision was clearly premature.

With reference to the necessity of notice, I have no doubt that the Courts below were right in affirming it. Maung Gyi is a public officer and he received the application for execution in that capacity. In the absence of the Judge, para. 554, Upper Burma Courts Manual, provides that application shall be received by a clerk, whose duty it is to note on the application the date of receipt. There is certainly no proof on the record that notice was ever sent to Maung Gyi of the suit. The question is whether the lower Courts were right in dismissing the suit without giving the appellants a further opportunity for calling evidence. The only excuse given for failing to apply for summonses for witnesses is that the plaintiffs-appellants were appealing to the District Court. They did not ask the Subdivisional Judge to stay the case pending the result of the appeal, which was only filed two days before the case came on for hearing and was summarily rejected. I am of opinion that the excuse was a very weak one and that the appellants ought to have had their witnesses in attendance. They had ample time for applying for the issue of summonses. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

quently no second appeal lies in respect of it: 19 Cal 683 (P C) and 26 Cal 539, Expt.

C. G. S. Pillay—for Appellant.

J. C. Chatterjee—for Respondents.

Judgment.—At a sale in execution of a decree the appellant purchased certain land. The decree-holders applied to have the sale set aside on the ground of material irregularity in conducting it. Their application having been dismissed, they appealed unsuccessfully to the District Court and then appealed to this Court. The appeal was admitted and heard and the case was remanded under O. 41, R. 23, read with O. 42 as the allegations of material irregularity had not been enquired into. The Township Judge then enquired into these allegations and again dismissed the application. The decree-holders appealed and the District Court directed the sale to be set aside. The auction-purchaser has now come to this Court in second appeal and a preliminary objection has been taken that a second appeal does not lie, as the appeal to the lower appellate Court lay under O. 43, R. 1 (j), Civil P. C. For the appellant it is urged that the matter in dispute related to the execution of a decree and arose between the decree-holders and the representative of the judgment-debtor and, therefore, came under S. 47, Civil P. C., and that consequently a second appeal lies. Reliance is placed on Prosunno Kumar Sanyal v. Kali Das Sanyal (1) and on Hira Lal Ghose v. Chundra Kanto Ghose (2). At first sight it looks as if there were some inconsistency in the Civil Procedure Code, but if the matter be gone into the apparent inconsistency disappears. In the first case cited above a suit was brought to set aside a sale on the ground of fraud, and it was held that the matter fell under S. 244 of the Code of 1882 and that a separate suit did not lie. In the second case an application was made to have a sale set aside on the ground of fraud and material irregularity in conducting the sale, and it was held that as the matter came under S. 244 of the Code of 1882, a second appeal did lie.

The judgment of Banerjee, J., in the latter case is illuminating. He held that a second appeal lay because the grounds on which it was desired to have the sale set-aside were not entirely comprised in S. 311 of the Code of 1882, inasmuch as fraud was alleged—it is to be noted that the words "or fraud" in O. 21, R. 90, are new—and that, therefore, as part of the order did not fall under S. 588 but did come under S. 244 it was a decree and a second appeal lay. In the present case the application was to have the suit set aside on the ground of material irregularity in conducting it and fell under O. 21, R. 90, and an appeal lay to the lower appellate Court under O. 43, R. 1 (j). It undoubtedly was a matter relating to the execution and satisfaction of a decree and it arose between the decree-holders and the representative of the judgment-debtor. The order passed, therefore, came under S. 47, Civil P. C., but nevertheless it was not a decree. In S. 2, a decree is said to include the determination of any question within S. 47 but not to include any adjudication from which an appeal lies as an appeal from an order. It is necessary to read this definition so as to exclude inconsistency and, therefore, it must be read as declaring that a decree includes the determination of any question within S. 47, Civil P. C., except a determination against which an appeal lies as an appeal from an order. The definition in the Code of 1882 runs as follows:

"Decree means the formal expression of an adjudication upon any right claimed or defence set up, in a civil Court, when such an adjudication, so far as regards the Court expressing it, decides the suit or appeal. An order rejecting a plaint, or directing accounts to be taken, or determining any question as referred to in S. 211, but not specified in S. 588, is within this definition; an order specified in S. 588 is not within this definition."

It was thus clearly laid down that all orders that came within the wording of S. 244 were not decrees and though the language used in the present Code is not the same, I do not think there has been any change in the law in this respect. In the present case the order of the Township Judge, though it fell under S. 47, Civil P. C., was appealable as an order and was, therefore, not a decree, and consequently a second appeal does not lie. It has been suggested that the memorandum of appeal should be taken as an application for revision, but none of the grounds are good grounds for revision. The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Stamp Act (1879), S. 35—Sut to set aside award—Award not duly stamped—Plaintiff is not liable to pay deficiency and penalty.

In a suit to have an award set aside on the ground of the misconduct of the arbitrators, the plaintiff cannot be called upon (1) to prove that the award is not duly stamped, to make up the deficiency, in the stamp and to pay the penalty under S. 35, Stamp Act, nor (2) as in such a case the plaintiff is entitled not to accept the award, but to prevent its being acted upon, and if the allegations of misconduct can be proved without leading into the award, the award is not sought to be put in evidence; Cheppel v. Bowser (1889) 4 M. & W. 361, 362 (Ct. Q. B.).

J. C. Chatterjee—for Appellant.

J. C. Mukerjee—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The plaintiff-appellant brought a suit to have an award set aside on the ground of misconduct of the arbitrators. The award was stamped with Rs. 5 and the learned District Judge directed the plaintiff-appellant to pay deficient stamp duty and penalty amounting in all to Rs. 2,532-5-0, as the award directed partition of property. As she failed to pay this sum her suit was dismissed. I think the learned District Judge was clearly wrong. The award could of course not be acted upon unless stamp duty and penalty were paid, but the plaintiff-appellant did not want it acted upon; it was to prevent its being acted upon that she went into Court. Again it could not be admitted in evidence without stamp duty and penalty being paid, but of what could it be evidence? It could only be evidence of the decision of the arbitrators. The plaintiff-appellant did not necessarily want to prove that. She alleged that the arbitrators had taken Rs. 1,000 from the defendants-respondents as arbitration fees. That amounted to an allegation of corruption. Again she alleged that they had not examined her witnesses. If she proved these two things, that might be a sufficient reason for setting aside the award, whatever the contents of the award might be, and it would not be necessary for the District Judge even to see what those contents were. Thus she might succeed without the award being put in evidence at all. On the other hand the putting of the award in evidence might be vital for the defendants respondents' case and then it would be for them to pay the stamp duty and penalty.

"The object of both the Statute and Common law would be defeated, if a contract, void in itself, could not be impeached, because the written evidence of it is unstamped, and, therefore, inadmissible. If that were so a party entering into such agreement might avoid the consequences of its illegality, by taking care that no stamp should be affixed to it. I think, therefore, that in all cases where the question is whether the agreement is void at Common law or by Statute, and the party introduces it, not to set it up and establish it, but to destroy it altogether, there is no objection to its admissibility": Coppock v. Bower (1).

The decree of the District Court is reversed and the suit is remanded under O. 41, R. 23, for a decision on the merits. Costs of this appeal will abide the final result. The plaintiff-appellant will be given a certificate under S. 13, Court-fees Act.

If a Judge is of opinion that an application under O. 21, R. 58 (1), has been designedly or unnecessarily delayed he may refuse an investigation, but if he makes an investigation he is bound to pass orders under O. 21, R. 60, or under O. 21, R. 61, Civil P. C., and the dismissal of the application on the ground of delay after investigation has been made is illegal.

S. Mukerjee—for Applicant.

C. G. S. Pillay—for Opposite Parties.

Judgment.—The Township Judge, after holding an investigation under O. 21, R. 58, and reviewing the evidence, dismissed the application without coming to any finding, on the ground that it had been made too late. Considering the circumstances of the case it certainly could not be said that the application had been designedly delayed and I should feel inclined to construe the word "unnecessarily" in the proviso to O. 21, R. 58 (1), in a generous way. Be that as it may, if the Township Judge had only read this proviso, he would have seen that it did not apply because the investigation had already been made. If a Judge is of opinion that an application under O. 21, R. 58 (1), has been designedly or unnecessarily delayed he may refuse an investigation, but if he makes an investigation he is bound to pass orders under O. 21, R. 60, or under 21, R. 61, Civil P. C., and the dismissal of the application on the ground of delay after the investigation had been made was illegal.

On behalf of the respondent it has been suggested that the investigation should have been made by the Subdivisional Court, but it is clear from O. 21, R. 52, that it is the Court which has custody of the property and not the attaching Court that has to make the investigation. The order of the Township Court is set aside and the application is remanded to that Court in order that it may be disposed of according to law. There will be no order as to costs, as the respondent was not responsible for the mistake made.

R. K. Banerjee—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The plaintiff-respondent sued to redeem a house and ground which she had mortgaged to the defendant-appellant for Rs. 50. The latter pleaded that a clause in the mortgage-deed gave him the right to obtain a mutation of names in the Town Lots office if the mortgage-money and interest were not paid within five months, that he had done so and the property had become his. The plaintiff-respondent alleged that she had made one tender to the defendant-appellant's wife and one to his advocate and that the money had not been accepted. The defendant-appellant denied both tenders.

The learned District Judge held that the contract could not execute itself and that plaintiff-respondent was entitled to redeem. He found that the plaintiff-respondent had tendered the money due to the defendant-appellant's wife four months after the execution of the mortgage-deed and held that defendant-appellant was not entitled to interest after that date. He gave plaintiff-respondent a decree, permitting her to redeem the property for Rs. 51 erroneously calculating the interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. It is now contended that the mortgage was an anomalous one, that the parties are therefore bound by its terms and that in accordance with one of them the property had become the defendant-appellant's. This condition runs as follows:

"When five months have elapsed if the principal and interest be not paid and the property redeemed, let the creditor go with this mortgage-bond to the Town Lots Office and effect a mutation of names and take the property as his absolutely."

Nga Kyaw v. Nga Yu Nut (1) was a very similar case. It was there held that such a contract was not intended to execute itself and that a further transaction was necessary before the land could become the property of the mortgagees. But it is contended that the language used in the document in that case differs from that used in the present case and that it was because of the words "if . . . we fail to redeem, we will make over outright" that it was held that a further transaction was necessary, whereas in the present case nothing remained to be done by the mortgagor. I am unable to accept this view.

I think it is clear that S. 98, T. P. Act, must be read subject to S. 60. It is one of the last sections in Ch. 4, in which the rights and liabilities of the parties to the different kinds of mortgages described in S. 58 are laid down, and enacts that when a mortgage does not come within the definitions of those mortgages and is not a combination of the 1st and 3rd kinds or of 2nd and 3rd, then the rights and liabilities of the parties must be determined by the contract itself. This does not, in my opinion, take anomalous mortgages out of the operation of S. 60, which occur at the beginning of the chapter and is clearly meant to apply to all mortgages. The following passage from Gour's Law of Transfer in British India, Ed. 3, p. 729, is illuminating:

"In the Civil Law the debtor was allowed to redeem the estate on payment of his debt at any time before the sentence passed, and this right he exercised in spite of a covenant to the contrary expressly made in the deed. The Civil Law always looked at the substance of the transaction, and argued that since by mortgage the property is conveyed by way of security for the loan, the creditor was not entitled to the property, if the debtor could otherwise pay off his debt. But this view was foreign to the English Common Law, which rigidly enforced the covenant for forfeiture on breach of the condition. Following, however, the principles of the Civil Law, the Courts of Equity readily recognized the severity of literally enforcing mortgage contracts. But while the debtors had the power to strike at the rigour of the law, the Courts of Equity in England possessed no such powers. On the other hand, they professed to follow the law whilst mitigating its evils, and so in England, while holding that on breach of the condition the mortgagee had the legal estate, still as it was unreasonable that he should retain for his own benefit what was intended as a mere security, they allowed the mortgagor to redeem on payment of the mortgage money and costs, notwithstanding the forfeiture at law. And this right, which was the creature of equity and the object of its solicitude, came to be designated the equity of redemption. Indeed, to the Judges of Common Law, it was an innovation which they struggled hard to oppose, but the Courts of Equity justified its intervention on the ground that the clause as to forfeiture was in the nature of a penalty which should be relieved against."

I think there can be no doubt that the legislature deliberately embodied this equitable principle in S. 60, T. P. Act, and as it is an equitable principle, Courts of equity are bound to follow it even where the Transfer of Property Act is not in force. The principle is that, however the mortgage-bond be worded, the right to redeem cannot be extinguished except by an order of the Court or an act of the parties; i. e., an act subsequent to the mortgage. In Bapuji Apaji v. Senawaraji Harvadi (2) it was explained that the rule "once a mortgage always a mortgage" meant that an estate could not at one time be a mortgage and at another time cease to be so by one and the same deed. In Kanaran v. Kutooly (3) it was held that a stipulation in a mortgage that if the mortgage money were not paid on the due date the mortgagor would sell the property to the mortgagee at a price to be fixed by an umpire, was unenforceable as constituting a fetter on the equity of redemption. In Kanhayalal v. Narhar (4) Chandavarkar, J., said :

"The law is well established that, though once a mortgage always a mortgage and no clog can be placed by the mortgagee on the mortgagor's equity of redemption, it is open to both of them to enter into a contract subsequent to the mortgage for the sale of the mortgaged property to the mortgagee."

but though the District Judge had held that there had been a subsequent transaction, which the parties had for years treated as a sale, it was held that the right to redeem had not been extinguished because the parties had acted under the mistaken belief that the forfeiture clause was enforceable and their conduct had not been the consequence of a transaction independent of the mortgage. Several other rulings could be cited to the same effect. It is obvious, therefore, that if a forfeiture clause turned a simple mortgage into an anomalous one, it would still be subject to the equitable rule contained in S. 60, T. P. Act; but I am of opinion that the mere insertion of a forfeiture clause in a mortgage-bond does not make the mortgage anomalous, the forfeiture clause is merely of no effect. The plaintiff-respondent is, therefore, entitled to redeem. The learned District Judge held that the defendant-appellant was entitled to interest for four months only because the plaintiff respondent at the end of that time had tendered payment to defendant-appellant's wife. Apart from the question whether she could be considered her husband's agent—they are ponnas—the tender, if made, could have no effect because the bond provided for a mortgage to last five months and so the money had not yet become payable. The plaintiff-respondent also alleged a tender to defendant-appellant's Advocate two months before the institution of the suit. There is one witness on her side who deposes to this tender, but the Advocate, called as a witness by defendant-appellant, denied it and stated that the plaintiff-respondent had asked for time. There is nothing to show which of the two spoke the truth, and I must decide that the tender is not proved. The interest due up to the institution of the suit is Rs 39-6-4. The plaintiff-respondent could have saved further interest by depositing the redemption money in Court. As she did not do so she will pay interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum from the institution of the suit to the date of payment. The decree of the District Court is modified accordingly. There will be no order as to the costs of this appeal.

C. G. S. and L. Pillay—for Appellants.

H. M. Lutter—for the Crown.

Judgment.—Nga San Nyein, Nga Ngwe Zin, Nga Kyi Byu, Nga Hime, Nga San Byaw, Nga Shin, Nga Yan Nyein, Nga Po Min, Nga Thu Daw and Nga Tet Si have all been convicted by the Sessions Judge, Magwe, of committing dacoity with murder at Kyaungyagan on the 19th September last and with the exception of Nga Tet Si had been sentenced to death. There is no doubt whatever that a dacoity was committed in the course of which Maung Nyi Maung was killed by some of the dacoits. The evidence shows that late at night, six or seven men came armed with daks, sticks and a tube gun to the house of Maung Shwe Daik. They demanded money and some of them called out that they had caught one of the inmates of the house. Thereupon San Kwin and Nyi Maung attacked the dacoits with daks. Both of them were wounded and Nyi Maung died three days later in the Yenangyaung hospital. The fight took place whilst the dacoits were still near the house of Shwe Daik and not whilst they were retreating after abandoning their attempt to commit the robbery. S. 396 clearly applies to the case. San Kwin and Nyi Maung were justified by the right of private defence in attacking the dacoits, who were not justified by the provocation thus given in killing Nyi Maung. Nyi Maung was cut several times with a dah, one of the wounds being a severe one on the back, and there can be no doubt that in causing his death, his assailants committed murder. San Kwin wounded one of the dacoits on the head. The dacoits left behind them Exs. 1—7, of which the most important are a pawa with a dah-cut and some human hair, and three sticks of dahat wood. The wounded dacoit managed to escape. Nga San Nyein was found wounded after the dacoity, and his wounds correspond in respect of position and age with those of the man attacked by San Kwin.

The rest of the evidence in the case is found in five confessions, all of which have been retracted in Court. The evidence of corroborations is of very little or no value, and except in the case of San Nyein, the convictions rest upon the credit to be given to the confessions. The Sessions Judge believed that the confessions were voluntary and were true. He failed to consider whether confessions of co-accused persons are proper material upon which to base a conviction unless they are corroborated in material particulars and as regards the identity of the persons alleged to be concerned in the crime. In Emperor v. Kehri (1) it was held that a retracted confession may be taken into consideration against co-accused persons, and although corroborative evidence may be necessary, it is not necessary that such evidence should be by itself sufficient to support a conviction. Richards, J., said that he could see no reason why a Court could not legally convict an accused person on the unsupported confession of a co-accused. He remarked that at the same time it is very seldom that a Court ought to convict on such unsupported evidence. In Gangapa Kardepa v. Emperor (2) Heaton, J., thought that the confessions of seven co-accused, who had independently implicated four others, was a sufficient basis for supporting the convictions of these four men, and he referred to Illus (b), S. 114, Evidence Act, as affording precisely the kind of corroboration which in certain circumstances is a sound foundation for belief. This view was not, however, accepted by two other learned Judges of the same Court, who held that it was a rule followed in all the High Courts in India that a conviction founded solely on the confession of a co-accused could not be sustained. They also held that Illus. (b), S. 114, Evidence Act, only applies to the testimony of an accomplice. An examination of the authorities leaves no doubt in my mind that the decision of the majority of the learned Judges in Gangapa Kardepa's case (2) is correct: Queen v. Jaffir Ali (3), Queen v. Naga (4), Queen-Empress v. Dosa Jiva (5), Queen-Empress v. Khandia (6), Queen-Empress v. Ram Saran (7), Queen-Empress v. Nirmal Dai (8), Giddigadu, In re (9), Empress v. Ashootosh Chuckerbutty (10), Yasin v. King-Emperor (11). In Queen v. Sadhu Mundul (12). Phear, J., said:

"It is true that the instance of corroboration which is appended to Illu. (b), of S. 114, Evidence Act, . . . is corroboration to be found in accounts of an occurrence given by the accomplices; but it is noticeable that the legislature . . . makes it a condition . . . that these accomplices should have been 'captured on the spot and kept apart from each other' and . . . there is not the slightest indication that the legislature intended in this passage by the terms 'accounts given by the accomplices' anything other than accounts given in due course of examination as witnesses."

Section 133, Evidence Act, modifies the general rule laid down in S. 114, but it clearly refers only to accomplices who have been examined as witnesses. The result of the decisions cited above appears to be that the confession of a co-accused person is not the same thing as the testimony of an accomplice and stands on a different footing. It may be taken into consideration as lending support to other evidence in the case. But if there is no other evidence, it is not a proper basis for a conviction. It is not strengthened by the fact that it is supported by the other confessions, whether these have been made in such circumstances as to preclude the theory that there has been connivance between the persons making the confessions or not. Mr. Lutter, who has appeared in this Court for many years, informs me that it has been the rule not to uphold convictions based merely on the confessions of co-accused persons. He is not prepared to support the convictions of Yan Nyein, Po Min, San Byaw or Nga Shin. These convictions rest entirely on the retracted confessions of other appellants, and are set aside. Nga San Nyein, Nga Po Min, Nga San Byaw and Nga Shin are acquitted and will be set at liberty. San Nyein, Yan Nyein and Po Min belong to Kyunbosan village, whilst San Byaw, Nga Shin and Nga Hma come from Kyetthaukkwin. Maung Shwe Ge is headman of Kyunbosan. Yan Nyein and Po Min are his sons, San Byaw and Nga Shin are brothers and his nephews; whilst San Nyein is another nephew.

San Nyein disappeared after the dacoity, and was induced to surrender by Shwe Ge, who seems to have been chiefly instrumental in detecting this case. Maung Chet, a cousin of San Nyein, said in the committing Magistrate's Court that Shwe Ge mentioned the names of all the appellants to him before San Nyein was arrested, but this piece of evidence was not elicited in the Sessions Court, and Shwe Ge was not questioned about it in either Court. Maung Chet also told the committing Magistrate that Shwe Ge was very anxious and asked him to help him with reference to his sons and nephews, but this important statement was also overlooked in the Sessions Court. San Nyein was arrested on the 7th October, and confessed to his uncle, to Maung Chet, Maung Hmo and the Kama headman Tun Tin. He implicated Ngwe Zin, Thu Daw, Tet Si, Kyi Byu and Nga Hle.

He described Nga Hle as a villager of Magyi-yo. The other four men all come from Yeson village. Thu Daw probably is the father of Tet Si, but this relationship has not been clearly ascertained and the conjecture of its existence rests upon the headings of the examination forms. On the 8th, San Nyein confessed to a Magistrate and stated that he did so as he had no chance of escape. In that confession he suppresses all mention of the visit to Kyetthaukkwin village by the members of the gang and he puts the gun in the hands of Ngwe Zin. He also says there were six men concerned. As the other four were all relatives, his reason for silence is obvious. There can be no doubt that this confession is a voluntary one. San Nyein was wounded, and the explanation now put forward by him of the way he received those wounds is incredible. They are the kind of wounds that one man would receive when fighting with another. The evidence of his identification of his own pawa at the Police Station is inadmissible and should not have been recorded, as it is excluded by S. 25, Evidence Act. The evidence as to his pointing out the place where sticks were cut is of no value. The sticks found at the scene of crime did not correspond with the stumps. There can be no doubt about San Nyein being one of the dacoits, and he has been rightly convicted.

Thu Daw and Ngwe Zin were arrested on the 8th October but did not admit their guilt. On the 13th Kyi Byu was arrested and he confessed the next day. He said that his motive for confessing was that he knew that he could not escape from the police and San Nyein had already confessed. Prior to this he had confessed to Tun Tin, who says that he named the Yeson men, San Nyein, Yan Nyein, Po Min, San Byaw, Nga Hmo and Nga Shin. Maung Hmo was also present at the confession. In the committing Magistrate's Court he said that Kyi Byu named all the accused, but in the Sessions Court he said that he implicated the Yeson men and Nga Shin. He was not asked to explain the differences between his two statements. He is related to Shwe Go on his wife's side and he may have intentionally suppressed some names in the Sessions Court. In his confession before the the Magistrate Kyi Byu mentions Nga Shin, San Nyein, Tot Si, Thu Daw, Ngwe Zin and three unknown men from Kyotthaukkwin, and says that ten men were concerned in the dacoity. He has retracted his confession which he declares was made under ill-treatment by the police. There is not the slightest reason to suppose that he was in any way ill-treated. He denied that he ever confessed to the village headman. The evidence against Kyi Byu consists solely of these retracted confessions, with such support as they derive from other confessions. The law relating to retracted confessions was fully discussed in Chit Tun v. Crown (12), and I adopt the conclusions of the learned Judges of the Chief Court in that case. The weight to be given to such confessions depends on the circumstances under which they were made and on the intrinsic credibility of the confessions. In my experience confessions in Burma are seldom the result of physical ill-treatment by the police.

Sometimes the person confessing is under police surveillance and is induced to confess under threat of prosecution coupled with a promise that if he confesses, he will be given a pardon. Sometimes the police have a certain amount of evidence against the man and induce him to confess under a similar promise. Relatives are not infrequently called in to persuade him that it will be better for him to confess. Others confess in the hope that they will derive some benefit from doing so and will be less severely punished. Some confessions are made out of resentment against those who have already confessed and with a view of securing their punishment, whatever may happen to the person confessing. Not infrequently confessions are due to a belief that everything is lost, and that the result of deeds in a former state of existence has brought the prisoner into peril. He succumbs to his ill-luck and does not attempt to fight against it. It is not possible to enumerate exhaustively all the motives that may lead to a confession but the present case seems to afford illustrations of the motives just suggested. I have no doubt that Kyi Byu's confession was due to a feeling that he could not escape from punishment, and that he might as well yield to his fate. He gave himself up to the headman, and has entirely failed to explain why he did so, if he was not concerned in the crime. I am of opinion that the confession is substantially true, so far as the part played by him in the crime is concerned, although for some reason he has concealed the names of some of his companions. He has been rightly convicted.

The day after Kyi Byu confessed, both Thu Daw and Ngwe Zin, who had been in the same lock-up, confessed. They had been in police custody for a week. Thu Daw was closely examined by the Magistrate about his reasons for confessing. He said that his mind was in a state of confusion or bewilderment, that he knew he would not escape punishment, and although he was afraid, he could not avoid what he could not keep to himself, and he felt himself, unsafe. Nga Zin said that he knew he would be punished, but he wanted all who had taken part in the dacoity to be punished. He was asked why he had delayed and said that he had been considering the matter and wondering whether, if he spoke out, the wives and children of the others concerned would be oppressed or put to trouble. He probably meant to say that he felt a certain amount of sympathy with them. Both men now say that they were ill-treated by the police. There is not the slightest reason for believing this assertion. They both come from the same village as Kyi Byu and are neighbours. The fact that both confessions were made the day after Kyi Byu confessed is very significant.

The men were all confined in the same police station, and Kyi Byu had mentioned the names of Ngwe Zin and Thu Daw. It was pointed out in Queen-Empress v. Basvanta (14) that the law in India is not identical with that in England on the relevancy and admissibility of confessions. In England if there is any doubt about the admissibility of a confession it has to be proved to be free and voluntary. In India the question to be decided is whether the confession appears to have been induced by any of the means mentioned in S. 24, Evidence Act. There are no grounds for supposing that the confessions of Thu Daw and Ngwe Zin were induced by any of those means. They are, therefore, admissible and the only question is whether they are credible. There is very little corroboration. Chit Po says that he saw Ngwe Zin and Tet Si leave the village of Yeson about sunset on the day the dacoity was committed. Maung Kaung says he saw Ngwe Zin leave the gate alone. Ma Kaw states that So Pe told her that he saw blood on Thu Daw's jacket on the night of the dacoity. So Pe and Maung Hla depose to having seen the blood, which Thu Daw told them was fowl's blood. There is nothing to show what the nature of the blood was. This evidence does not corroborate any of the incidents mentioned in the confessions.

The prosecution must, therefore, fall back on the inherent credibility of the confessions as sufficient ground for the conviction. The motive for the confessions of Ngwe Zin and Thu Daw seems to me clearly to lie in the fear and annoyance caused by the fact that Kyi Byu had confessed and implicated them. The Sessions Judge remarks that the five confessions in the case differ considerably in the details of the going and coming of the dacoits and the course of the dacoity. But he thought that in spite of these differences, they were correct and true. The greatest differences are between San Nyein's confession and those of the other four men. There are strong reasons for thinking that San Nyein has suppressed much of what he knew to shield his friends, if they were concerned. If the confessions of the other four men are compared carefully, there are no serious discrepancies in the accounts given. Nga Hme says that San Byaw had one of the guns when he went into the village, and others say that Nga Shin had it.

The gun may have passed from one hand to another. I have carefully considered whether the confessions were the result of police tuition and I think it impossible to believe that they were. The Kyetthaukkwin men were arrested on the confession of Ngwe Zin. It is very unlikely that the names of these men were inserted at the suggestion of any police officer. Four of them were close relatives of Shwe Ge, who had assisted the Police to detect the case. There is no reason why the Police should wish for the gang to be enlarged. If the Kyetthaukkwin and Kyunbosan men were included in the members of the gang as an afterthought, it must have been due to the wish of Kyi Byu, Thu Daw and Ngwe Zin to revenge themselves on Shwe Ge. Kyi Byu only mentions one of the men by name, and Thu Daw only knew two men. If Thu Daw and Ngwe Zin had conspired to confess out of revenge, Thu Daw would probably have mentioned the same names of the Kyetthaukkwin-Kyunbosan party as Ngwe Zin did. But the theory becomes still more difficult to believe when Nga Hme's confession is taken into consideration. He comes from Kyetthaukkwin (Wetchok is the same village) and was only in police custody for half a day at Yenangyaung before he confessed. He admits that he was kept away from the other men in the lock-up. His confession therefore was not the result of conference with Thu Daw or Ngwe Zin, and he had no reason whatever for implicating his fellow villagers. He is also known as Hnget Kyi, by which name he was mentioned in Ngwe Zin's confession. He states that he was taught what to say by Min Gyaw, a Sergeant of Police. He was in the charge of the headman after arrest, and if there was tuition, the headman must have been aware of it. It seems to me impossible that any policeman could have taught Nga Hme so well in the short time before he confessed, that he, an ordinary Burman yokel, would have been able to give a detailed account of the crime and of the part played in it by ten men so as to make that account tally with Nga Zin's confession. His reason for confessing is that he thought he could not escape punishment. As was remarked in Chit Thun's case:

"It is not improbable that a person under arrest may think his fate is certain, and that the only hope for him lies in either obtaining a pardon or a less severe punishment by confession and implicating his fellow-criminals."

This motive is a common one amongst Burmans, who are much influenced by their belief in "kan" or the result of deeds in a former existence. After careful consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the Sessions Judge is right in believing that the confessions were substantially true as far as they affected those making them. Against Tet Si the only evidence is that of the confessing co-accused and that is an insufficient basis for a conviction. The conviction of Tet Si is set aside and he is acquitted. The Sessions Judge has sentenced the others to death. It was pointed out in Queen-Empress v. Nga Pyon Cho (15) that sentences of death should be passed in cases under S. 396, I. P. C., unless there are extenuating circumstances. The gang in this case went out armed with the two tube guns and dahs and the probability of some villager being killed must have been present to their minds. The persianity with which these offences are committed in Burma calls for the severest punishment. According to the confessions Nga Hme and Kyu Byu waited outside the village. They were keeping watch there and according to the map, were 125 yards from the house attacked. They are equally liable under S. 37, I. P. C., for the dacoity, and their mere presence at the actual scene of the crime is immaterial: Queen-Empress v. Teja (16). The alibis set up are so weak as not to require serious discussion. I dismiss the appeals of San Nyein, Ngwe Zin, Kyi Byu, Thu Daw and Nga Hme.

The manner in which the committing Magistrate has examined some of the accused is open to most serious objection. He has cross-examined them and asked such question as "If you did not commit the dacoity, who did?" It ought not to be necessary to point out that it was for the prosecution to prove who committed the crime. The object of examining an accused person is to afford him an opportunity of explaining away evidence against him. Each point appearing in evidence should be put to the accused and he should be invited to offer his explanation or comment on it. Anything in the nature of cross-examination should be avoided.

Civil Revn. No. 219 of 1916, Decided on 18th June 1917.

Army Act (44 and 45 Vict. C. 58), Ss. 136 and 144—Non commissioned officer is not "officer"—His pay is exempt from attachment—Civil P. C. (1908), O. 60 (1).

A non-commissioned officer is merely a soldier and is not an "officer" within the meaning of S. 136, Army Act, and therefore the pay of such officer is under S. 114 of the Act exempt from attachment in execution of a decree of a civil Court. [P 40 C 2]

M. H. Lutter—Amicus curiae.

Judgment.—This is a reference by the Township Judge, Bhamo, as to whether the pay of a non-commissioned officer in charge of the supply and transport, Bhamo, is liable to attachment in execution of a decree passed by the Court under its small cause Court jurisdiction. It is contended on behalf of the judgment-debtor that his pay is exempt from attachment under S. 144, Army Act (44 and 45 Vict., c. 58). Neither party has been represented by counsel at the hearing, but Mr. Lutter has kindly argued the case as amicus curiae. The proviso to S. 144, Army Act, runs as follows:

Provided that

(1) "Any person having cause of action or suit against a soldier of the regular forces may, notwithstanding anything in this section, after due notice in writing given to the soldier, or left at his last quarters, proceed in such action or suit to judgment and have execution other than against the person, pay, arms, ammunition, equipments, regimental necessities or clothing of such soldier . . ."

The section commences by exempting any soldier of His Majesty's forces from being taken out of the service by process execution or order of a Court of law, except in respect of a charge of or conviction for crimes or (b) debts, damages or money exceeding £30 over and above the costs of suit. The section then explains what is meant by a crime, a Court of law, and the method of proof of the debt, damages or money and declares that all proceedings in contravention of the section are void. The proviso contains an exception to the privileges conferred by the first four sub-clauses of the section, and although as pointed out in Murray & Co. v. Prins (1), the drafting of the section is open to criticism, I think there is no doubt that the pay of a soldier is exempt from attachment unless there is any other provision of law that is inconsistent with it and prevails. S. 136, Army Act, lays down that the pay of an officer or soldier should be paid without deduction other than the deductions authorized by the Act, etc., or by any law passed by the Governor-General in Council.

The last clause was added at the same time as S. 151 was repealed, which dealt with the way in which a civil Court could award execution against persons subject to military law other than soldiers. In Prins v. Murray & Co. (2) it was held that sub-S. 2, Cl. (b), S. 60, Civil P. C., does not amount to a declaration that the provisions of sub-S. 1, S. 60 do not constitute a law passed by the Governor-General in Council authorizing deductions to be made from the pay of an officer of His Majesty's Regular forces. The doubt that existed about the correctness of this view in consequence of the differences in opinion in the High Courts of India has been set at rest by the repeal of sub-S. 2 (b), S. 60 by Act 10 of 1914. The question for decision, therefore, resolves itself into one of whether sub-Cl. 1, S. 60, Civil P. C., authorizes the attachment of soldiers' pay and if so, how it is to be reconciled with S. 144, Army Act. Cl. 1 exempts to a certain extent the pay of the public officers or servants referred to in Cl. (h) from attachment, when they are on duty. "Public officer" is defined in S. 2 (17), Civil P. C., and includes commissioned or gazetted officers in the military forces of His Majesty and every officer in the service or pay of the Government. It is argued that non-commissioned officers fall within the latter description, and that, therefore, their pay is subject to attachment to the extent allowed in S. 60 (1), unless S. 144, Army Act, is to override this section.

The reply to this argument is that in S. 136, Army Act, the term "officer" does not include a non-commissioned or warrant officer, who is merely a soldier within the meaning of that section, and the provisions of S. 144, Army Act, prevent the operation of S. 60 (1), Civil P. C. This is clear from the definition of "officer" in Cl. (4), S. 190, Army Act. Had the legislature intended to include non-commissioned officers within the meaning of S. 60 (1), Civil P. C., I think this intention would have been clearly shown by including them in Cl. (c), S. 2 (17), Civil P. C. I am of opinion that sergeant Battersby's pay is not liable to attachment in execution of the decree in the township Court, Bhamo.

(a) Buddhist law (Burmese)—Succession—Children of divorced wife living with mother and not keeping filial relations with father cannot inherit father's property.

Under the Burmese Buddhist Law the children of a divorced wife, who live with their mother and do not maintain filial relations with the father, are not entitled to share in his estate where there has been a division of property at the time of divorce. By maintaining filial relations is meant something more than paying visits to the parent or receiving presents from him, which only indicates a continuance of those relations that are natural between a parent and child. Filial relations implies living and working and planning with the parent: S J L B 296; 2 U B R 116; 4 L B R 272 and 6 L B R 167, Fall. [P 43 C 1]

C. G. S. Pillay—for Appellants.

Mung Su—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The plaintiff, Ma Chit, is the daughter of Maung Kyaw Din by his first wife Ma On Bo. Maung Din and Ma On Bo were divorced when the plaintiff was about ten years of age. Maung Kyaw Din then married Ma Tok, and defendants 2, 3 and 4 are the children of that marriage. The plaintiff sued for the possession of a house and its site, which she alleged had been given her by her father and in the alternative she claimed this property by right of inheritance on the ground that Ma Tok was not a wife entitled to any share in her husband's property. A preliminary objection to the frame of the suit, on the grounds that the claims were inconsistent and that the plaintiff could not sue for a part only of the estate, was overruled, and the decision was confirmed on appeal by my learned predecessor. Objection was also taken to the suit on the ground that Ma Tok had obtained Letters of Administration and that the filing of the suit was in contravention of the ruling in Ma Hmyin v. Ma On Gaing (1). This objection has not been dealt with in the judgments of either of the Courts below, but it has been urged in second appeal. In the case cited, Adamson, J., held that when Letters of Administration had been obtained to the estate of an intestate, a co-heir cannot sue the administrator for partition so long as he is performing his duties properly, but must merely present his claim to the administrator. In the present case Letters of Administration had not been issued to Ma Tok at the time the suit was filed, although an order for their issue had been made.

The value of the properties of the estate had not been verified and security had not been furnished. Ma Tok's objection at the time the suit was filed was, therefore, premature. It was not until May 1916 that letters were actually issued. But apart from this, Ma Chit claims that the house and site are not part of the deceased's estate at all, but are her own property of which she has been dispossessed by Ma Tok. There is no reason why she should not file a suit for its recovery on the basis of such a claim. If her claim as heir was denied by the administratrix, she could have filed a suit for a declaration of her right to inherit in Maung Kyaw Din's estate, or if she was dissatisfied with the administration of the estate, she could have filed a suit for its administration by the Court. The ruling in Ma Hmyin v. Ma On Gaing (1) only lays down that where an administrator is engaged in the administration of an estate, a suit by a co-heir for partition is premature as interfering with the due administration of the estate. It does not lay down that the fact that S. 38, Probate and Administration Act, gives an administrator six months within which to file an inventory and one year within which to file an account, is a bar to a person claiming an interest in the estate taking legal measures to enforce his claim when that claim is denied. The objection that the suit did not lie is, therefore, overruled. In her written statement Ma Tok further took exception to the suit on the ground that the parties had referred their dispute to arbitration.

Neither of the Courts below has dealt with this point, and as it has not been urged in appeal in this Court, it must be considered waived. The two main points argued at the Bar on behalf of the appellants in this Court are that there is no evidence to support the finding that there had been delivery of possession of the subject-matter of the gift, and that Ma Chit is not entitled under the Buddhist law to any share in her father's estate as there had been a partition of the property at the time of the divorce between her father and mother and she had not resumed filial relations. The advocate for the respondent contends that as this is a second appeal under S. 100, Civil P. C., this Court is bound by the finding of fact by the lower Courts that there had been delivery of possession and a valid gift. It is not, however, every finding of fact by the lower Court which precludes this Court in second appeal from a consideration of the evidence. Their Lordships of the Privy Council have pointed out within what limits interference in second appeal with finding of facts is permitted. In

1. U B R (1902-3) 2, Probate and Administration 1.

Durga Chowdhurani v. Jewahir Singh Chowdhri (2) Lord Macnaghten said:

"It is enough . . . to say that an erroneous finding of facts is a different thing from an error or defect in procedure, and that there is no jurisdiction to entertain a second appeal on the ground of an erroneous finding of fact, however gross or inexcusable the error may seem to be. Where there is no error or defect in the procedure, the finding of the first appellate Court . . . is final, if that Court had before it evidence proper for its consideration in support of the finding."

And in Shivabasa v. Sangappa (3) their Lordships cited with approval the rule laid down in Anangamanjari Chowdhurani v. Tripura Sundari Chowdhurani (4), that it is within the jurisdiction of the Judge of second appeal to dismiss the case if they are satisfied that there was, as an English lawyer would express it, no evidence to go to the jury because that would not raise a question of fact such as arises upon the issue itself but a question of law for the consideration of the Judge. It is, therefore, clearly permissible for this Court to examine the evidence in order to see whether there is any evidence on which the findings of the lower appellate Court could properly be based. The gift in the present case was a verbal one and it is admitted that delivery of possession is essential to its validity. In Sibendrapada Banerjee v. Secy. of State (5), the learned Judges remarked: "The essence of a transfer by delivery of the property is that possession is changed." In the case of a gift the donor must put the donee in such relation to the land as he himself occupies. Now what are the facts found proved by the lower appellate Court? They are as follows: (1) That Maung Kyaw Din, on marrying again, made a verbal gift of the property in dispute to Ma Chit, which he re-affirmed in the presence of three witnesses when Ma Chit was 18 years of age; (2) the house was rented to Sit Hon was referred by Maung Kyaw Din to U Kyaw Wa, maternal grandfather of Ma Chit, for the leasing of the house; (3) that in the quarter of the town where the house is situate, it was a matter of notoriety that the house was Ma Chit's; and (4) that Maung Kyaw Din and his second wife, Ma Tok, kept their properties separate, and that Ma Chit also made a gift of part of her property to her son.

On these findings the Divisional Judge thought that it was proved that Ma Chit was in possession of the house and he cited the decision in Guru v. San Tun Baw (6), as authority for the proposition that because the house was rented in Ma Chit's name it was her property. No such proposition, however, was laid down in Gura's case (6). The Judicial Commissioner remarked that if land was rented on behalf of a person and rent was received by that person for the land, it would be reasonable to hold that he was in possession of it. The evidence in the present case, however, proves that the house was not rented in Ma Chit's name but in Maung Kyaw Din's. She herself says that as she was so young her grandfather allowed her father to enter into a written agreement with Sit Hon about renting the house. The gossip in the town about the house being Ma Chit's was not admissible in evidence and should not have been taken into account by the lower appellate Court. So far as the evidence of transfer of possession goes, the whole case for the plaintiff practically rests upon the reference by Maung Kyaw Din to Maung Kyaw Wa when Sit Hon wished to rent the house. There is no doubt that Maung Kyaw Din frequently stated that he had given the house to Ma Chit, but as Burgess, J., said in Maung Thwe v. Ma Saing (7):

"actual parting with possession is the only true test of the completion of a gift, and Burmans avoid that final and crucial test if they possibly can."

These remarks are particularly apposite to the present case. There is no evidence whatever that Maung Kyaw Din put Ma Chit in possession of the house and land; on the contrary he occupied the house with Ma Tok at times, or when he was not in occupation, took the whole of the rents. As Sit Hon says, it was understood that Maung Kyaw Din was to enjoy the rents during his lifetime. Maung Tha Han, witness 3 for the plaintiff, says he paid rent for beans stored in the premises to Maung Kyaw Din, who charged him an exorbitant rate. Further Maung Kyaw Din paid the Municipal taxes. The title deeds of the property were with Ma Tok, and Ma Chit's explanation that she handed them back to her father a month before his death is neither plausible nor credible. I accordingly find that there was no evidence on the record to justify or support the finding of the lower appellate Court that there was delivery of possession to Ma Chit of the house and land in suit. I now come to the second branch of Ma Chit's claim. It is admitted that at the time of her father's divorce with her mother there was a partition of property, and it was quite clear that after that she lived with her mother and not with her father. The general rule governing such a case is laid down in Ma Pon v. Maung Po Chan (8), where it was held that the children of a divorced wife, who live with their mother and do not maintain filial relation with the father, are not entitled to share in his estate where there has been a division of property at the time of divorce. This case was followed in the Lower Burma case of Ma Paw v. Ma Mon (9), where all the authorities were again considered, and was approved of in Ma Yi v. Ma Gale (10), and may be regarded as settled law.

The question, therefore, is whether Ma Chit, after her parents' divorce, continued to maintain filial relations with her father. By filial relations is meant something more than paying visits to the parent or receiving presents from him, which would only indicate a continuance of those relations that are natural between the parent and child. In Ma Shwe v. Maung Lan (11) filial relations was held to imply living and working and planning with the parent. The evidence in the present case falls far short of those requirements. Ma Chit continued to live with her mother; there is no evidence that she worked and planned with her father. The Court of first instance has not considered her position at all. It rejected the claim of Ma Tok to inherit her husband's property on the ground that she belonged to the class of wife which is not entitled to inherit from her husband. In particular the Judge mentioned three disqualifications: (1) that she did not eat with her husband, (2) that she did not attend on her husband during his illness, and (3) that Ma Chit performed the funeral ceremonies. Ma Tok herself says that her husband drank heavily so that she often had to leave him and live at her own house. The Myo-thugyi and his clerk speak of Maung Kyaw Din and Ma Tok living together. Ma On Bwin, who was their cook, says that they had their meals together. Ma Kan Me, witness 12 for the plaintiff, says that Maung Kyaw Din had meals with Ma Tok.

The evidence adduced by the plaintiff to show that Maung Kyaw Din and Ma Tok kept their estates entirely separate and never work together, is rebutted by that of the two Chetties one of whom, Adegappa, swears that they jointly borrowed money from him for about 10 years, and these loans were repaid sometimes by one, and sometimes by both. It is quite clear that they were ordinarily regarded as man and wife, and a good deal of the evidence about their separate eating and separate incomes comes from the side of Maung Kyaw Din's relations. Ma Tok admitted that she was unable to look after her husband during his last illness, but attributed it to the fact that she herself was ill as she was pregnant. She says that of the Rs. 500 spent on the funeral, Rs. 200 were her money and Rs. 300 were borrowed from Ma Chit. Ma Chit denies making the loan to Ma Tok's sister, but in cross-examination said that she did not know whether a notice had been issued through a lawyer to recover this sum, and also that she had not yet got it back. If she had made no loan, it is strange that she should not be able definitely to deny that any message of demand for its recovery had been issued. In my opinion it has not been shown that Ma Tok should be excluded from inheriting her husband's property on the grounds stated by the District Judge. I accordingly reverse the judgments and decrees of the lower Courts, and direct that the suit be dismissed with costs in both Courts.

Judgment.—The conviction in this case must be quashed. The accused did not admit that they had committed criminal trespass by entering upon the land in dispute. They claimed that they had leased it from the owner. After the evidence for the prosecution had been recorded, the Magistrate was bound to examine them under the provisions of Ss. 342 and 364, Criminal P. C. His omission to do so is fatal to the validity of the trial. The provisions of S. 342 are imperative and failure to comply with them is not a mere irregularity curable under S. 537 Criminal P. C. Moreover, so far as can be ascertained from the diary of the record, the accused were never given an opportunity to produce witnesses on their behalf. The District Magistrate has commented on the irregularity of the method of trial in this case. The Magistrate fixed the case for the 2nd of December at Pakokku, but proceeded to the village where the land was situated on the 30th of November without giving any notice to the advocates, and pronounced judgment on the 2nd of December. The convictions and sentences are set aside, and a re-trial is directed. The fines that have been paid will be refunded.

Upper Burma Land and Revenue Regulation (3 of 1889), S. 53 (2) (x)—Claim to right to fish or connected with or arising from demarcation or disposal of fishery—Jurisdiction of civil Courts is not barred.

Clause (x), sub-S. (2), S. 53 of the Upper Burma Land and Revenue Regulation, must be read subject to the provisions of sub-S. 1 to that section. It does not bar the jurisdiction of civil Courts to all claims to right to fish, or connected with or arising out of the demarcation or disposal of any fishery, but only claims which the Local Government or a revenue Officer is empowered by or under the Regulation to dispose of. [P 44 C 2]

Judgment.—This is a reference by the District Judge to this Court under S. 113, Civil P. C. The District Judge has not stated precisely the question on which orders are required, but it appears that he is in doubt whether S. 53 (2) (x) of the Upper Burma Land and Revenue Regulation was validly enacted. Apparently the District Judge has assumed that this provision of the Regulation bars the jurisdiction of the civil Courts, but for the reasons stated in the judgment in Sonilal Sheoshankar v. Delawar (1) of this Court, I am of opinion that this is not the case. It is clear that Cl. (x), sub-S. (2), S. 53 must be read subject to the provisions of, sub-S. (1) of that section. It does not purport to bar the jurisdiction of civil Courts to all claims to a right to fish, or connected with or arising out of the demarcation or disposal of any fishery, but only claims which the Local Government or a Revenue Officer is empowered by or under the Regulation to dispose of. The provisions relating to fisheries which are contained in S. 32 of the Regulation have been repealed, and the Local Government or a Revenue Officer is not therefore empowered by or under the Regulation to dispose of any such claim; that this is also the view adopted by the Local Government would appear to be the case from the foot-note to S. 53, p. 27 of the Upper Burma Land and Revenue Manual published by the authority of Government, in which it is stated that Cl. (x), S. 53, sub-S. (2), ceased to apply since the extension of the Burma Fisheries Act 1905, to Upper Burma. Since the jurisdiction of the civil Courts is not barred under S. 9, Civil P. C., the Court is entitled to take cognizance of the matter. It may be added that this is a suit for damages for trespass on the plaintiff's fishery, and there appear to be no provisions of the Revenue law by which such a suit can be entertained or the order or decree of the Revenue Court enforced.

Certain lands were attached in execution of a decree. The respondent preferred an objection to the attachment, and the executing Court, holding that at the time of the attachment the lands were in the possession of the objector and not of the judgment-debtor or some person in trust for him, directed the removal of the attachment. The decree-holder moved the Judicial Commissioner in revision on the ground that the executing Court had acted with material irregularity in not applying its mind to the provisions of S. 110, Evidence Act, and in not considering the evidence produced:

Held: that the Judicial Commissioner could not interfere in revision, inasmuch as there had been no infringement of the extrinsic conditions of the lower Court's legal activity. [P 46 C 2]

R. K. Banerjee—for Applicant.

Judgment.—This is an application in revision against an order passed by the Township Judge, Thazi, directing the removal of attachment on certain lands. The Judge held that the lands were in the possession of the objector at the time of the attachment and not of the judgment-debtor or some persons in trust for him. San Ba's grounds for moving this Court in revision are that the Judge has acted with material irregularity in not applying his mind to the provisions of S. 110, Evidence Act, and in not considering the evidence produced. An objection is also taken to the amount of costs awarded. R. 63, O. 21, provides that where a claim or an objection is preferred, the party against whom an order is made may institute a suit to establish the right which he claims to the property in dispute, but that subject to the result of such suit, if any, the order shall be conclusive. The first point that has been argued at the Bar is whether any revision lies against an order such as the one passed by the Township Judge and if it does lie, within what limits this Court will interfere in revision. In Ittiachan v. Velappan (1) the Court appeared to think that it had no power to revise orders in cases investigated under O. 21, R. 58, but the point was not argued and the opinion is merely an obiter dictum. In J. J. Guise v. Jaisraj (2) Burdett, J., said that the rule of the Court was that if a party applied to the Court to exercise its powers in revision, he must satisfy the Court that he has no other remedy open to him under the law to set right what has been done illegally, irregularly or without jurisdiction. In Ghulam Shabbir v. Dwarka Prasad (3) a Bench of the same Court interfered in revision on the ground that it was doubtful whether a separate suit would lie. In the matter of Sheoraj Nandan Singh v. Gopal Suran Narain Singh (4) and Monmohney Dass v. Radha Krishna Dass (5) the Calcutta High Court interfered in two cases where the Court had gone beyond the determination of the question of possession only. The decisions proceeded apparently on the ground that the Court below had acted illegally in the exercise of its jurisdiction in directing execution to issue. In San Tun Pru v. Mi Ani Me (6) interference with the lower Court's order was made for similar reasons to these given in the Calcutta cases. The latest reported decision in Lower Burma is that of Mg. Tun U v. Palaniappa Chetty (7), where the learned Chief Judge said:

"The course which the plaintiff should have pursued is very clearly indicated in R. 63 O. 21, Civil P. C., which says that where a claim or an objection is preferred to an attachment, the party against whom an order is made may institute a suit to establish the right which he claims to the property in dispute, but, subject on the result of suit . . . the order shall be conclusive . . . With such plain provisions staring him in the face, it was sheer culpable negligence on the part of the advocate . . . to incur the risk of the plaintiff losing all remedy by filing the appeal and the application for revision."

The case does not decide that under no circumstances will revision lie. The only reported decision in Upper Burma is Maung Thaing v. Maung Thale Ni (8), where Thirkell White, J., said:

"In a case in which the Court of first instance has acted on insufficient materials, has dealt with the case in a perfunctory manner or has given a decision which is plainly perverse, this Court would be justified in interfering in revision."

None of the authorities seems to have been brought to the notice of the learned Judge, and I venture to doubt whether the law laid down correctly states the grounds on which revision is justified under S. 115, Civil P. C. The most fully considered decision that I have been able to find is that of a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court in Siva Nathaji v. Joma Kashinath (9), where the question referred for the decision of the Full Bench was:

"Whether the High Court should exercise its extraordinary jurisdiction under S. 622, Civil P. C., or otherwise on behalf of persons who feel themselves aggrieved by orders passed by Courts . . . in cases in which it appears the law has specifically prescribed another remedy, by suit or otherwise."

After a very elaborate discussion of the authorities, seven propositions were laid down of which the most important was the fifth, which is as follows:

"Where a decree or order of a subordinate Court is declared by the law to be, for its own purposes, final or conclusive, though by its nature provisional, as subject to displacement by another decree in a more formal suit, the Court will have regard to the intention of the legislature that promptness and certainty should, in such cases, be in some measure accepted instead of juridical perfection. It will rectify the proceedings of the inferior Court where the extrinsic conditions of its legal activity have plainly been infringed, but where the alleged, or apparent, error consists in a misappreciation of evidence, or misconstruction of the law intrinsic to the inquiry and decision, it will respect the intended finality, and will intervene peremptorily only when it is manifest that, by the ordinary and prescribed method an adequate remedy, or the intended remedy, cannot be had."

9. (1883) 7 Bom 341.

The principles laid down in this decision were approved in Sheo Prasad Singh v. Kastura Kuar (10) by Mahmood, J., who described the judgment as one deserving of the highest respect from the Indian Courts, and I think that it should be followed in this Court. In the present case I see no reason why the petitioner should not resort to the ordinary remedy by suit. It is not shown that there has been any infringement of the extrinsic conditions of the lower Court's legal activity. The Judge found after taking evidence that the lands in dispute were in the objector's possession on his own account and not on account of the judgment-debtor, and he had power to decide the point. The application for revision is dismissed.

[P 48 C 1, 2]

J. C. Chatterjee and Vakil—for Appellant.

H. M. Lutter—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The plaintiff-appellant sued the defendant-respondent in the Township Court and prayed for a mortgage-decree. The Judge gave him a money-decree and he then appealed to the District Court, which gave him a mortgage-decree as prayed for. The plaintiff then applied to execute this decree by sale of the mortgaged properties, which included 4.83 acres of land. The Judge's order is by no means clear, but it appears that the judgment debtor had ceased to occupy the 4.83 acres which had been mortgaged; he would seem to have been in occupation of 1.79 acres of the area under a license from the Deputy Commissioner, and another area of 1.79 acres had been assigned to one Maung Po So by the Deputy Commissioner, and in each case the land was held under a license issued in accordance with the rules under the Upper Burma Land and Revenue Regulation. It would appear that the order cancelling the original license of the judgment-debtor and ordering the issue of two licenses for 1.79 acres each was passed on 5th May 1914, more than a month before the date of the decree which the decree-holder was seeking to execute. The Township Judge apparently refused to execute the decree against the land, and the decree-holder thereupon appealed to the District Judge who directed that as to the area of 1.79 acres only, standing in the name of the judgment-debtor, the Township Court should allow the judgment-debtor's interest in the land to be sold for the benefit of the decree-holder. Against this order the decree-holder now comes to this Court in appeal, on the ground that the District Court erred in holding that 1.79 acres of land should be excluded from the execution of the appellant's decree.

In the course of the argument it appeared that the land in question was State land. It has been held in Upper Burma that the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts is barred in respect of claims to the ownership or possession of State land by the provisions of S. 53, Upper Burma Land and Revenue Regulation. The validity of that section was called in question recently in two cases of this Court, Civil Second Appeal No. 195 of 1913, and Civil Second Appeal No. 372 of 1913, in which the Additional Judge held that S. 53 (2) (ii), Upper Burma Land and Revenue Regulation, is not validly enacted, and the Civil Courts have power to try suits between private individuals for the possession of State land. The learned Advocate for the appellant has maintained this view in the present appeal, and as the question of jurisdiction went to the root of the matter, notice was given to the Local Government as representing the Secy. of State and Mr. Lutter has been heard on behalf of the Secy. of State in support of the validity of this section of the Act. The view that S. 53 (2) (ii), Land and Revenue Regulation, bars the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts appears to have been first put forward in the case Maung Tha Aung v. Maung San Ke (1). This decision was followed in Maung Nat v. Ma Mi (2) and in Maung Ke v. Maung Po Ni (3).

Before considering whether the section in question was validly enacted or not, it appears necessary to consider whether the rule laid down in those judgments was correct, since if the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts is not expressly or impliedly barred, there can be no doubt that under S. 9, Civil P. C., the Court may take cognizance of and try all suits of a civil nature relating to State land. The material portion of the judgment in Maung Tha Aung v. Maung San Ke (1) was as follows:

"Now in S. 53 (2) of the Land and Revenue Regulation it is laid down that 'a Civil Court shall not exercise jurisdiction over any of the following matters, which shall be cognizable exclusively by Revenue Officers, namely . . . (ii) any claim to the ownership or possession of any State land' . . . Consequently this suit is barred in the Civil Courts."

Now it appears to me that a reference to the regulation in question does not justify this view, and it could only be arrived at by taking a portion of the section in question out of its context and applying it as a general and absolute rule. S. 53 runs as follows:

"Except as otherwise provided by this Regn. (1) a Civil Court shall not have jurisdiction in any matter which the Local Government or any Revenue Officer is empowered by or under this Regulation to dispose of, or take cognizance of the manner in which the Local Government or any Revenue Officer exercises any powers vested in it or him by or under this Regulation; and in particular . . . (2). A Civil Court shall not exercise jurisdiction over any of the following matters which shall be cognizable exclusively by Revenue Officers, namely," and then follow fourteen clauses of which one was cancelled by Regn. 4 of 1896. The second of these clauses is that quoted above. The clause in full runs as follows:

"Any claim to the ownership or possession of State land, or to hold such land free of land revenue or at a favourable rate of land revenue, or to establish any lien upon or other interest in such land or the rents, profits, or produce thereof."

1. (1897-01) 2 U B R 207.
2. (1897-01) 2 U B R 269.
3. (1897-01) 2 U B R 211.

It is clearly, therefore, necessary to interpret this clause in relation to the general rule laid down in sub-S. (1) S. 53, of which it forms a particular instance. It is not a rule which bars the jurisdiction of a Civil Court over claims to the ownership or possession of any State land except in such matters as the Local Government or a Revenue Officer is empowered by or under the Regulation to dispose of. And the question, therefore, arises whether the Local Government or a Revenue Officer is empowered by or under the Regulation to dispose of any claims to the ownership or possession of any State land. The second rule laid down in S. 53, sub-S. (1), barring the cognizance by Civil Courts of the manner in which the Local Government or any Revenue Officer exercises any powers vested in it or him by or under the Regulation does not apparently apply in the present case, but it is clear that it does not bar or purport to bar the cognizance by Civil Courts of the manner in which the Local Government or a Revenue Officer exercises its or his powers, except so far as those powers are vested in it or him by or under the Regulation. For the purpose of the present appeal the only part of the Regulation with which we are concerned is that part contained in Ch. 3 which relates to State land. S. 23 contains a definition of State land. S. 24 (1) lays down that "any land.....declared by the Collector to be State land shall be deemed to be such land until the contrary is proved."

The only reference to claims to the ownership or possession of State land is contained in sub-Ss. (2), (3) and (4) of S. 24. Sub-S. 2 lays down that

"a claim to the ownership or possession of any land with respect to which such a declaration" (as has been referred to in sub-S. (1))

"has been or may be so made, or to hold such land free of land revenue or at a favourable rate of land revenue, or to establish any lien upon or other interest in such land or the rents, profits or produce thereof shall be cognizable by the Collector only."

.....From the words of this sub-section, it would appear probable that the claims referred to are claims against the State, but, whether this is so or not, the following sub-section, which lays down that the period of limitation for a claim under the last preceding sub-section shall be one year from the date of the declaration made by the Collector, makes it quite clear that the provisions of this section do not apply to claims made more than one year after the date of the declaration. There is no suggestion that in the present case the claim of the appellant falls within this period of limitation and there must in fact be very little land in Upper Burma in respect of which a declaration under the provisions of S. 24 (1) of the Regulation was not made very much more than a year ago. Sub-S. (4) merely empowers the Collector to withdraw a declaration made under sub-S. (1) before the passing of an order or any claim preferred under sub-S. (2). S. 25 of the Regulation lays down some of the incidents of the tenure of State land. There is nothing in this section from which it can be held or inferred that the jurisdiction of the civil Courts is barred in the case of a claim to ownership or possession of State lands. S. 26 gives power to the Financial Commissioner to make rules in respect of State land which is waste, and sub-S. (4), S. 26 lays down that no person shall acquire by length of possession or otherwise any interest in land disposed of, occupied or allotted in pursuance of the rules made by the Financial Commissioner under Cl. (1) beyond such interest as is conferred by the rules.

The rules framed by the Financial Commissioner do not appear anywhere to lay down that the jurisdiction of a civil Court is barred in case of claims to State land. Financial Commissioner's Notification No. 8, dated 5th July 1889, directs that claims as against the State to the ownership or possession of any land with respect to which a declaration that it is state land has been made or may be made, shall be tried by Collectors only and that claims between private individuals to the occupation or possession of State land shall be tried by a Collector or by an Assistant Collector of the first or second class. But this notification does not purport to do more than define the class of Revenue Officers by which claims of different descriptions shall be tried, and neither from the notification nor from the rules or directions framed under the Act is it possible to infer that any such monopoly of the trial of claims to State land as is apparently recognized in the published rulings of this Court quoted above, is either claimed or suggested. If there were any doubt as to whether Cls. 13 or 14 included in sub-S. (2), S. 53, Land and Revenue Regulation, were intended to lay down an absolute rule without reference to sub-S. (1), I think it would be laid at rest by a reference to some of the other clauses. For instance Cl. (ix) purports to bar the jurisdiction of a civil Court over any claim connected with or arising out of any right in an irrigation work or any charge in respect of any land irrigated from such a work or any matter which the Collector is bound to ascertain and record under S. 36.

Section 36 of the Regulation has been repealed and the Regulation now contains no provisions relating to irrigation works, which are dealt with in the Burma Canals Act 2 of 1905. Similarly Cl. (x) bars the jurisdiction of a civil Court in respect of any claim to a right to fish, or connected with or arising out of the demarcation or disposal of any fishery. The Regulation now contains no provisions relating to fisheries, S. 32 having been repealed by the extension of the Burma Fisheries Act (1905) to Upper Burma. The view that these two clauses depended on, and were restricted to, the other provisions of the Regulation and did not lay down a general rule of law irrespective of those provisions, appears to be the view which has also been taken by the Local Government, since in the foot-notes appended to those clauses at p. 27 of the Upper Burma Land and Revenue Manual, which is published under the authority of Government, it is pointed out that Cl. (ix) should apparently have been repealed by Burma Act 2 of 1905, and that Cl. (x) ceased to apply since the extension of the Burma Fisheries Act, 1905, to Upper Burma.

I think, therefore, there can be no doubt that Cl. (ii) to sub-S. (2) of S. 53 of the Upper Burma Land and Revenue Regulation neither bars nor purports to bar the jurisdiction of civil Courts, except in respect of such matters as the Local Government or a Revenue Officer is empowered by or under the Regulation to dispose of, and inasmuch as the Regulation does not empower Revenue Officers to dispose of claims to the ownership or possession of any State land more than one year after the date of the declaration by the Collector that the land is State land, and does not give any authority to the Financial Commissioner to make rules for deciding such claims, I am of opinion that the jurisdiction of the civil Courts is not barred and that they are entitled and bound to take cognizance of such claims. I have already stated that the terms of the Financial Commissioner's Notification No. 8 of 1889 do not appear to be intended to empower Revenue Officers to dispose of claims between private individuals and there does not seem to be any rule giving them such powers. If, however, there is any such rule or if it was the intention of the notification to confer the power upon Revenue Officers of deciding claims between private individuals to the occupation or possession of State land, I think it is clear that, except in so far as such notification or rule is issued or framed under the authority of, and in conformity with, S. 24, sub-S. (3), or S. 26 or otherwise to effect the purposes of the Regulation, it cannot have the effect of barring the jurisdiction of a civil Court since it is not made or issued by or under the Regulation. I am unable to find that the Regulation anywhere empowers Revenue Officers to decide claims to occupy or possess State land between private persons except within one year of a declaration that the land is State, or gives any power to make rules by which Revenue Officers may be so empowered.

In this view of the case it is not necessary to consider whether S. 53 of the Regulation was validly enacted or not. But I do not think it is possible to pass over in silence two of the arguments used by the additional Judge of this Court in arriving at the conclusion that the section was not validly enacted. It is apparently urged that the word "allegiance", which occurs in S. 22, Indian Councils Act of 1861, is used in the sense of devotion or loyalty, and it is apparently argued that as the allegiance, in the sense of devotion or loyalty, of the person may depend upon the unwritten laws or constitution of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, any law which may be held to affect those unwritten laws or that constitution must be illegal, since the allegiance, in the sense of devotion or loyalty, of any person to the Crown may depend upon such a law. I am of opinion that the word "allegiance" used in S. 22, Indian Councils Act, used in the ordinary legal sense of a duty or obligation of loyalty owed by a subject to his Sovereign.

This is the sense in which the word is used in Ch. 10 of the first book of Blackstone's Commentaries, and I have no doubt that the object of the section was to lay down in the words of a learned writer that "the Council may not pass a law affecting the authority of Parliament or any part of the unwritten law or constitution of the United Kingdom dealing with the allegiance or the sovereignty or the dominion of the Crown over any part of British India" (Professor A. Berredale Keith, The Journal of the Society of Comparative Legislation Vol. 36, p. 211).

Nor can I agree with the argument that whereas the section might be validly enacted in respect of the natives of the country, it is invalid in respect of Englishmen and is, therefore, entirely invalid. The suggestion that whereas the allegiance of an Englishman might depend upon his right to have recourse in all cases to the ordinary tribunals, whereas in the case of a Burman it would not so depend, appears to me to be merely an instance of the difficulties into which the Courts would be landed if they attempted to give the meaning to allegiance attributed to it by the additional Judge and is entirely opposed to the general spirit of legislation in this country. Since the jurisdiction of the civil Courts is not barred, the appeal will now be heard upon the merits.

Civil P. C. (1908), O. 41, Rr. 22 and 33—Portion of decree appealed against—Appellate Court cannot in absence of cross objection set aside portion of decree in favour of appellant.

Where a party appeals against that portion of a decree in respect of which he has been unsuccessful, the appellate Court is not ordinarily entitled, without any formal cross-objection by the other side, to set aside so much of the decree as has been in favour of the appellant: 34 All 32 Ref. [P 51 C 1]

Judgment.—The plaintiffs sued to eject the defendants from certain land. The plaintiffs' case was that they had bought the land in suit in the year 1262 B. E., corresponding with the year 1900 A. D., that they had been in possession ever since, that the defendants had entered on the land and in spite of their protest taken possession and built a house on it. The defence was that the plaintiffs had not purchased the land that the land had been mortgaged to the mother of the plaintiff Ma San Hmi, who was also mother of defendant 1 Maung Pyaung, and that Maung Pyaung had been permitted to occupy the land with the consent of his mother the mortgages. The Court of first instance held that the sale had not been proved but that the plaintiffs had contributed Rs. 10 towards the mortgage money of Rs. 15 which had been paid to the mortgagor, that the plaintiffs were, therefore, entitled to two-thirds of the land in suit and the Court accordingly gave the plaintiff a decree for two-thirds of the land. The plaintiffs appealed and the District Court held that the suit was wrongly framed, that it should have been a suit for possession and that the plaintiffs having failed to make out their case were not entitled to succeed at all and the Court not merely dismissed the appeal but dismissed the plaintiffs' suit. The plaintiffs now come to this Court in second appeal.

The first ground of the appeal is that the defendants-respondents not having raised any objection to the decree of the Court of first instance, it was not open to the lower appellate Court to set so much of the decree aside as was in favour of the plaintiffs-appellants. For the respondents the provisions of O. 41, R. 33, Civil P. C. are relied upon. This is a new provision of law incorporated in the present Code of Civil Procedure for the first time and whereas there appears to have been no doubt that under the old Code a Court would not have been entitled to pass such an order as has here been passed by the lower appellate Court it is urged that the new rule gives the Court ample power to pass any decree which the case may require. It was, however, pointed out in Rangamal v. Jhandu (1) that in interpreting this rule the Court should not lose sight of the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure itself, nor of the court-fees Act nor of the Law of Limitation. R. 22 of the same order provides:

1. (1912) 34 All 32=11 I C 640.

"Any respondent though he may not have appealed from any part of the decree may not only support the decree on any of the grounds decided against him in the Courts below but take any cross-objection to the decree which he could have taken by way of appeal provided he has filed such objection in the appellate Court within one month from the date of service on him or his pleader of notice of the day fixed for hearing the appeal or within such further time as the appellate Court may see fit to allow."

This rule clearly shows that it was intended that prima facie at least, a respondent should not be allowed to take exception to so much of a decree as was against him without complying with the provisions of the rule. The learned Judges went on to say:

"In a case in which there is no sufficient reason for respondent neglecting either to appeal or to file objection we think the Court should hesitate before allowing him to object at the hearing of the appeal filed by the appellant."

I think that this view of the law may be accepted and that where a party appeals against that portion of the decree in respect of which he has been unsuccessful, the Court is not ordinarily entitled without any formal cross objection by the other side to set aside so much of the decree as has been in favour of the appellant. I think therefore that to this extent the appeal in the present case must succeed. On the merits the appellants urge that they are entitled to a decree as prayed for. It is however, clear that their suit was not one for ejectment. They alleged wrongful dispossession by the defendants and the suit was one for possession. This is a mistake, however which is very commonly made and might have been and should probably have been corrected by an amendment in the Court of first instance. But the evidence certainly does not show that the plaintiffs have made out their case and both the Courts below have apparently agreed in holding that the sale set up was not proved while the mortgage relied upon by the defendants was proved. In view of this finding and of the fact that the mortgage was the mother of one plaintiff and mother-in-law of the other living upon the same land with the plaintiffs, I think it was a natural inference that the plaintiffs were not in possession on their own account. There is, moreover, evidence that the plaintiffs gave the defendants permission to build a house upon the land. It was at least as good evidence as that of the plaintiffs' witnesses.

There are no grounds for allowing the appeal except in so far as the lower appellate Court has disturbed the finding of the Court of first instance. To that extent the appeal is allowed and the decree of the Court of first instance will be restored with costs.

Second Appeal No. 96 of 1916, Decided on 23rd October 1918.

(a) Evidence Act (1872), S. 115—"Thing"—Meaning of—Proposition of law or promise to make gift is not "thing."

The word "thing" in S 115, Evidence Act, means a fact, and a fact in existence or past. A proposition of law or a promise to make a gift is not a "thing" within the meaning of that section, and cannot create estoppel: Langdon v. Dond, 10 Allen 432, Ref. [P 53 C 1]

(b) Maxims—Quicquid plantatur solo solo cedit—Maxim is not applicable to India.

The maxim quicquid plantatur solo solo cedit, i.e., that anything affixed to land with the object of improving the inheritance becomes part of the realty and the property of the owner, whether it be affixed by him or some one else, is not applicable to India. [P 52 C 2]

(c) Possession—Suit for—Plaintiff alleging ground and house built on it to be hers—Defendant alleging that ground had been gifted to him, by plaintiff and house was built by him—Gift not established—Amount advanced by plaintiff towards costs of house not proved—Held plaintiff was entitled to decree for possession subject to payment estimated value of house.

Plaintiff sued for possession of a house and ground, alleging that the ground was hers, that she had built the house on it, the defendant being entrusted with the superintendence of its construction and having contributed a portion of the costs of its building. The defendant alleged that the ground had been gifted to him by the plaintiff, and that the house was built by him. It was found that no gift from the plaintiff to the defendant was established, and that there was no proof of the amount of money advanced by the plaintiff towards the costs of the house:

Held: that the plaintiff was entitled to a decree for possession subject to the payment by her to the defendant of the estimated value of the house. [P 53 C 2]

C. G. S. Pillai—for Appellant.

H. M. Lutter—for Respondents.

Judgment.—Defendant-respondent 1 is the grandson of the plaintiff-appellant. Defendant-respondent 2 is defendant-respondent 1's wife, and defendant-respondent 3 is his mother-in-law. The plaintiff-appellant sued for possession of a house and ground alleging that the ground was hers, that she had built the house on it, defendant-respondent being entrusted with the superintendence of its construction, that the house had cost Rs. 1,500 of which she had furnished Rs. 1,050 and defendant-respondent, Rs. 450, that after the house had been built she had permitted defendants-respondents to live in it with her, and that now disagreements had arisen and they had refused to quit. The defence was that the ground had been given to defendant-respondent 1 by the plaintiff-appellant out of natural love and affection, that he had built the house with his own money and that he had permitted the plaintiff-appellant to live with him. The Sub Divisional Judge found that the house belonged to plaintiff-appellant, but that defendant-respondent had furnished more than Rs. 450 for its construction, and gave the plaintiff-appellant a decree for possession on payment of Rs. 1,100. On appeal the lower appellate Court held that it was for the plaintiff-appellant to prove that she had furnished Rs. 1,050 for the construction of the house, that she had failed to prove this and that there was accordingly no difficulty in believing the story of the gift of the land, but that the question of the gift was not essential to a determination of the suit. It reversed the decree of the first Court and dismissed the suit. One of the grounds of this appeal is that the lower appellate Court erred in holding that the question whether the land on which the building was erected was given or not by the plaintiff-appellant to defendant-respondent 1 was not essential, and that the only issue to be determined was whether the plaintiff-appellant had contributed Rs. 1,050 towards the building.

The land admittedly had belonged to the plaintiff-appellant and she was in joint possession of the house and paid the taxes. If she had stated nothing further the burden of proof would have been on the defendants-respondents, but she stated that defendant-respondent 1 had built the house for her as her agent and had expended money of his own on its construction. He was therefore entitled to remain in joint possession until reimbursed what he had expended under S. 221, Contract Act. She thus admitted that she had not an unconditional right to turn defendant-respondent 1 out of the house, and she, therefore had to prove on what terms she was entitled to sole possession. No doubt she was not in a position to prove the exact amount expended by defendant-respondent 1, but she was bound to make out a prima facie case, and this she could have done by proving the approximate value of the building and that she had contributed Rs. 1,050. The payment of this sum therefore was part of her case, but it does not follow that her suit was bound to fail entirely if she failed to prove it. Unless there was a gift she remains owner of the land. For the defendants-respondents it is urged that the maxim quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit, which means that anything affixed to land with the object of improving the inheritance becomes part of the realty and the property of the owner, whether it be affixed by him or by some one else, is not applicable.

This rule is not part of the law of India, Ss. 51, 63 and 108 (h), T. P. Act, have taken its place. The two latter sections do not apply because defendant-respondent 1 is neither a mortgagee nor a tenant. S. 51 does not apply either. If defendant-respondent 1 be a transferee, i. e., if there were gift of the land, then the land is his, he is not a transferee with an imperfect title. But assuming that plaintiff-appellant failed to prove that defendant-respondent 1 was her agent and that she contributed Rs. 1,050 she certainly could not lose her land unless she be estopped, and I think the equitable rule contained in S. 51, T. P. Act, should be followed. Now it is plain that there was no gift. No registered deed was executed and the plaintiff-appellant remained in possession of the land. If the evidence adduced by the defendants-respondents be true, it merely amounts to proof that plaintiff-appellant promised to give defendant-respondent 1 the land. Estoppel was not specifically pleaded, but at the hearing of this appeal it was urged that, if on the faith of plaintiff-appellant's promise defendant-respondent 1 built the house with his own money, plaintiff-appellant is now estopped from asserting her title to the land. But what "thing" did plaintiff-appellant induce defendant-respondent 1 to believe to be true? Supposing that he believed that a promise to give amounted to gift, it cannot be said that this belief was induced by the plaintiff-appellant, and, moreover, a proposition of law is not a "thing" within the meaning of S. 115, Evidence Act. In that section a "thing" means a fact and a fact in existence or past.

"The intent of a party is necessarily uncertain as to its fulfilment. No person has a right to rely on it. A person cannot be bound not to change his intention, nor can he be precluded from showing such a change merely because he has previously represented that his intentions were once different from those which he eventually executed. Langdon v. Dond (1)"

There is thus no estoppel in this case; plaintiff appellant may have truly intended to give the land at the time she made the promise, if she ever made it, and have subsequently changed her mind. I am therefore of opinion that defendant-respondent 1 cannot claim the house as his property as long as the plaintiff-appellant is willing and ready to reimburse him the money which he expended on it. It is, therefore immaterial whether defendant-respondent 1 built the house as plaintiff-appellant's agent or on the faith of her promise to give him the land; the only question is the amount which the plaintiff-appellant must pay before she can evict him. The only direct evidence of any contribution by the plaintiff-appellant is that given by a casual visitor, a cooly who has worked for plaintiff-appellant for ten years. According to one of her witnesses she is poor, and there are serious discrepancies between her own evidence and that given by her witness Maung Po Kyan. I am therefore unable to hold that the lower appellate Court was wrong in finding that it was not proved that she contributed anything towards the building, and if she did she has only herself to blame for not taking receipts and keeping accounts. The evidence adduced by the defendants-respondents as to the amount spent on the construction of the house is very deficient. The Sub-divisional Court found that the value of the house was Rs. 2,150. This finding was based on a report by the bailiff, which was apparently admitted in evidence with the consent of both sides. The opinions as to the value of the building expressed by some of the defendant-respondents' witnesses are valueless. The value, Rs. 2,150, has not been disputed in this Court and will be accepted.

The decrees of the Courts below are accordingly set aside, and the plaintiff-appellant will be given a decree directing that upon her depositing in Court within one month for payment to defendant respondent 1 the sum of Rs. 2,150, the defendants-respondents shall give her complete possession of the house and ground in suit. As the parties have been both partly successful they will bear their own costs throughout.

It is the duty of a High Court to prevent the abuse of the provisions of the law, and if in a case in which proceedings have been taken under S. 107, Criminal P. Judgment.—Certain residents of Mandalay made a report to the District Superintendent of Police which was forwarded to the District Magistrate, who recorded the information given by three of their number and thereupon issued warrants for the arrest of two persons under S. 107, Criminal P. C., and then transferred the proceedings to the Eastern Sub-divisional Magistrate for disposal.

Against this order the two persons arrested have come to this Court in revision and the Government Prosecutor has been heard for the District Magistrate. The persons who gave the information to the District Magistrate were also cited, but they do not wish to be parties to the proceedings and they have not supported the order. The information given in the first instance is in writing and it was accompanied by a printed notice and a copy of a newspaper. The notice is an invitation to a meeting "to clear up doubts;" it stated that the sayadaws from the four quarters of Mandalay had been invited to give their decision on certain matters and all friends of the persons who issued the notice were invited to attend. The newspaper article stated that the sayadaws from the four quarters were to be entertained, and after that the question whether beef should or should not be eaten would be considered, the injunction by the Ledi Sayadaw and various other pongyis would be read, after which the opinion of the sayadaws would be asked for, and they would give their decision. The written information stated that there would be a serious dispute resulting in a breach of public peace, because when there is a difference among pongyis there will be a difference among laymen. It stated that the notice and the newspaper article convening a meeting would encourage a great and serious dispute between half of the residents of Mandalay who revere the Ledi Sayadaw and the rest, and if the meeting is held the information states that there will, through ill-feeling on each side, be a serious quarrel. The information stated that a public meeting was to be held at which the two applicants intend to attack the Ledi Sayadaw's propaganda for putting a stop to the eating of beef, that a very large number of priests and laymen had been called by the two persons mentioned to attend the meeting, and unless they are placed on security their action would result in a breach of public (apparently a misprint for "peace").

It is contended that this information did not justify the arrest of the two applicants and proceedings being taken against them under S. 107, Criminal P. C. On the other hand, it is urged that the information did justify that action and this Court should not interfere at this stage of the proceedings. I think there is no doubt that if the information did not justify the issue of a warrant, this Court is entitled to interfere. It has been held constantly that it is the duty of the High Court to prevent the abuse of the provisions of the law. A recent case is that of Rajendra Narayan Singh v. Emperor (1). S. 107, Criminal P. C., authorizes a District Magistrate to take action upon information that any person is likely to commit a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquillity, or to do any wrongful act that may probably occasion a breach of the peace, or disturb the public tranquillity.

It is clear that there are two distinct sets of circumstances in which a Magistrate may take action under this section, first where it appears that a person is likely himself to commit a breach of the peace or to disturb the public tranquillity, that is to say, by a direct act, e. g., by committing an assault, and secondly, where a person may be the indirect cause of a breach of the peace or the disturbance of the public tranquillity by doing a certain act, but in the latter case the Magistrate may only take action where the act anticipated is a wrongful act. It has been laid down in a number of rulings that this section does not authorize action against a person who is expected to do an act which may cause a breach of the peace or disturb the public tranquillity unless that act is wrongful, and that the mere fact that the doing of a lawful act may lead to a breach of the peace, while it may authorize the Magistrate to take action against the person expected to commit that breach, does not authorize action against the persons intending to do the lawful act, unless they are themselves likely to commit a breach of the peace or to disturb the public tranquillity. The distinction has been explained in Firoze Ali Mullick v.

Emperor (2), where certain persons proposed to take a procession along a public road and it was pointed out by Woodroffe, J., that if those persons "have the right claimed, it is obvious that they cannot be properly bound down because some one else proposes to interfere with that right. The proper course in such a case is to bind down the other party."

The law was similarly explained in Mohamed Yakub v. Emperor (3). The matter was discussed at great length in Sundram Chetti v. Queen (4). There can be no question that the right of public discussion is a right which every subject possesses, and that in convening a meeting to discuss religious matters the applicants in the present case were not doing a wrongful act. If owing to the prevalence of ill-feeling between certain persons likely to attend the meeting or any other cause, a breach of the peace was expected, the Magistrate had ample power under S. 144, Criminal P. C., to secure that the peace was not broken. But I am clearly of opinion that in arresting the applicants in the present case and in ordering an inquiry into their conduct, the District Magistrate was not, upon the information which was before him, justified by the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure. If information is or was available that the applicants themselves intended to commit a breach of the peace or to disturb the public tranquillity, the fact should be or should have been recorded. The proceedings of the District Magistrate must be quashed and the warrants for the arrest of the applicants cancelled.

Criminal Revn. No. 287 of 1917, Decided on 28th June 1917.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 437—Order for further inquiry under S. 437—Detailed examination of evidence and elaborate reasoning are not necessary—Enough should be said to indicate to lower Court in what way its order is thought to be incorrect.

It is not ordinarily desirable that in ordering further inquiry under S. 437, Criminal P. C., a detailed examination of the evidence and elaborate reasons should be given, but enough should be said in the way of reasons to indicate to the Court below in what manner it is thought that its order was incorrect, whether on a point of law or in misappreciation of the weight of the evidence or for want of a complete inquiry. [P 56 C 1]

K. Banerjee—for Applicant.

Judgment.—This is an application for revision of the order of the District Magistrate directing further inquiry in the case of Emperor v. Nga Min Din in Criminal Regular Case No. 61 of 1917 of the Township Magistrate, Peshawar.

The first objection taken to the order of the District Magistrate is that he has failed to give reasons for ordering further inquiry. The District Magistrate says:

"I do not wish to write a judgment in advance but prima facie it is quite clear that Nga Min Din is the prime mover in this theft and ought never to have been discharged."

Section 437, Criminal P. C., does not require a Court ordering further inquiry to state its reasons. In Tun Win v. Emperor (1) Irwin, J., held that it was sufficient for a Court ordering further inquiry to state as its reasons that it had considered the whole of the evidence on the record. He said that it would be improper for the Magistrate to comment on the evidence in detail, as such a proceeding would tend to prejudice the accused. This opinion has been dissented from in two cases of the Calcutta High Court, Nagendra Nath Sen v. Mr. Korb (2) and Wahed Ali v. Emperor (3), in both of which cases it was held that the Magistrate should state his reasons for ordering further inquiry, as in the absence of such reasons it is not possible for the High Court to exercise supervision over the Magistrate or Judge's proceedings. To the reasons given by the learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court, I may add that it appears to me fair to a person against whom an order for further inquiry is made, that the reasons for directing such inquiry should be made explicit to him and that he should have notice of the ground on which the further inquiry has been directed. To the objection that the accused may be prejudiced in his trial if the reasons for the superior Court's order are made explicit, it may be replied that while it is not ordinarily desirable that a detailed examination of the evidence and elaborate reasons should be given, enough should be said in the way of reasons to indicate to the Court below in what manner it is thought that its order was incorrect, whether on a point of law or in misappreciation of the weight of the evidence or for want of a complete inquiry.

SAUNDERS, J. C.

W. Calogreedy, Advocate, In re.

Civil Misc. Appeal No. 37 of 1916, Decided on 4th July 1916.

Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 340—Magistrate has discretion to permit person including pleader not otherwise authorised to practise in his Court to appear for an accused—Discretion should be exercised judicially.

Every Magistrate has a discretion to permit a person, including a pleader not otherwise authorized to practise in his Court, to appear for a person accused before the Court. This discretion however should be exercised judicially, and permission should be given only in case in which the Magistrate or the presiding officer considers that it is for the interest of the accused that it should be given. In the matter of the Petition of Mr. G. F. Travers Drapes, S. J. L. B. 260 Ref. [P 56 C 2]

H. M. Lutter—for Applicant.

Judgment.—The applicant, who is a second grade advocate whose license does not permit him to practise in the Sagaing District, applied to the District Magistrate, Sagaing, on behalf of certain accused persons who were under trial before the District Magistrate, Sagaing, and the latter recorded an order to the effect that the Advocate could not act in the Sagaing District and the application, therefore could not be granted. The Advocate has now applied to this Court and has obtained permission to appear in the particular case mentioned. He also submits that the order of the District Magistrate was illegal in view of the provisions contained in S. 340, Criminal P. C., which is reproduced and paraphrased in para. 295 of the Upper Burma Courts Manual. The law relating to Advocates in Upper Burma is contained in Ss. 25 to 29 of the Upper Burma Civil Courts Regulation, 1896, and under S. 25 (2) of that Regulation rules have been framed of which the first provides that Advocates of the second grade shall be entitled to appear, plead and act in any four Districts named in their license. S. 340, Criminal P. C., lays down that every person accused before any Criminal Court may of right be defended by a pleader, and "Pleader" when used with reference to any proceeding in any Court, is defined in S. 4 (r), Criminal P. C., as a pleader authorized under any law for the time being in force to practise in such Court, and includes (1) an Advocate, a vakil and an Attorney of a High Court so authorized, and (2) any Mukhtar or other person appointed with the permission of the Court to act in such proceeding.

I think it is clear that an Advocate who is licensed to appear in a certain District or in certain specified districts only, cannot be said to be authorized to practise in a Court beyond the limit of such district or districts. On the other hand, there appears to be no reason why a pleader who is not authorized to appear in any particular Court should not be appointed with the permission of the Court to act on behalf of an accused person, and so to become a pleader within the meaning of the term as defined in the Code of Criminal Procedure. Reference may be made to In the matter of the Petition of Mr. G. F. Travers Drapes (1), in which the question is discussed. I am of opinion that every Magistrate has a discretion to permit a person, including a pleader not otherwise authorised to practise in his Court, to appear for a person accused before the Court. This discretion should no doubt, be exercised judicially and permission should be given sparingly and in such cases as the Magistrate or presiding officer considers that it is for the interest of the accused that it should be given.

K.N./R.K. Appeal dismissed.

Afterwards

PRIDEAUX AND MITTAL, A. J. C's.
Champtria—Plaintiff—Appellant.

v.

M. Laxmi Bai and others—Defendants—Respondents.

First Appeal No. 67 of 1916, Decided on 10th April 1917, from decree of M.H.
Dist. Judge, Nagpur, D. 31st August 1915.

 (a) Court-fees Act (1870), Sch. 2,
Art. 17—Suit for declaration of adoption and right to hold property already in possession dismissed—Court-fees payable on memorandum of appeal is ad valorem fee on value of property.

Plaintiff sued for a declaration that he was the adopted son of one B and therefore entitled to his property of which he was already in possession.
His suit was dismissed by the Court of first instance and he then filed an appeal paying a Rs. 10 court-fee stamp on the memorandum of appeal.

Held: that the court-fees payable on the memorandum of appeal was an ad valorem fee on the value of the property held by the appellant as the adopted son and heir of B. [P 1 C 2]

(b) Court-fees Act (1870), Sch. 2, Art. 17 (3)
—Suit to declare adoption valid is governed by Art. 17 (3).

A suit for a declaration without consequential relief that an adoption is valid is a suit which does not on the face of it admit of being satisfactorily valued and as such it falls under the category of the suits mentioned in Cl. (iii), Art. 17, Sch. 2, Court-fees Act. [P 3 C 2]

(c) Suits Valuation Act (1887), S. 9—High Court and the Local Government have power to raise court-fee—Rules framed have the force of law.

It is not within the jurisdiction of the law Courts to consider as to whether in case of a particular class of suits the High Court and the Local Government exercised their discretion wisely in raising the fixed court-fees by framing the rules under S. 9, Suits Valuation Act, and whether or not, in a suit to declare adoption valid payment of valorem of the property is a reasonable fee. The rules as they stand have the force of law. Cl. (i), Art. 17, Court-fees Act dated 21st September 1911 as reproduced in Jaffar's Commentaries Civil Circular 1911 was promulgated with the intention of affording this relief. [P 3 C 2, P 4 C 1]

(d) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 11—Suit by third person as heir against adoptive mother—Adoption pendente lite—Adopted son not joined as party—Decree is binding on adopted son—Adoption pending suit or pending appeal makes no distinction.

Plaintiff's adoption took place during the pendency of a suit brought by defendant B. against the defendant mother of the plaintiff claiming to be the heir of deceased B. The plaintiff was not joined in the suit as a party.

Held: that the decree in the previous suit operated as res judicata and was binding on the plaintiff. 16 Cal. 40; (P. C.), 1901. [P 3 C 1]

There is no distinction in this respect between a case in which the adoption takes place pending a suit or one in which it is made after the decree, but pending an appeal: 3 M. L. J. 539, Foll.;

(e) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 22, R. 10—Adoptive mother sued as representing estate—Minor adopted son is sufficiently represented —Hindu Law, Widow.

A minor adopted son is sufficiently represented by his adoptive mother where the latter is sued as representing the estate and the suit is fairly and properly conducted. [P 5 C 2; P 6 C 1]

(f) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 22, R. 10—Adoption is not creation of interest—"Devolution" does not include adoption.

An adoption is not the creation of an interest within the meaning of O. 22, R. 10, Civil P. C.
It is the creation of a status to which certain incidents are attached by the law. The word "devolution" in the rule does not include adoption as the estate after an adoption does not devolve, i. e., pass from one person to another, but is vested in the adopted son after it is divested from the adoptive mother. [P 6 C 1]

(g) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 22, R. 10—Adoption pendente lite is not alienation.

An adoption pendente lite is not an alienation pendente lite: 5 Bom. 630, Foll. [P 6 C 1]

The law of procedure since 1859 has not been changed so far as the joinder of a son adopted pendente lite is concerned. [P 6 C 1]

Drake-Brockman, J. C. and Pri-deaux, A. J. C.—We find it necessary to refer to a third Judge under Cl. (b) (ii), S. 6-A, Central Provinces Courts Act 1904, the question whether court-fee of Rs. 10 suffices for relief (a) claimed in this appeal or whether an ad valorem fee on the value of the property now held by the appellant as adopted son and heir of Bhaskar Rao is payable under the Notification (No. 1641, dated 28th September 1911) reproduced in para. 1, Civil Circular No. II-8. The view held by one of us is that expressed in Civil Revision No. 55-B of 1916 decided by himself and Stanyon, A.J.C. on 30th September 1916. The other appears in the order passed on 23rd June last in First Appeal No. 36 of 1915. The latter view proceeds on the assumption that S. 9, Suits Valuation Act 1887, cannot reasonably be read as conferring any power of valuation in respect of suits for which the Court-fees Act, 1870, prescribes a fixed fee without any sort of reference to the possibility of estimating value. The facts of the present case are briefly these. Bhaskar Rao and Nilkanth Rao were two brothers who both died in 1899, the former dying first. Each left a widow, Bhaskar's being Lakshmi Bai (defendant 1) and Nilkanth's Bhagirathi Bai (defendant 2). The appellant claims to have been adopted by Lakshmi Bai to the deceased Bhaskar and so to be entitled as heir to the share of the joint family property which Bhaskar obtained at a partition said to have been made in 1896. Of what that share would be, had the alleged partition taken place; the appellant alleges himself to be already in possession. The real contest is with defendant 3, Shamrao, who denies the partition and adoption and sets up title as an illegitimate son of Nilkanth.

The suit has been dismissed and relief (a) claimed in the memorandum of appeal appears to fall under Cl. (iii), Art. 17, Sch. 2, Court fees Act i. e., what the appellant desires is a declaratory decree where no consequential relief is prayed.

If S. 9, Suits Valuation Act, is held to give power to raise the court-fee above Rs. 10, the question will still remain whether Notification 1641, dated 28th September 1911, was necessarily intended to effect that result where the appeal as framed is for a relief such as we have described. We have assumed that the court-fee payable in appeal must be calculated in the same way as if that payable in a suit were in question. Our difference of opinion is referred for the decision of Mr. Batten, Additional Judicial Commissioner.

Batten, A. J. C.—This is a reference under Cl. (b) (ii), S. 6-A, Central Provinces Courts Act, 1904, two of the Judges of this Court having disagreed. The facts, as stated in the reference, are as follows: Bhaskar Rao and Nilkanth Rao were two brothers who both died in 1899, the former dying first. Each left a widow, Bhaskar's being Lakshmi Bai (defendant 1) and Nilkanth's being Bhagirathi Bai (defendant 2). The appellant Ganpatrao claims to have been adopted by Lakshmi Bai to the deceased Bhaskar, and so to be entitled as heir to the share of the joint family property which Bhaskar obtained at a partition said to have been made in 1896. Of what that share would be, had the alleged partition taken place, the appellant alleges himself to be already in possession. The real contest is with defendant 3, Shamrao, who denied the partition and adoption and sets up title as an illegitimate son of Nilkanth. Shamrao sued both the widows for possession in Suit No. 474 of 1910, on the ground that Nilkanth Rao took the entire property by survivorship, and succeeded.

In the present suit and in appeal the plaintiff Ganpatrao claims three reliefs in the form of declarations, of which the most important described as relief (a) is a declaration that he is the adopted son of Bhaskar, and therefore entitled to his property, of which he is already in possession. The court-fee paid on the plaint was ad valorem on the value of the property, stated to be Rs. 12,000, but that paid on the memorandum of appeal is Rs. 10 for each declaration. In the reference, and in the arguments before me, it has been assumed that the Court-fee payable in appeal must be calculated in the same way as if that payable in a suit were in question. The point for decision before me is whether a court-fee of Rs. 10 offices for relief (a), or whether an ad valorem fee on the value of the property now held by the appellant as an adopted son and heir is payable under the Notification (No. 1641 dated 28th September 1911) reproduced in para. 1 of Civil Circular II-8. The view held by Pridemore, Additional Judicial Commissioner, has been expressed in Civil Revision No. 55 B of 1915, in which the plaintiff asked for a declaration that an adoption was void. The learned Judges held that the suit was one to set aside an adoption and observed:

"The suit thus falls under Sch. 2, Art. 17 (v), Court Fees Act. That Article contains the classes of suit, which require a court-fee of Rs. 10 under the Act, in every province where there has been no amendment of the schedule. But S. 9, Suits Valuation Act provides for amendment by way of rules made by the High Court with the sanction of the Local Government. In those Provinces such an amendment has been made with reference to suits under para. (vi) and such forms of suit falling under para. (vi). Therefore when a suit to declare an adoption valid affects (as is not to be denied) a title to property exceeding Rs. 100 in value, then the words 'ten rupees' must be read, for the purpose of the Court-fees Act, as 'ad valorem such property.' In other words, Cl. 2, Sch. 2, Art. 17, should be read thus 'ten rupees unless otherwise ordered by any rule made under S. 9, Suits Valuation Act, 1887.'"

The view of Drake-Brockman, Judicial Commissioner, appears in his order passed on 23rd June 1915, in First Appeal No. 36 of 1915, in the following words:

"I have read the papers showing how the notification of 1888 (No. 2240, 7th June), which corresponds to that now reproduced in para. 1 of Civil Circular II-8, came to be issued and find that the then Judicial Commissioner did not intend to affect the court-fee payable in any case in which a fixed fee is prescribed by the Court-fees Act, cases falling under Art. 17 (vi), Sch. 2, alone excepted: see para. 3 of Registrar's No. 1597, dated 28th May 1888. The notification may thus be read as applying in accordance with that intention. Hence if the suit falls strictly and solely within Art. 17 (iii) or Art. 17 (v), Sch. 2, the proviso to the notification should not be applied any more than the third of the three clauses which precede it."

The relevant portion of the notification runs as follows:

"Under S. 9, Suits Valuation Act, 1887, the Judicial Commissioner, with the previous sanction of the Chief Commissioner, directs that suits of the following classes shall for the purposes of the Court-fees Act, 1870, the Suits Valuation Act, 1887, the Central Provinces Courts Act, 1901, be treated as if the subject-matter of such suits were of the value of four hundred rupees: (1) Suits for the institution of conjugal rights, for declaration of the validity of a marriage, or for a divorce; (2) suits for the custody or guardianship of a minor; (3) suits for a declaration that an adoption is valid or invalid: Provided that if a suit for a declaration that an adoption is valid or invalid affects a title to property, then the value of that property, if it is under Rs. 100, shall be deemed to be the value of the subject-matter of the suit."

As explained in the reference, the view of Drake-Brockman, Judicial Commissioner, proceeds upon the assumption that S. 9, Suits Valuation Act cannot reasonably be read as conferring any power of valuation in respect of suits for which the Court-fees Act prescribes a fixed fee without any sort of reference to the possibility of estimating value. Moreover the relief (v) claimed in the memorandum of appeal falls under Cl. (iii), Art. 17, Sch. 2, Court-fees Act, since the appellant desires a declaratory decree where no consequential relief is prayed. The reference also raises the question whether, even if S. 9, Suits Valuation Act gives power to raise the court-fee above Rs. 10, the notification was necessarily intended to effect this result where the appeal as framed is for a relief such as is here claimed. As to the power conferred by S. 9, Suits Valuation Act, a suit for a declaration, without consequential relief, that an adoption is valid is undoubtedly, in my opinion, a suit which does not on the face of it admit of being satisfactorily valued. This view is, I consider, confirmed by the fact that a suit for a mere declaration of this kind falls under Cl. (iii), Art. 17, Sch. 2, and in Cl. (vi) of the same Article, the words used are:

"Every other suit where it is not possible to estimate at a money value the subject-matter in dispute."

It appears to me that the court-fee of Rs. 10 fixed for suits falling under Art. 17 was an arbitrary fee fixed for convenience and that S. 9, Suits Valuation Act enacted that this fee, fixed on an arbitrary valuation, should be regarded as provisional, and liable to be supplanted, in the case of selected classes of suits, by a court-fee based on what the High Court and the Local Government considered to be a reasonable basis of valuation. Whether in the case of a particular class of suits the High Court and Local Government exercised their discretion wisely, and whether or not in a suit of the present class a court-fee ad valorem of the property is a reasonable fee, are questions beyond the jurisdiction of the Courts. The rules as they stand have the force of law.

It is also to be observed that the Chief Court of the Punjab has under S. 9, Suits Valuation Act, directed that suits of the nature described under head (v), Art. 17, Sch. 2, Court-fees Act, shall for the purposes of that Act be treated as if their subject-matter were of the value of Rs. 200 on which the fee is Rs. 15, although a suit falling under head (v) (suit to set aside an adoption) is one of a definite nature for which the Court-fees Act prescribes a fixed fee without any sort of reference to the possibility of estimating value. The Judicial Commissioner of Oudh also under S. 9, Suits Valuation Act has directed that suits in which the plaintiff asks for a decree establishing or annulling an adoption shall be treated as if their subject-matter was of the value of Rs. 400 for the purposes of the Court fees Act. As to the second question, whether the Notification was necessarily intended to have the result of making the court-fee in this particular class of merely declaratory suits dependent on the value of the property affected the meaning of a notification is primarily to be gathered from the terms of the notification itself, and no other meaning can in my opinion be given to the terms of this Notification than that the court-fee for a suit for a declaration that an adoption is valid or invalid is dependent on the value of the property, if the title to the property is affected by the validity of the adoption. Cl. (3) as well as the proviso on the face of them appear to have been intended to apply to suits of the present kind. It is true that from portion of the Registrar's letter submitting the draft notification it would seem that the Judicial Commissioner did not intend to affect the court-fee payable in any case for which a fixed fee is prescribed by the Court-fees Act; but the letter must be read as a whole, together with the draft notification submitted with it; and that draft notification and the previous correspondence plainly indicate the desire of the then Judicial Commissioner that a plaint in a suit for a declaration that an adoption is valid or invalid should bear a court-fee of a higher value than Rs. 10.

For these reasons my opinion is the same as that of Pridaux, A. J. C. and I consider that the court-fee payable for relief (a) claimed in appeal should be ad valorem on the value of the property now held by the appellant as adopted son and heir of Bhaskar Rao.

[On receipt of the above opinion Pridaux, and Mittra, A. J. Cs. delivered the following]

Judgment.—The plaintiff-appellant's case is that Bhaskar Rao and Nilkant Rao were two brothers who about the year 1886 divided their estate in the manner described in the plaint.

Bhaskar Rao died on 24th June 1889, leaving a widow Mt. Laxmi Bai (defendant 1). Nilkant Rao died on 12th September 1889, leaving a widow Bhagirathi Bai (defendant 2). Defendant 3 Sham Rao claimed to be the illegitimate son of Nilkant Rao. The plaintiff further states that after the death of Bhaskar Rao and Nilkant Rao their widows confirmed the partition effected during their husbands' lifetime, and a registered deed of partition was executed on 27th January 1907. Defendant 3 had obtained a decree against defendants 1 and 2 in Suit No. 474 of 1910, but the plaintiff was no party to this suit, and so he says he is not bound by the decree. The plaintiff alleges that Nilkant Rao was a Kshatrya by caste, and defendant 3 was not a dasi putra and therefore not entitled to the property of Nilkant Rao. The plaintiff claims to have been adopted by defendant 1 on 7th January 1911 under an authority given by Bhaskar Rao in a document which is said to have been filed in Suit No. 3 of 1902 brought by defendant 4 against defendants 1 and 2. Defendant 4 was joined as a party on his own application, as he alleged that he was the adopted son of Nilkant Rao. The plaintiff however does not admit the adoption. The plaintiff sues for a declaration, (1) that he is the adopted son of Bhaskar Rao and entitled to the property left by the latter; (2) that he is entitled to the property of Nilkant Rao after defendant 2's death as his next reversioner; and (3) that the decree obtained by defendant 3 in respect of the said property of Bhaskar Rao and Nilkant Rao in Suit No. 474 of 1910 is not binding upon the plaintiff. The plaintiff also sues for confirmation of possession of the estate of Bhaskar Rao. Defendant 4, in addition to his rights as an adopted son of Nilkant Rao, pleaded that he was the next reversioner of Nilkant Rao as the latter's sister's son.

The main defence by defendant 3, who is in possession of the estate, was a denial of the validity of the plaintiff's adoption. It was also alleged that there was no partition between the brothers, and that they were joint till their death; that Nilkant Rao obtained the estate by survivorship and after his death it passed to his illegitimate son. The defendants denied the document which is said to have authorized Laxmi Bai to adopt. Various issues were framed, but the case has been decided on grounds of law. The view taken by the lower Court is that the decree in the previous Suit No. 474 of 1910, operated as res judicata that the decision in that suit that the brothers were joint is binding on the plaintiff and that the plaintiff is not entitled to question the rights of defendant 3 as dastiputra of Nilkant Rao. It was also held that the plaintiff's adoption was bad inasmuch as it had the effect of divesting a vested estate, that is the estate of defendant 3. The plaintiff's suit has therefore been dismissed and this appeal has been filed by the plaintiff. There are two questions for decision. One is whether the decree in the previous suit is res judicata, and the other is whether the plaintiff's adoption is valid in law. It is however not argued before us that even on the finding that the brothers Baskar Rao and Nilkant Rao were joint the adoption of the plaintiff is valid. We have therefore at this stage to confine ourselves to a consideration of the first question. The learned Additional District Judge held that the Privy Council case of Hari Saran Moitra v. Bhubaneswari Debi (1) governs this case and the plaintiff who was then a minor, though adopted after the institution of Suit No. 474 of 1910, was bound by the decree though not made a party to that suit.

In the case before the Privy Council decree was passed against Bhubaneswari, who pending appeals to the High Court against the decree, adopted Jotindra Mohan, a minor, who was however not brought on the record as a party. The appellate decree was more unfavourable to the minor than the original decree. Their Lordships held that the minor was bound by the ultimate result of the litigation, as it was never suggested that the case was improperly defended. In the case before us the adoption took place after the institution of the suit but before the decree was passed in the original Court. It is not suggested either in the pleadings or in the grounds of appeal that the minor's adoptive mother did not properly conduct the litigation, though in the arguments an attempt was made to show that documents not filed in the previous suit are now available. But this was a matter for pleadings and we cannot therefore allow it to be raised now. The case however is sought to be distinguished on two grounds. It is urged in the first place that in the Privy Council case there was already a decree before the adoption. It is also pointed out that the law of procedure has since changed.

We are unable to agree with the appellant's contention that although a minor, if adopted after a decree is bound by the final decree in the case without being made a party to the appellate proceedings, he is not bound if his adoption takes place pending the litigation in the first Court. Unless the minor is otherwise represented, he is entitled to be made a party in the first Court just as well as in the appellate Court in order that he should be bound by the decree. In the earlier Privy Council case of Dhurm Das Pandey v. Mt. Shama Soondri Dibiah (2), the adoption took place when the suit was pending in the Court of the first instance. Yet, in the later case Dhurm Das Pandey v. Mt. Shama Soondri Dibiah (2), was cited in support of the view taken by their Lordships. In our opinion the case before us cannot be distinguished on the first ground suggested.

It is perfectly true as argued for the appellant that the present Code of Procedure lays down rules which must be complied with in order to bind a minor defendant as a party and the law of procedure in this respect is less elastic than it was under the Code of 1859. But in this case the minor was not made a party. Therefore a consideration of the present rules of procedure becomes unnecessary. The principle underlying the decision in Hari Saran Moitra v. Bhubaneswari Debi (1) is that a minor an adopted son is sufficiently represented by the adoptive mother when the latter is sued as representing the estate and when

(1) [1889] 16 Cal. 40=15 I. A. 195 (P. C.).

(2) [1941] 3 M. I. A. 229=6 W. R. 43 (P. C.).

It is pointed out that under Act 8 of 1859 there was no section corresponding to S. 372 of the Code of 1877 and 1882. The appellant's learned counsel argues that there was a creation or devolution of an interest pending the suit and therefore the provision of S. 372 of the previous Code, that is O. 22, R. 10, applies to the case. In our opinion an adoption is not the creation of an interest within the meaning of that section. It is the creation of a status to which certain incidents are attached by the law. The term creation is used in the sense of an assignment that is transfer of an interest not amounting to an assignment. Again the word "devolution" means the passing of an interest from one person to another. An adoption has the effect of divesting the estate of the adoptive mother. The interest acquired by the adoption is the estate as it was in the hands of the adoptive father subject to any rights properly created by the widow for legal necessity. We think therefore that the word "devolution" does not include the case of an adoption. No reported cases have been shown to us nor have we been able to find any in which S. 372, or O. 22, R. 10, has been held applicable to the case of an adoption pendente lite. In Rambhat v. Lakshman Chintaman Mayalay (3) Westrop, C.J., points out that an adoption pendente lite is not an alienation pendente lite.

If an adopted son has to be made a party then this is not in pursuance of any statutory provision specifically enacted for the purpose but under the inherent powers of the Court which are exercised in accordance with natural justice. In other words the law of procedure since 1859 has not been changed so far as the joinder of an adopted son pendente lite is concerned. It is argued for the appellant that the respondent Shamrao knew of the adoption before the decree was passed in the previous suit. For the purposes of this appeal we must assume this to have been the case. But the position of the respondent Shamrao is that he was disputing the alleged adoption and therefore it was for the adoptive mother to have applied for the plaintiff being brought on the record as a party. In the judgment of Hari Saran

"Act 10 of 1877 came into force on 1st October 1877, nearly three years after the decree of the High Court. If it was material that no action was taken under S. 372, it appears to their Lordships that the question whether the adoption was or was not known to the decree-holder was a matter upon which an opinion should have been pronounced."

Their Lordships decided the case of Hari Saran Moitra v. Bhubaneswari Debi (1) without referring to whether or not the plaintiff in that suit had knowledge of the adoption. This may be either because Act 10 of 1877 was inapplicable to the case or it may be that S. 372 of the said Act did not contemplate a case of an adoption. We have therefore considered ourselves free to hold that S. 372 of the previous Code or O. 22, R. 10, has no application to an adoption. In the well-known Shivagunga case Katama Natchiar v. Rajah of Shivagunga (4) it was laid down that where a Hindu widow sues or is sued as representing the inheritance, any decree fairly obtained against her will bind the succeeding heirs. Such a decree will undoubtedly bind a son adopted after the decree. This is on the principle that the widow represented the inheritance when the decree was passed, but the case of Hari Saran Moitra v. Bhubaneswari Debi (1) seems to extend the principle even when the widow has ceased to represent the inheritance by reason of an adoption of a minor son pendente lite. Such a minor son is sufficiently represented by the widow in the absence of fraud collusion or gross negligence on her part. The principle is stated by their Lordships by the following quotation from the earlier case in Dhurm Das Pandey v. Musammat Shama Soondri Dibiah (2):

"All the facts being stated, it is assumed as matter of law that after she had executed the act of adoption, she prosecuted the suit only as guardian of her adopted son. Then as the suit must be considered as afterwards prosecuted by her in her name for his benefit, the decree must be considered for his benefit, and that she is put in possession as trustee for him."

Subbanna v. Venkatakrishnan (5) is a case where the adoption had taken place before the institution of the suit. Therefore, the principle laid down in Hari Saran Moitra v. Bhubaneswari Debi (1) does not apply to it. In Rambhat v. Lakshman Chintaman Mayalay (3) it was held that a father did not represent the family in respect of a gift or sale and a decree obtained against him was not binding upon a son adopted during the pendency of the suit. Padgaya Somshetti v. Baji Babaji (6) has no bearing on the case before us. In Raj Doollub Sircar v. Ooma Churn Biswas (7) the father was sued in his personal capacity and not in a representative capacity, and hence the decree was held not binding on the son. These are all the cases cited on behalf of the appellant. We have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff was sufficiently represented in the previous litigation by his adoptive mother. The plaintiff was then a minor and his adoptive mother would in ordinary course have been conducting the litigation on his behalf. There is no allegation that there was fraud, collusion or gross negligence on her part in putting forward the right defence. We therefore hold that the plaintiff is bound by the decree passed in Suit No. 474 of 1910. As we have already pointed out, it is not disputed that if that decree operates as res judicata, we must hold Bhaskar Rao and Nilkant Rao were joint in estate. After the death of Nilkant Rao, the last surviving coparcener, his estate was inherited by his illegitimate son Shamrao. The plaintiff's adoption, therefore, which has the effect of divesting a vested estate, is invalid in law. The result is that the appeal is dismissed with costs.

(4) [1861] 9 M. I. A. 539=2 W. R. 31 (P. O.).

(5) [1888] 11 Mad. 403.

Tilochan Gond—Plaintiff—Respondent.

Second Appeal No. 231 of 1916, Decided on 20th August 1917, from appeal decree of Divl. Judge, Chhattisgarh Divn., in Civil Appeal No. 3 of 1916, D/- 1st March 1916.

* (a) Hindu Law—Succession—Apostasy taking form of conversion to religion which in itself regulates devolution of property—Convert becomes subject to law of adopted religion.

Apostates from the Hindu religion cease to be Hindus and where such apostasy takes the form of conversion to a religion which in itself regulates the devolution of property, e. g., the Mahomedan religion, then, except on proof of a well-established custom to the contrary and that only in regard to inheritance and succession, the convert becomes subject to the law of his adopted religion. [P 11 C 1]

(b) C. P. Laws Act (1875), S. 5—"Hindu" meaning of, explained.

The terms "Hindu" in S. 5, Central Provinces Laws Act, 1875, refers to persons who profess some form of the Hindu religion, whatever be the branch, school, sect, or offshoot or denomination to which they may belong, but it does not extend to persons who have never professed any form of the Hindu religion or to those who have been converted from it to some entirely different religion. The word would apply to dissenters and non-conformists but not to apostates. Thus a Hindu is a Hindu, but a Brahmin converted to Buddhism or Islam is not. [P 11 C 2]

(c) Hindu Law—Applicability—Gonds not being Hindus are not governed by Hindu law except by custom.

The Gonds in the Central Provinces are not Hindus and they are not governed by the Hindu law except when it is adopted by any family, sect or branch among them. [P 12 C 2]

(d) Hindu Law—Applicability—Gonds not being Hindus at all cannot be regarded as Sudras.

Every Hindu, properly so called, who does not belong to one or other of the three regenerate classes is a Sudra, and to him the Hindu law relating to Sudra applies of its own force, but no non-Hindu can be a Sudra, any more than he can be a member of any of the regenerate classes. Since a Gond is not a Hindu at all he cannot be brought within the category of Sudras. [P 13 C 2]

(e) Hindu Law—Applicability—Hindu must be presumed to be governed by law of his locality.

Although the Hindu law is primarily a personal law, it has also become attached to localities, and therefore a Hindu must be presumed to be governed by the law of the locality where he resides. [P 13 C 2]

(f) Hindu Law—Applicability—Non-Hindu calling himself Hindu or adopting Hindu usages—Hindu law does not apply to him.

A man does not become a Hindu by calling himself one, nor is the adoption by a non-Hindu of usages resembling some parts of the Hindu law a sufficient ground for applying the whole of that law to him en bloc, in the same way and to the same extent as if he were a Hindu. [P 14 C 2]

(g) Hindu Law—Applicability—Family adopting Hinduism—Burden of proving that it is governed by Hindu law is upon person asserting so.

In the case of a family which is not originally Hindu but which has adopted Hinduism, the burden of proving that the family is governed in a particular matter by the Hindu law is upon the person who asserts that it is so governed. [P 16 C 1]

(b) Precedents—Stare decisis—Unconscious application of wrong law unchallenged owing to ignorance cannot set up "stare decisis."

An unconscious application of wrong law cannot set up a principle of stare decisis merely because it has been left unchallenged for a few years owing to the ignorance of the people affected by it. [P¹⁵ C 1]

Judgment.—The following genealogical tree will facilitate comprehension of this judgment :

The parties are Gonds domiciled in the Bemetara Tahsil of the Drug District, but to which subdivision or sect of the Gond tribe they belong cannot be ascertained from the record. The property in dispute is an 8 annas share of the village Amlid in the Bemetara Tahsil. It is the case of the plaintiff that the whole village once belonged to Sobha; that on the death of Sobha it devolved first on his sons, and then on his grandsons Bankhandi and Tilochan; that the grandsons effected a partition, after which each of them held an 8 annas share in severalty, that Bankhandi died about 22 years before this suit and his half-share was inherited by his mother Mt. Bayan, and that on her demise, which took place on 13th August 1914, the plaintiff became entitled to the share as the reversioner of Bankhandi but that the defendant had wrongfully possessed herself of the same and obtained mutation of names in her favour. On these allegations the plaintiff brought the present suit to recover the share.

It has been found that the village of Amlidih was once the property of Sobha that Bankhandi and Tilochan partitioned it after it had devolved on them; that on Bankhandi's death his share was inherited by his mother, who held it till her death on 13th August 1914. These facts are now beyond dispute.

But it is manifest that the plaintiff claims to apply the Hindu law of the Mitakshara to this case. If that law applies he is beyond doubt the present owner of the share in dispute. But the defendant has pleaded that the family are Gonds and not Hindus, and that the Mitakshara does not govern the devolution of the estate. The first Court took it to be a matter beyond discussion that inheritance in the family of the parties is governed by the Mitakshara as interpreted by the Benares School—that being the Hindu lex loci in the Central Provinces. It therefore gave the plaintiff a decree. The lower appellate Court considered more closely the defendant's plea as to the personal law applicable, and ruled that, prima facie, the Mitakshara applied, and the onus lay on the defendant to prove that it was otherwise; and that she had failed to establish any custom at variance with the law. The decree of the first Court was therefore confirmed. The defendant has now made this second appeal, and again it is urged that the Mitakshara does not govern inheritance in her family; that it lay on the plaintiff to prove that he is the heir in preference to the defendant to the estate which belonged to the defendant's mother; and that he has failed to discharge that burden. It will be seen that the main issue in the case relates to the onus of proof. On the one hand, is it to be presumed, until the contrary is shown, that inheritance among the Gonds generally, or at least among Gonds of the class and locality to which the parties belong, is governed by the Hindu law? Or, on the other hand, is it the case that Gonds are non-Hindus who must be proved to have adopted the Hindu law as their own before it can be applied to them? If the former is the correct point of view, then this appeal must fail. If the latter is the right standpoint from which this case should be approached, then this appeal must succeed.

The decision of the question before me has been rendered difficult. (1) by uncertainty attaching to the significance of the words "Hindu" and "Sudra"; (2) by the conditions arising out of apostasy and dissent on the part of tribes, sects, and families of Hindu origin, whose abandonment of the Hindu orthodoxy in religion has been accompanied by the adoption of customs at variance with the personal law of Hindus; and (3) by the fact that tribes, communities, and families, non-Hindu in origin, by imitation and assimilation due to a long association with Hindus, have so far accepted the Hindu law as their own that the British Indian Courts have habitually applied it to them in the same way as if they were Hindus. The policy of the British Government has always been directed towards the preservation of the personal laws and customs of each and every one of the diverse races inhabiting India, and successive legislative enactments have been brought into force from time to time to maintain and give effect to that policy. The original statute was 21, Geo. 3, C. 70, the preamble whereof stated :

"that the inhabitants should be maintained and protected in the enjoyments of all their ancient laws, usages, rights and privileges;"

while the Act provided that

"inheritance and succession to lands, rents and goods and all matters of contract and dealing between party and party shall be determined in the case of Mahomedans by the laws and usages of Mahomedans, and in the case of Gentils by the laws and usages of Gentils; and when only one of the parties shall be a Mahomedan or Gentil, by the laws and usages of the Gentils."

Apparently the word "Gentils" was used to denote the non-Mahomedan inhabitants of this country much after the manner in which Gentiles were distinguished from the Jews of Palestine in ancient times. The significance of the word was discussed in Lopes v. Lopes (1), where it was referred to as "the Portuguese idiom for Gentiles," and held to signify "Hindus." In a large and liberal sense of that term." From this decision we learn that an even more general phrase, "India Natives," was once employed by British legislators and that a charter of 1726

"contains the earliest trace (in Royal Charters) of a reservation to the natives resident in our territories in India of their laws and customs."

The above statute (21 Geo. 3, C. 70) applied only to Bengal, but the same provisions were made for Bombay and Madras by 37 Geo. 3, C. 142, 40 Geo. 3, C. 79 and 4 Geo. 4, C. 71. The principle enforced by these statutes has been embodied in subsequent enactments of the Government of India, until now every part of British India has legislative preservation of the personal laws and customs of its people. In a very recent case, Rani Itagwan Kuar v. Bose (2), their Lordships of the Privy Council made the following remarks :

"A long series of legislative provisions have been enacted for the purpose of securing to the people of India the maintenance of their ancient law, amongst others in matters of inheritance and succession, and many minor enactments have been passed to facilitate the administration of the laws so preserved. The object and principle of this legislation has been throughout to enable the people of various races and creeds in India to live under the law to which they and their fathers had been accustomed, and to which they were bound by so many ties. The framers of the earlier Acts, regulations, and charters had a less detailed acquaintance than we have now with the diversities of creed and of indigenous law existing in India. They were familiar with two great classes, Mahomedan and Hindu, each with its own law, based on ancient and religious principles. They thought no doubt that these laws were amply providing for the civil rights according to Mahomedan and Mahomedan personal law, and for rights as they were sometimes called, the Hindu law. In process of time, however, more and more clearly understood that there were more forces than one of the Mahomedan law, and more forces than one of the Hindu law, and the Courts acting in the name of the Legislature, have applied this law of such and such persons, and such and such law, and in the course of years it has become known that there were religious bodies in India which had not been noticed and under various circumstances, developed and in the application of the Hindu system, and whose members have nevertheless continued to live under Hindu law. Of these the Hindus and such are conspicuous examples. These cases have been considered by the Courts and in dealing with them a liberal construction was always placed upon the enactments by which Mahomedan and Hindu were limited in the enjoyment of their own laws."

The share of the Central Provinces in these legislative enactments for the preservation of personal laws is represented by the Central Provinces Laws Act, 1875 (20 of 1875). Sec. 5 and 6 thereof provide as follows :

"In questions regarding inheritance, special property of families, betrothal, marriage, dower, adoption, guardianship, minority, bastardy, family relations, wills, legacies, gifts, partitions or any religious usage or institution, the rule of decision shall be the Mahomedan law in cases where the parties are Mahomedans, and the Hindu law in cases where the parties are Hindus, except in so far as such law has been by legislative enactment altered or abolished, or is opposed to the provisions of this Act. Provided that when among any class or body of persons or among the members of any family any custom prevails which is inconsistent with the law applicable to such persons under this section, and which, if not inconsistent with such law, would have been given effect to as legally binding such custom shall notwithstanding anything herein contained be given effect to. In cases not provided for by S. 5, or by any other law for the time being in force, the Courts shall act according to justice, equity and good conscience."

It will be convenient to notice here certain other British Indian enactments which have a bearing in matters of inheritance and succession in British India. Act 21 of 1850 (which by Act 14 of 1897 was given the short title of "the Caste Disabilities Removal Act, 1850" and has sometimes been referred to as "the Lex Loci Act") provides as follows :

(1) [1869 69] 5 B. H. C. R. O. C. J. 172.

"So much of any law or usage now in force within the territories subject to the Government of the East India Company as inflicts on any person forfeiture of rights or property, or may be held in any way to impair or affect any right of inheritance by reason of his or her renouncing or having been excluded from the communion of any religion, or being deprived of caste, shall cease to be enforced as law in the Courts of the East India Company, and in the Courts established by Royal Charter within the said territories."

This enactment was extended to the whole of British India by the Local Laws Extent Act, 1874 (15 of 1874) and to the Scheduled Districts of the Central Provinces by Notification in the Gazette of India, 1879, Part I, p. 771. In the Indian Succession Act, 1865 (10 of 1865), the following provisions are relevant :

"2. Except as provided by this Act, or by any other law for the time being in force, the rules herein contained shall constitute the law of British India applicable to all cases of intestate or testamentary successions."

"331. The provisions of this Act shall not apply to intestate or testamentary succession to the property of any Hindu, Mahomedan, or Buddhist ;"

332. The Governor-General of India in Council shall from time to time have power to exempt from the operation of the whole or any part of this Act, the members of any race, sect, or tribe in British India, or any part of such race, sect, or tribe, to whom he may consider it impossible or inexpedient to apply the provisions of this Act, or of the part of the Act mentioned in the order."

Under the last of the above provisions Native Christians in Coorg, Jews in Aden, and certain aboriginal races in Assam have been exempted from the operation of S. 2 by notifications issued respectively in 1868, 1886 and 1887 ; but no exemption of any persons in the Central Provinces outside the categories of Hindus, Mahomedans and Buddhists has so far been made by Gazette Notification. The Parsi Intestate Succession Act (21 of 1855) however exempts Parsis from the law of intestate succession embodied in Act 10 of 1865. Turning now to a closer consideration of Ss. 5 and 6, Act 20 of 1875, it seems to me that the purpose of the legislature was to provide for the preservation, as far as practicable of the ancestral domestic law of each and every class of the inhabitants of the Central Provinces by placing the entire population under three main heads which may be named (1) Mahomedans, (2) Hindus and (3) Others. The law thus set up may be summarized as below :

For all classes.—The statute law, so far as it applies, is the paramount authority.

For Mahomedans.—Mahomedan Law

For Hindus.—Hindu Law

Subject to modifications created (1) by statutory law and (2) by valid custom.

For Others.—Personal law, if any, subject to Statute law and valid custom ; and failing any established law or custom, an application of the principles of equity, justice and good conscience as understood by the British Indian Courts.

The questions immediately before me may be stated thus :

"(1) Are the parties to this suit Hindus within the meaning of that term in S. 5, Act 20 of 1875 ? If not

(2) By what law or custom is the decision of this case to be governed ?"

As pointed out by the Judicial Committee in the case above cited the Indian legislature has used the term "Hindu" in a much wider sense in some enactments than in others. In some it has always been interpreted to include Jains and Sikhs ; in others (e. g., the Hindu Wills Act, 1870) it is used to signify Hindus other than Jains and Sikhs. Indeed the history of Indian legislation suggests a progressive reduction of the term "Hindu" to its proper limitations. We first see the term "India Natives." Then we get "Mahomedans and Gentus" to represent the whole Indian population. Next we have it explained that Gentus do not include people of European origin such as the Portuguese, and the word is taken to be synonymous with Hindus as denoting nonMahomedan Asiatics domiciled in India. Soon after we see Buddhists removed from this general category ; and about the same time some dissenters from the orthodox Hindu religion are distinguished by special denominations—Jains and Sikhs—from other Hindus.

This treatment of the subject introduces complexity and doubt into the interpretation of the word "Hindu" for juristic purposes at the present day. The customary significance of the word in popular parlance is even more uncertain. In Trevalyan's Hindu Law at pp. 18 and 19 the expression "Hindus" is defined as including not only the persons who profess what is called the Hindu religion, but also such of their descendants as have not openly abjured that religion. That implies that apostates from the Hindu religion cease to be Hindus; and it seems to be accepted now as a rule of law that where such apostasy takes the form of conversion to a religion which in itself regulates the devolution of property, e.g., the Mahomedan religion, then, except on proof of a well-established custom to the contrary, and that only in regard to inheritance and succession the convert becomes subject to the law of his adopted religion: Abraham v. Abraham (3), Mahomed Sulek v. Haji Ahmed (4), Raj Bahadur v. Bibee Dayal (5), Bai Muchhrai v. Bai Hirbai (6), Rasid Karmali v. Sherbanoo (7).

Dr. Gour in his comprehensive work on the Law of Transfer in British India, 4th Edition, Volume I, at pp. 28 and 29, in dealing with the question who are Hindus, writes:

"Although the term 'Hindu' is popularly understood to comprise only such people as follow the Hindu religion, or rather its ceremonial observances, a wider class of people are subject to Hindu law. And while it may truly be said of a Hindu, nascitur non fit still it is often difficult to reconcile the juristic conception of the term with its popular notion."

It seems to me that some of this difficulty is due to a confusion of the question who is a Hindu with the question who is subject to the Hindu law. I shall endeavour to keep these questions distinct in this judgment. Mr. G. C. Sastri, in his work on Hindu Law does not give us any express definition of a Hindu; but the whole tenor of the treatise shows that the learned author applied the name to those persons only who profess the Hindu religion. In West and Buhler's Hindu Law, though the extent of the operation of the Hindu law is dealt with fully, there is no express definition of the word "Hindu"; but here also the expression seems to have been used throughout in a theological sense. There is a certain amount of case law in support of the view that the word "Hindu" is denominative of a religion and not of a race.

I need only refer to the following remarks of Parsons, J., in Dagree v. Pacothi San Jao (8):

"There is no race of Hindus. It is not the inhabitants of Hindustan who are Hindus, but those only of them who profess a religion which is called the Hindu religion. Just so there is no race of Mahomedans or of Buddhists, or of Christians. An argument that a Christian, who has adopted the Mahomedan religion, is nevertheless still a Christian, is on the face of it an absurdity; but it is as good an argument as one that a Hindu, who has been converted to the Christian religion, is still a Hindu."

Where a religion is so inextricably entwined with the secular law of inheritance and succession as is the case with what is accepted in British India as the Hindu law, it is impossible to suppose that the British Indian legislature intended by enacting such provisions as we find in S. 5, Act 20 of 1875, to apply the term "Hindu" in a wider sense to the people than to the law, and by a divorce of legal conceptions from religious doctrines, to make the Hindu law apply of its own force to races, tribes and families who are wholly outside the extreme limits of the Hindu religion. Upon the best consideration that I have been able to give the matter I am of opinion that the view propounded by Parsons, J., in the above Bombay case is correct and I therefore hold that the term "Hindus" in S. 5, Central Provinces Laws Act, 1875, refers to persons who profess some form of the Hindu religion whatever be the branch, school, sect, offshoot or denomination to which they may belong but that it does not extend to persons who have never professed any form of the Hindu religion or to those who have been converted from it to some entirely different religion. The word will apply to dissenters and nonconformists, but not to apostates. Thus a Jain is a Hindu, but a Brahman converted to Buddhism or Islam is not.

The next question I have to consider is whether the Gonds of the Central Provinces are Hindus within the meaning of that term in S. 5, Act 20 of 1875; for on the answer to that question depends the reply to the further question whether the Hindu law applies of its own force to matters regarding inheritance and succession among them. For a proper solution of the problem some historical and ethnological research has been necessary. All the existing bibliography is not available to me but I have consulted Hislop's Papers on the Aboriginal Tribes of the Central Provinces, 1866, which is the leading treatise on the subject, Steel's Law and Custom of Hindu Castes, 1868, Therring's Hindu Tribes and Castes (1879), Russell's Tribes and Castes of the Central Provinces (1916) and The Story of Gondwana (1916) by the Right Reverend Dr. Eyre Chatterton, Bishop of Nagpur and from these works I have extracted the following information.

The Gonds constitute the principal tribe of the Dravidian family and are perhaps the most important of the non-Aryan or forest tribes in India. Census operations carried out in 1910-11 revealed that there were 3,000,000 Gonds in India at that time of whom no less than 2,300,000 were domiciled in the Central Provinces. These figures indicate the necessity for an authoritative decision by this Court on the question of the domestic law applicable to these people. Such information concerning their ancient history as is available leaves no room for doubt that in origin they were a people entirely distinct from the Aryans, to whom we owe the existing Hindu law and religion. At what time or under what circumstances the Gonds first became domiciled within the area which has been called Gondwana after them, are pre historic facts whereof the knowledge has now been lost in the fading horizon of the ever-receding and unmeasurable past. But sufficient indications remain to sustain the hypothesis that the original emigrants to Gondwana belong to the Dravidian family then settled in the South of India and though Russell suggests that the immigration may have taken place after the Aryan invasion which brought what is now called Hinduism into India, the better view seems to be that it preceded it. The Bishop of Nagpur at p. 6 of his book writes :

"Those who know Risley's work on the people of India will remember that the earliest and most numerous of the seven races to which he would trace the present people of India is the Dravidian race. It is to this race, 'the ancient Britons of India . . . that the Gond belongs.'"

"Where those Dravidians Koitors dwelt before they settled in the plains and uplands of the Central Provinces, is a question which cannot now be answered. . . . The more probable view however is that the Gonds were an uncivilized branch of the Dravidians who in early times moved up from the Deccan into the Central Provinces, where they made their home in company with other aboriginal tribes, Kols, Korkus and Bhils. Here they lived their primitive life in the ways they loved best. . . . Then with the coming of the Aryans into India the beginnings of a larger and more civilized life dawned for Gondwana . . ."

Further on in his interesting work the Bishop refers to a passage in the Epic of the Ramayana showing that the highly civilized Aryans of those days regarded the Gonds as "Shapeless and ill-looking monsters," and as "base-born wretches" who "perpetrate the greatest outrages." In all the works we find the Gonds with a pantheon of gods almost wholly different from those of the Hindu mythology and with some habits, rites and ceremonies which would be wholly repugnant to Hindu ethics and Brahminical doctrines.

All these circumstances make it clear that the origin of the Gonds was non-Hindu, even using the term Hindu in the wide significance given to it by the Judicial Committee in Rani Bhagwan Kuar v. Bose (2). And it cannot be said that these aboriginal people, natives of the once isolated tracts of dense forest and extended hills named Gondwana, have even now been so affected and transformed by the ethnical and social changes which have taken place under the successive invaders of India—Aryans, Scythians, Mongols, and Latins—as to have become merged in the general Hindu population. In the case of Gobra v. Man Singh (9), S. A. No. 219 of 1877, decided by this Court on 30th August 1877, the learned Judicial Commissioner Mr. (afterwards Sir Charles) Grant (who compiled the Central Provinces Gazetteer of 1871 containing a notice of the Gonds) wrote :

"The plaintiff's father and mother belong to the Gond race, who come even below the lowest Hindu races in social standing; and as illegitimacy is held not to be a bar to inheritance among Hindu Sudras, such a modified form of it as would arise from a left-handed marriage (as in this case) can scarcely be regarded as creating any disability among races even more careless of the social law and ceremony."

It is manifest from this passage that so recently as 40 years ago Gonds were regarded by the highest judicial authority in these Provinces as something apart from, and even lower than, Hindu Sudras.

It was argued before me that the Gonds of these Provinces are Sudras. It is necessary to examine that contention and dispose of it. Though the text-books and commentaries of Hindu law deal with Sudras, I have been unable to find any generally accepted definition of that expression beyond this: that it refers to Hindus who do not belong to the twice-born classes. The Hindu law divides Hindus into the following four divisions or castes:

(1) The Brahmins or priestly caste; (2) the Kshatriyas, or warrior caste; (3) the Vaishyas or agricultural caste; (4) the Sudras, or menial castes.

Various definitions of the Sudra, more or less of conjectural kind, have been put forward. Thus in Edin. 8 of Mayne's Hindu Law, at p. 107, a footnote (which also appeared on p. 92 of Edin. 7) reads: "I take the Sudras as representing aboriginals in early time, but I am aware there is much controversy on the point."

There is not even the semblance of authority to be found for this assumption in any of the Hindu text-books. In Chapat Narhar Sastry v. Parmanand Ganesh Sastry (10) Westropp, G. J., stated that the Hindu law regards Sudras as slaves. This statement is strongly controverted by Mr. G. C. Sastri in his book on Hindu Law, at p. 151. He evolves a definition of his own for which he claims authority from certain texts cited by him. According to this view every Hindu is born a Sudra: but if by birth he is also a Brahman, a Kshatriya or a Vaishya, he can become regenerate by learning the sacred literature. If such a one fails to attain knowledge of the Vedas, he remains a Sudra. The learned author is constrained to admit the existence of a text which forbids to Sudras the privilege of studying the Vedas; but makes no attempt to explain the inconsistency which arises if the three superior castes are to be considered as within the category of Sudras unless they learn that which Sudras are forbidden to read. The idea that a Brahman begins life, and may end it, as a Sudra is novel and revolutionary. Mr. Sastri claims authority for it chiefly from a text of Manu (Ch. 2, 168) which he translates thus:

"That twice-born man who without studying the Vedas, applies diligent attention to anything else, soon falls even when living, together with his descendants, to the conditions of a Sudra."

It will be observed that the text refers in express terms to a "twice-born man," and does not sustain Mr. Sastri's view that the second birth is postponed until after the Vedas have been learned. To my mind it contains nothing but a pious warning to every Hindu of the regenerate classes that, if he neglects the study of the sacred literature, he and his descendants will fall to the level of Sudras: not that they will become or remain Sudras, but in ignorance and consequent degradation will resemble Sudras.

But Mr. Sastri's conception of a Sudra seems the most correct so far as it assumes every Sudra to be a Hindu by birth and religion, and I am of opinion that every Hindu properly so called, who does not belong to one or other of the three regenerate classes, is a Sudra: and that to him the Hindu law relating to Sudras applies of its own force, but I think that no non-Hindu can be a Sudra any more than he can be a member of any of the regenerate castes. Since a Gond is not a Hindu at all, it follows that he cannot be brought within the category of Sudras.

But the feeling that the Gond is not within any definition, juristic or popular, of a Hindu does not conclude the matter. Dr. Gour in his said work, Vol. 1, at pp. 28 and 29, has set out instances, supported by evidence, in which the Hindu law has been followed in matters relating to inheritance and succession, by persons who are not Hindus by caste or religion. In dealing with this branch of the subject it is necessary to distinguish between (1) apostates and dissenters from the Hindu religion, and (2) those who by origin, birth and creed have always been non-Hindu. The former class have been subjected to a considerable amount of legislative and judicial treatment, and the published case-law regarding them has not always been uniform and consistent. But with them I am not now concerned. Here I am presented with the case of a tribe which has always been non-Hindu. How far, if at all, should inheritance and succession in this tribe be governed by the Hindu law? In this connexion it is necessary to bear in mind that although that law is primarily a personal law, it has also become attached to localities; and that, therefore a Hindu is presumed to be governed by the law of the locality in which he resides: Ram Das v.

Chandra Dassia (11), Fanindra Deb Raikat v. Rajeswar Das (12), Jugo Bundhoo Tiwaree v. Kurum Singh (13) and Balaji v. Mt. Maina Bai (14).

The contrary view taken in Shridhar v. Maina Bai (15) seems to have been overruled. This Court has laid down that the Mitakshara of the Benares School is the Hindu lex loci in the Central Provinces: Hira Lal v. Mt. Jani Bai (16), Deorao v. Sakhu (17). It is immaterial now whether that law is based on immemorial local customs which Brahmanism found, adopted and shaped (as conjectured by Mr. Mayne in his Hindu Law), or is of divine origin as believed and claimed by Mr. Sastri and other Hindu commentators. The fact stands out beyond all dispute that the Mitakshara, as now accepted and applied, is saturated with Brahmanism and Hindu religious doctrines constitute the warp and woof of the principles and order of inheritance and succession contained in it. No doubt in some cases the religious element is entwined with legal conceptions which are not peculiar to Hindus, but are found in many other systems of law, e.g., the heirship of a son to his father; but in other doctrines we find principles which are peculiar to the Hindu religion, indicating with reasonable certainty that in such matters the secular law followed out of religion. The exclusion of the sister from the line of heirs, and the reversion of an estate held by a woman to the heirs of the last male holder after her death are matters of that kind.

Now I am not unmindful of the advantage, in the administration of justice, of having a settled lex loci and of applying it to as many as possible of the inhabitants domiciled within the area of its operation. It may be open to doubt whether, as a matter of sound policy, every fragment of custom ought to be sought out and preserved. A wider and more uniform customary law may be more consistent with moral and material progress than an indefinite segmentation into slightly varying usages which causes perpetual doubt and difficulty in necessary transactions. But the legislative mandate is clear and conclusive. The usage of the country is the law of the people, and the Courts of British India stand bound by statute and practice to preserve and apply to each class, tribe, caste and family the ancestral personal law thereof unless it has been substituted by some other law or valid usage. It seems to me that it would be as incongruous to apply to the wild Gonds of the Central Provinces the peculiar principles of the Hindu law as their Lordships of the Privy Council considered in Rani Bhagwan Kuar v. Bose (2), it would be to govern inheritance among the Sikhs by the Indian Succession Act, 1865. Mr. Mayne, in his above work, enjoins much caution in applying Hindu law to non-Brahminical tribes. Mr. Sastri, at p. 363 of his treatise gives a clear opinion that a person who is from birth a non-Hindu cannot be subject to the personal law of the Hindus. That opinion appears to me to be correct.

There are races, tribes, communities, and families, non-Hindu in origin who have adopted some of the usages, both religious and secular, of the Hindus with whom they have been associated for centuries. It is natural that this imitation or assimilation should take place, more particularly in such domestic matters as the order of inheritance and succession, among tribes who have no written personal law of their own. But a man does not become a Hindu by calling himself one; nor is the adoption by a non-Hindu of usage resembling some parts of the Hindu law a sufficient ground for applying the whole of that law to him en bloc, in the same way and to the same extent as if he were a Hindu. These considerations have apparently been overlooked by some commentators and by most of our subordinate Courts, who seem to have regarded the Hindu law as a common law of the land, applicable to all cases which are not shown to be outside it. It is natural that such Courts, as at present constituted in these provinces, should have been led by the presence at their elbows of a written code of law, to apply it beyond its scope to cases not governed by it, and that legal practitioners should have helped this error in cases where no other known system is apparent. Indeed it is a consummation devoutly to be desired that as many as possible of the diverse races and tribes occupying this vast country should be brought under a common law of inheritance and succession; but the time for that is not yet.

The Gonds in these provinces have not avoided the Hindu influences to which they have been subjected for centuries. Some branches of the tribe—notably the Raj Gonds—have closely imitated Hindu customs, have adopted Hindu names, have taken to wearing the sacred thread and offer funeral cakes to the dead after the manner of regenerate Hindus. To many of these the local Courts have applied without question by the parties and as a matter of course the Mitakshara law in cases relating to inheritance and succession. But an unconscious application of wrong law cannot set up a principle of stare decisis merely because it has been left unchallenged for a few years owing to the ignorance of the people affected by it; and the circumstance that in some cases our Courts may have treated as Hindu families of Gonds who have not adopted the Mitakshara as their personal law, ought not to affect the decision of this case where the question of the law to be applied has been expressly raised. Moreover an issue as to Customary law must be decided according to the particular facts of each case as it comes up. There are many classes of Gonds, widely differing from one another in habits and status; and it does not follow because a family of Raj Gonds in the Jabulpore or Mandla Districts have become so Hinduized as to justify the application of the Mitakshara in determining disputes as to inheritance and succession among them, that the same course would be proper in the cases, say, of Madias and Dhurs of Chhattisgarh or the Koyas or Gaitas of the Chanda District.

The case of Sultan Shah v. Dan Chander Shah (18) came before this Court from the Betul District. The parties were Raj Gonds of a family converted to Islam in the days of Mogul rule. The lower appellate Court having decided the case according to Mahomedan law, the plaintiff appealed to this Court on the ground, inter alia, that the parties being Raj Gonds were governed by the Hindu law in matters of marriage, inheritance and succession. Ismay, Judicial Commissioner, rightly treated the question as one of fact, and sent back the case for a finding, and eventually disposed of it by a judgment from which I make the following extract:

"It is now found that the parties are governed by the Hindu law as respects inheritance. This finding is objected to on the grounds that the onus was on the appellant to prove that the parties are not governed by Mahomedan law and that the evidence to prove the custom is legally insufficient. I am not at all prepared to say that the onus was on the appellant. It may no doubt be laid down as a general rule that in questions of succession and inheritance the Hindu law is to be applied to Hindus and the Mahomedan law to Mahomedans. See Rajah v. Devaraj Shah (19). But there are many cases in which the universality of a custom superseding the law has been recognized. The Khojals and Gutchi Monahs have always been regarded as Hindus converted to Mahomedanism, but it has been constantly held that in the absence of proof of special custom they are governed by the Hindu law of inheritance. Similarly it has been held by this Court (Civil Appeals, Hindu and Mahomedan law) that the isolated Mahomedan communities who have for centuries dwelt amongst Hindus on the Satpura plateau have allowed their law of succession to be influenced by Hindu practice. In the present case the parties are Raj Gonds whose ancestors adopted the religion of Mahomed in the days of Aurangzeb. Notwithstanding their conversion they still marry into Gond families, and the presumption that they recognize the Mahomedan law of succession, if any such presumption can be said to exist, must be singularly weak. The village custom now in dispute passed from husband to widow, and on the widow's death from father to daughter in direct accordance with the rules of Hindu law. It must be borne in mind that in comparison with Hindu, very few Gonds embraced the religion of Mahomed."

The late Mr. Hishop, who was eminently qualified to write on the subject, notes as follows:

"The only instance that has come to my knowledge is that of Bakht Boland the Rajah of Dewagah who was converted to Islam when on a visit to Aurangzeb at Delhi. Still his descendants, though adhering to the change of creed, have not ceased to marry into Gond families, and hence the present representative of that royal house is not only acknowledged by the whole race about Nagpur as their head and Judge, but is physically regarded as a pure Raj Gond. Essay on the Hill Tribes on the Central Provinces, p. 5."

It is manifest that the decision of Ismay, Judicial Commissioner, rested on the facts of the particular case before him, and that it affords no authority for any presumption that all Gonds are governed by the Hindu law. Indeed there was no question before the learned Judicial Commissioner whether Gonds are Hindus who are originarily amenable, as such, to the Hindu law. It was found as a fact that, despite its conversion to the faith of Islam, the family had habitually governed itself by Hindu law in matters of marriage, inheritance and succession. Under such circumstances that law was correctly applied, for clear proof of usage will outweigh all but statute law: Abraham v. Abraham (3), Muthusami Mudaliar v. Masilamani (20). There is clear authority for the view that the onus of proving that a non Hindu family has accepted the Hindu law rests on him who alleges it. In Fanindra Deb Raikat v. Rajeshwar Das (12) their Lordships of the Privy Council laid down that in the case of a family which is not originally Hindu, but which has adopted Hinduisim, the burden of proving that the family is governed in a particular matter by the Hindu law is upon the person who asserts that it is so governed. The ratio decidendi seems to be that the adoption by a family of some parts of a law foreign to it does not raise any presumption in favour of its adoption of other parts thereof. We have seen that a Gond family may adopt Mahomedan religion without adopting the Mahomedan law of inheritance. Similarly a Gond family may adopt the Hindu law of marriage without accepting the Hindu law of adoption or survivorship.

In the present case, by setting himself up as the owner of the property in suit, the plaintiff necessarily rests on two rules peculiar to the Mitakshara law of inheritance, namely, (1) that on the death of Mt. Bayan the estate did not descend to her daughter but reverted to the heir of her son, the last male holder; and (2) that the defendant being the sister of that propositus, is excluded from inheritance. The burden of proving that these rules apply to the family of the parties lies heavily on the plaintiff. Owing to misapprehension of the law in the Courts below the onus of proof was misplaced on the defendant. It seems just to give the plaintiff an opportunity of proving his allegations, and the case must therefore go back.

It may be well to note that the rules of inheritance relied on by the plaintiff must be proved to be in force in their family by such evidence as the Courts usually require to justify them in giving effect to a custom. If the custom is not proved the suit must fail. It will not be necessary to decide what other law or custom of inheritance may be applicable. The defendant is in possession of property which has descended to her from her mother, and the plaintiff can only succeed if he establishes a better title. And in this connexion it may be well to point out that evidence of occurrences in the family which are not peculiar to Hindu law will not suffice to raise a presumption that the family has adopted that law. The devolution of property from father to son, or the equal division by several heirs of an estate inherited jointly from a common ancestor, are incidents common to all systems of inheritance. But evidence of adoption, of succession by survivorship to the exclusion of females, of reversion to the heirs of the last male holder taking place on the determination of an intervening female estate, of the exclusion of sisters from inheritance and other such matters peculiar to the Mitakshara having taken place in the family, would sustain the plaintiff's case. For the above reasons the appeal is allowed; the decree of the lower appellate Court is reversed under O. 41, R. 23, Civil P. C., its decision on the preliminary point as to the law governing the parties being held to be erroneous. The case is remanded for a fresh decision on the merits with advertence to the above remarks. The appellant will be given the usual refund certificate. Other costs here and hitherto will abide the result.

Judgment.—One Raoji and his brothers owned a half-share in three survey numbers. The other half-share belonged to one Bhagwan and his brother Baliram. On 19th March 1909 the plaintiff-appellant purchased the half share of Raoji and his brothers for Rs. 2,000. On 27th June 1911 the defendant-respondent purchased from Bhagwan the remaining half-share for a consideration which is recited to be Rs. 1,500, the exact nature of which will have to be determined later. On 6th July 1911, the plaintiff purchased the one fourth share of Baliram for Rs. 550. It has been now decided in another suit that Bhagwan had no right to sell anything more than his own one-fourth share, so the plaintiff now owns three-fourths, and seeks to pre-empt the remaining one-fourth. The property sold was subject to a mortgage, dated 23rd May 1907, for Rs. 1,000 in favour of one Ganpat Ekoji Ghule. This was executed by both Raoji and Bhagwan. This mortgage has not been paid off by the defendant. The first Court held that the plaintiff is entitled to pre-empt on payment of Rs. 250 on the ground that the defendant paid his vendor Bhagwan only Rs. 500. The lower appellate Court has held that the plaintiff is bound to pay Rs. 750, half the amount of the consideration recited in the sale deed. The plaintiff has filed this appeal.

The sale deed in favour of the defendant recites that there is a mortgage on this property in respect of which Bhagwan, the vendor, is liable to the extent of Rs. 500 for principal and the total amount of Rs. 1,000, including interest. That a hawala was taken by the purchaser for this debt, and the remaining amount of Rs. 500 was paid in cash. A certified copy of the mortgage referred to has been filed as Ex. P-7. It is a mortgage by conditional sale, and therefore does not contain any personal covenant. The term "hawala" seems to have been loosely used, for it is not alleged or suggested that Ganpat Ekoji was a party to this arrangement. The question which I have to decide is what is the price fixed for the sale. Now Bhagwan could only sell the equity of redemption subject to the mortgage in favour of Ekoji. For this he received Rs. 500 as consideration. The defendant, no doubt, agreed to clear off an encumbrance on the property. The amount due on the mortgage could only be ascertained in Berar, as the rule of damdapat prevents the recovery of more than double the principal amount. The covenant on the part of the defendant to pay off this amount was superfluous. It was an obligation attached to the property which the defendant bought from Bhagwan. As I have already said, Ganpat Ekoji's mortgage was one by conditional sale, and no personal claim could have been made against the mortgagee, or against his assignee, even if the term "hawala" had been used in its strict sense. I hold that the price for the sale of the equity of redemption was only Rs. 500. It is urged on behalf of the respondent that his vendor could enforce the payment of Rs. 1,000 to Ghule, if he is himself compelled to pay the amount.

But I have already shown that the vendor could not be compelled to pay the amount personally. If he voluntarily paid the amount after ceasing to be the owner of property on which the amount is charged, he could scarcely recover under S. 61 Contract Act. Could he sue the defendant for damages for breach of a covenant? The answer depends upon whether the vendor would suffer any loss. I am of opinion that he could not. It seems to me clear that the covenant simply meant that the property was not sold free of encumbrances, and that the purchaser's title was subject to this mortgage. I hold that the price fixed for the sale of the equity of redemption is Rs. 500 and as the plaintiff is pre-empting only the equity of redemption, the consideration should be deemed to be Rs. 500. If the defendant had been in a position to transfer the property free of encumbrances, he would have been entitled to the full amount, and this he could do if he had already redeemed the mortgage and thus acquired the rights of the mortgagee. It is the plaintiff who will have to pay off the mortgage if he pre-empt. Both the Courts below have assumed that the plaintiff is only liable to pay half the consideration for the sale, whether it is Rs. 1,500 or Rs. 500. But the point has not been discussed in the judgment of either Court.

In Madhub Chunder v. Tomee Bewah (1), Kemp and Markby, JJ., held that a person claiming to exercise his right of pre-emption must take the bargain as it was made, and any apportionment of the purchase-money is altogether illegal. But a different view has been taken by the Allahabad High Court in Muhammad Latif v. Gobind Singh (2). I am not concerned here with the Mahomedan law, or the Customary law regarding pre-emption. I have to interpret the provisions of Ch. 18 of the Hyderabad Assigned Districts Land Revenue Code, 1896. Under this Code, a right of pre-emption accrues when the interest or any part of the interest of a co-occupant in any survey number is transferred. The co-occupant proposing to sell must give notice to all other co-occupants of the price at which he is willing to sell. Upon such notice within two months from the date of its service, the pre-emptor must deposit the "price aforesaid" with the Tahsildar. The right of pre-emption also may be enforced by a suit, if notice is not given and the proposed sale is completed. It is only upon proof that the price stated in the notice or the price mentioned in the sale deed was not fixed in good faith that the Court is to fix such price as appears to be the fair market-value of the interest proposed to be sold, or sold. It would therefore seem the price fixed is prima facie the price for pre-emption, unless it has not been fixed in good faith.

In the present case Bhagwan was actually in possession of the eight annas share, which he and his brother Baliram had inherited from their uncle. He had managed to keep his brother out of possession for nearly six years and had, therefore a possessory title over his separated brother's share. The purchaser obviously knew of the existence of this brother as a coheir. If he has really paid Rs. 500 for Bhagwan's interest, as found by the Courts below, then it is difficult to hold that the price was not fixed in good faith. It cannot be assumed that the defendant with knowledge that title to four annas share was open to doubt has paid an equal amount for it, as he has paid for the portion over which his vendor had a good title. No proportionate abatement can therefore be made in this case. The Berar Code allows the Court to determine the market-value only when the price has not been fixed in good faith. There is no reason to suppose that the defendant paid an inflated price with the object of defeating the plaintiff's right of pre-emption. I hold therefore the plaintiff is bound to pay Rs. 500 as the price of pre-emption. A fresh decree will be drawn up in modification of the lower Court's decree by allowing the plaintiff to pre-empt on payment of Rs. 500 within three months from this date with proportionate costs throughout.

G. P. Dick and T. N. Bapat—for Appellant.

Hant and A. J. Balm—for Respondents.

Judgment.—One Lalpatsingh was the occupant of the survey number of unalienated land in Berar which is in dispute in this case. He died some years ago, leaving a widow and two minor sons who are the plaintiffs in this case. The widow remarried and left the plaintiffs and their property to the care and management of one Zamsingh, said to be the brother-in-law of the plaintiffs though this fact is not found. In 1901 while the plaintiffs are minors and living with him, Zamsingh sold the land to the defendant for Rs. 1,300, whereof Rs. 600 it is alleged, were already due to him on a decree obtained against the father of the plaintiffs and Rs. 700 were due to another creditor of the father whom the defendant undertook to pay. In making this sale Zamsingh professed to act as the guardian of the minor plaintiffs. Having since come of age the plaintiffs sue to recover the land on the ground that the sale by Zamsingh is not binding on them.

(2) [1933] 5 All. 382=(1883) A. W. N. 66.

The Courts below have decreed the suit on the ground that the sale being made by an unauthorized person is void. The first Court found it proved that Rs. 1,300 were due by Lalpatsingh as alleged by the defendant and that the sale was a wise proceeding, but the lower appellate Court recorded no finding on the merits. The defendant has made the present appeal.

I am of opinion that the case must go back in order that the fact may be found. With due respect I think that the dictum in Husen v. Rajaram (1) that every alienation by the de facto guardian of a minor is wholly void is too widely stated. It is based mainly on cases in which the parties were Mahomedans, whose personal law as to guardianship is quite different from that of Hindus. The well-known case of Hunoomanpersaud Poddar v. Mt. Balsoor Munshi Kanyasree (2) was one of alienation by a Hindu manager who was only a de facto guardian of the minor, and the alienation was held to be valid when made for necessary purposes. Mohammud Mahtab v. Vafar Mandul (3), a case which does not seem to have been dissented from or overruled and which is not mentioned in Husen v. Rajaram (1), is a direct authority for the proposition that a Hindu de facto manager of an infant's estate has, in case of necessity or for the benefit of the minor, power to sell his property. Mirza Din v. Sheikh Ahmed Ali (4), upon which also the decision in Husen v. Rajaram (1) is based, was a decision on the Mahomedan law of guardianship, as will appear at pp. 216 (of L. L. R. 31 Alt.) (where the ratio decidendi of the Indian High Courts is given) and 221 (of L. L. R. 34 Alt.) where their Lordships open their discussion of the question at issue by pointing out that the alienation was made in a family who were Mahomedans governed by the Mahomedan law relating to guardianship. The case with which their Lordships dealt was that of an alienation effected not by a guardian but by a wholly unauthorized person and he was found to be so because of the personal law applicable to him. Mahomedan law specifies the guardian de jure and provides for the testamentary appointment of such persons. But the Hindu law makes the King and no one else the guardian of all the minors. Strictly speaking there is no such thing as de jure guardian under that law. By custom the father and mother are recognized as guardians. But these recognitions are partly arbitrary so far as guardianship is concerned. There is no text to support them so far as I can find. But the Hindu law does recognize managers of family property and such managers are de facto guardian depending on the circumstances of each case. The powers of alienation possessed by such managers have been exhaustively dealt with in numerous treatises and cases on Hindu law, in relation both to adults and to minor owners of the property concerned, and it is in the light of these authorities that the present case must be decided after the facts have been ascertained. When Lalpatsingh died his widow, if she was the mother and not merely the stepmother of the plaintiffs, became their customary guardian. The circumstances under which she made over to the plaintiffs and their property to Zaid Singh must be ascertained, if possible. If it was that Halilux, A. J. C., cites a passage in Husen v. Rajaram (1) at p. 136 (of L. L. R. 31 Alt.) a guardian de jure then the question will arise whether she could appoint a manager to act for her. The case is one of Hindus and must be judged by the laws and authorities applicable to Hindus. The lower appellate Court should also come to a definite finding on the alleged legal necessity. That a transaction may not bind a minor and yet impose an obligation of his estate is well clear by the Privy Council in Moheri Bibee v. Dharmodas Ghose (5). Therefore even if the sale is set aside, the question of ordering a refund of the purchase-money is one to be considered in this case as a matter of equity and good conscience. The appeal is allowed. The decree of the lower appellate Court is reversed and the case remanded for fresh decision with reference to above remarks. There will be a refund of court-fees and costs will abide the result.

Second Appeal No. 157-B of 1917, Decided on 3rd August 1918, against the decree of Dist. Judge, West Berar, in C. A. No. 180 of 1916, D/- 21st February 1917.

(a) Hindu Law—Minority and guardianship—Step mother is not natural guardian.

A step mother is not natural guardian of her minor step son under the Hindu law.

An alienation of a minor stepson's property by a step-mother therefore stands on the same footing as an alienation by any de facto guardian. [P 21 C 1]

(b) Hindu Law—Minority and guardianship—Suit by minor to recover property sold by his stepmother is governed by Limitation Act (1908), Art. 144 and not by Art. 44.

Article 44 does not apply to an alienation by an unauthorized guardian and consequently to an alienation by a stepmother of property belonging to her minor stepson: 26 I. C. 179, Foll. [P 21 C 2]

A suit by a Hindu minor after attaining majority to recover possession of property sold by his stepmother during his minority is governed by Art. 144 and by Art. 44. [P 22 C 1]

(c) Limitation Act (1908), Art. 44—Art. 44 applies to all transfers.

Article 44 does not merely apply to sales but applies to all transfers of property. [P 21 C 2]

H. S. Gour—for Appellant.

M. V. Joshi—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The plaintiff sues for possession of fields sold in 1907 during his minority by his stepmother Mt. Rukhma for Rs. 2,000. It has been found that there was no legal necessity for the sale except to the extent of Rupees. 237-9-0. The lower appellate Court has held that the suit was instituted more than three years after the plaintiff attained majority. The suit has been dismissed as barred by Art. 44, Lim. Act. The view taken by the lower appellate Court is that Mt. Rukhma was the de facto guardian and manager of the plaintiff's estate, though there were separated kinsmen in the male line. It has followed an unreported ruling of this Court in Somwarपुरी Guru Chandanपुरी v. Gopalsingh (1), in which my learned predecessor, Sir Henry Stanyon, dissented from, Husen v. Rajaram (2). In the reported ruling the step-mother conveyed the property when the minor's mother was alive, but no such distinction was made in the judgment. It was laid down that.

"An alienation of the property of a minor by a person who is that minor's guardian de facto is not merely voidable but absolutely void, and the minor need not sue to have it set aside before he can obtain possession of the property."

The decision was based upon the following dictum of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Mata Din v. Ahmad Ali (3):

"It is difficult to see how the situation of an unauthorized guardian is bettered by describing him as a de facto guardian. He may by his de facto guardianship assume important responsibilities in relation to the minor's property, but he cannot thereby clothe himself with legal power to sell it."

The case before the Privy Council, as pointed out by Sir Henry Stanyon, A. J. C., was one governed by the Mahomedan law of guardianship. Stanyon, A. J. C., also says "that strictly speaking there is no such thing as a de jure guardian under the Hindu law. By custom the father and mother are recognized as guardians."

The learned Judge then points out that an alienation by a de facto guardian, if for legal necessity or for the benefit of the minor would be binding. I admit there is considerable force in the argument set forth in the unreported ruling, but I find that the High Courts have even in cases of Hindu law followed the dictum of Lord Robson in Mata Din v. Ahmad Ali (3). These cases appeared after the decision of Somwarपुरी Guru Chandanपुरी v. Gopalsingh (1). The question which I have now to consider is the position of a stepmother in relation to her minor stepson. According to Mayne, the father and next to him the mother is the natural guardian of a Hindu minor: in default of parents his nearest male kin should be appointed. In Thayammal v. Kuppanna Koundan (4), Sadasiva Aiyar, J., says:

"I hold that under Hindu law, nobody else than the father and mother of a minor (with probable exceptions in favour of the elder brother and the direct male and female ancestors of the minor) is entitled as a matter of natural right to be and to act as guardian of a minor's person and properties. Recourse must be had to the Court (representing the rights of the King which are paramount to even the rights of the parents) where there is no natural guardian alive."

(2) A. I. R. 1914 Nag. 75=26 I. C. 813.

The case before him was however not that of a stepmother. In Rambace v. Umurchand Deochund (5) a stepmother was held to be the natural guardian on the authority of the following verse from Manu:

"If among all the wives of the same husband, one bring forth a male child, Manu has declared them all, by means of that son, to be mothers of male issue."

This view, though in accordance with the opinion of the Shastri, is dissented from in Maharajee Ram Buvjee Koorwaree v. Maharajee Soubh Koorwaree (6), so far as regards the interpretation of the text of Manu. Lock and Macpherson, J.J., point out that the step-mother does not stand as a mother for all purposes. Although the argument that under no circumstances can she inherit from a stepson is inapplicable to Bombay and Barar, the observation of the learned Judges that the text of Manu does not make the stepmother a mother so that she may inherit as mother is true also of Bombay and Barar. She inherits as wife and widow of the father from the stepson that is as a gotra sapinda, and she comes in Bombay after the paternal grandmother (Mayne's Hindu Law, Edn. 8, para 506). Reliance is placed on behalf of the respondents on Jagoo v. Oodul (7). That case is no authority for holding that the step-mother is a natural guardian. It merely lays down that an alienation by her may bind the stepson's estate, if it is justified by necessity, or is for his benefit. In Krista Kissor Neeghy v. Kadermoye Dosjee (8) it was laid down that the claims of relatives to the guardianship of a minor stand upon a different footing from those of parents, and it is pointed out that all relatives mentioned in Macnaghten's Principles and Precedents of Hindu Law, Ch. 7, have not an absolute right to take upon themselves the guardianship of a minor without any permission or authority from the ruling power.

Upon a consideration of the authorities I have come to the conclusion that the stepmother is not a natural guardian under the Hindu law. The alienation by a stepmother therefore stands on the same footing as that of any other de facto guardian. She is an "unauthorized guardian," to quote the words of their lordships of the Privy Council, and not a guardian within the meaning of Art. 14, and to an alienation by such a guardian the Article does not apply: Thayammal v. Kuppaswami Venkudam (9). I may point out that Art. 41 of the present Limitation Act applies not merely to sales but to all transfers of property, and the restricted construction placed on the meaning of the word "guardian" by the Madras High Court appears to me to be sound. For the appellant the case of Rajappa Dandappa Tashai v. Chandasappa Shirodhanappa (10) is relied upon. This case fully supports the appellant's contention but goes further than it is necessary for me to hold. For, according to the Bombay view, even an alienation by a mother would not be governed by Art. 14 or Art. 31, Lim. Act. The attention of the learned Judges was however not drawn to certain observations made by the Privy Council in the case of Gunasambanda Pandara Saundhi v. Velu Pandaram (11). At p. 275 Sir Richard Couch says in respect of an alienation made by the mother of a minor:

"Chockalinga attained majority in 1890 and had by Art. 41 of the Act three years for suing to set aside the sale by his guardian. He did not do so and by S. 25, Lim. Act his right became extinguished."

Sham Chandra v. Godadhar Mandal (11) cited for the respondents was decided before the Privy Council case of Mata Din v. Ahmad Ali (12). The actual decision in the case however supports the view taken by me though there are dicta in favour of the respondents. As regards the application of Art. 91 there has not been much argument before me. Ordinarily it applies to an instrument executed by a party or his predecessor-in-interest. Hence it has been held by this Court in Asaram v. Ratan Singh (12) that a minor member of a joint Hindu family is not bound to set aside a sale effected by the managing member and Art. 91 does not apply to a suit for recovery of possession of his share by the minor on attaining majority. Such a sale may in certain cases be binding on him just as a sale by a de facto guardian

But in neither case is the minor bound to set aside such a sale. There was no necessity for the sale. Out of the total consideration of Rs. 2,000 only Rs. 237-9-0 was found to have been required for necessary purposes. The suit is governed by Art. 144 and is within time. The decrees of the Courts below are set aside and in lieu thereof it is decreed that the defendants do put the plaintiff in possession of the property mentioned in the plaint upon the plaintiff paying Rs. 237-9-0 to the defendants. The plaintiff will get his costs in all the three Courts.

Criminal Revn. No. 24 of 1918, Decided on 17th April 1918.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 350—S. 350 introduces exception to general rule that decision of guilt or innocence must be by judge who hears all evidence—That exception should not receive wider interpretation than its words justify.

The general rule is that the decision as to the innocence or guilt of an accused person must be by the Judge who has heard all the evidence. 1 N. L. R. 187 and 36 I. C. 867, Foll.

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 223, 224, 230, 233, 234 and 346—Case transferred from one Magistrate to another—Expression of intention by counsel in High Court not to claim de novo trial does not estop accused from claiming same—Accused in his capacity as Revenue Officer cheating three persons by dishonestly inducing them to deliver some of money collected by them from several others—Inducements also offered to persons who contributed who were about 15 in number—There were as many separate offences as there were persons to whom inducements were offered—Offences could not be combined in one trial.

The applicant was challenged and convicted on three charges under S. 420, I. P. C., which were tried together under S. 234, Criminal P. C., on the allegation that in his capacity as a Revenue Inspector he cheated three persons by dishonestly inducing them to deliver to him sums of money collected by them from several others, they themselves contributing to the sums their own quota of subscriptions. The applicant under orders from the Tahsildar caused a list of the tenants of a certain village to be prepared, showing the amount each of the tenants would have to pay towards the War Loan. Sometime after he offered to some of them within the hearing of others to cut down the subscriptions to half if he was paid Rs. 2 a piece, and to omit altogether the names of persons who were to pay Rs. 7-12-0 if they paid him Rs. 1 each. The villagers were then told to bring the money and they met in two groups. Seven out of one group paid Rs. 2 each to K who thus collected Rs. 16 including Rs. 2 of his own and paid the amount to the applicant, who made the necessary corrections in the list already prepared. Similarly C collected Rs. 9 from 6 persons including himself out of the other group and paid it to the applicant who, made corrections in the list as promised. The case was originally tried by the District Magistrate but on an application for transfer to the Judicial Commissioner it was sent to the file of a First Class Magistrate in the same District. In the course of his arguments in the proceedings under the transfer application the applicant's counsel expressed his intention not to apply for a re-hearing of the case. The Magistrate, to whose file the case was transferred held that this constituted a waiver on the part of the accused and consequently refused to grant the prayer of the applicant for a trial de novo. On appeal the Sessions Judge set aside the conviction and sentenced on one charge only and upheld those on the other two. The applicant urged amongst others the following grounds: (1) that there was an illegal contravention of S. 350, Criminal P. C., in refusing to grant a trial de novo, (2) that there was a non-compliance with Ss. 223 and 224, Criminal P. C., causing in fact a failure of justice and illegal misuse of S. 336 inasmuch as the charges did not give necessary notice of the matter charged, (3) that the charges framed were in contravention of the provisions of Ss. 223 and 224 Criminal P. C., as there were 15 persons cheated and 15 separate offences committed and the offences were wrongly combined in one trial:

Held: (1) that the statement of the applicant's counsel not to apply for a fresh trial did not operate as an estoppel and the trial Court was wrong in refusing the applicant's demand for a trial de novo; [P 25 C 2]

(2) that the omission to specify in the charge the manner in which the applicant cheated, whether by illegal act or omission, could not be regarded as material as it had not misled the accused. [P 26 C 1]

(3) that all or most of the persons who parled with money having been present when the terms were proposed by the accused, the representations made and inducements offered were made and offered to each of the villagers collected there and when the applicant took the money paid by each villager he committed a distinct offence, and the trial of the case was, therefore bad for misjoinder of charges as under S. 234, the applicant could not be tried for more than three charges. [P 27 C 1]

(c) Criminal Trial—Prosecution witness deposing to circumstances against accused—Magistrate should let accused know by questions put to him which of them tell against him.

If circumstances are deposed to against the accused by a prosecution witness, it is necessary that the Magistrate should let the accused know by questions put to him in examination which of them tell against him in his mind; it is more particularly necessary where the witness has deposed to other circumstances favourable to the accused which nullify the value of the circumstances against him. (P 27 C 2)

Judgment.—(1) The applicant Jangilal was the Revenue Inspector of the Bahera Circle in the Bametara Tahsil, Drug District, till the 9th May 1917, when he was suspended by the Deputy Commissioner, Drug, on Police reports that he was taking money from villagers on the pretence that he could save them from being compelled to subscribe to the war loan. After an investigation by the police the applicant was charged and tried and convicted on three charges under S. 120, I. P. Q. The three charges were tried together in for S. 231, Criminal P. C. The applicant has been sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for one year and a fine of Rs. 100 on each count, the sentences of imprisonment to run consecutively. On appeal the Sessions Judge, Rajmou, has set aside the conviction and sentence on one charge. This latter charge related to the taking of money from the villagers of Innaur Muran. The other two related to the money taken from the villagers of Innaur Bhotidih. I am now dealing with the latter two only.

(2) The case against the applicant is disclosed by the evidence in briefly this: At first the case was directed by the Tahsil-dar to prepare lists of tenants, and other persons in his circle who were likely to subscribe to the loan; see accused's written statement dated 20th August 1917. On 1st April 1917 the tenants of Bhotidih were collected at mantri Poonri and on the same day Chahalal, patwari (P. W. 12), prepared a rough list for this village showing the names of the tenants and the rents paid by them, and the applicant filled in the amounts against each tenant's names. From this Chahalal prepared a list, Ex. C. The villagers were then told what sum each would have to pay. They pleaded that they were too poor to pay anything, but they were told by the applicant that they "would have to pay" (P. W. 6) or were told to "be off" (P. W. 7). They then went home. Seven or eight days afterwards being told by the kotwar that they were wanted again, they went to Munderbol, a place about a kos from Bhotidih. They saw the applicant in the rest house sitting on a charpoy. He told them to wait and after a while got up and went outside the village. The villagers followed him and the applicant then beckoned to them and said that two or three men only should go to him. Thereupon Karia (P. W. 6), Giraidas (P. W. 7), Sakhu (P. W. 10), Jambath (C. W. 6) and Ramchiron (P. W. 7) went to him. He then asked to look after the villagers' interests—"dohi dahi karunga"—if they would pay him something. He asked to put down their subscriptions to find if he was paid Rs. 2 a piece and to "pay off" the Rs. 7,120 people elsewhere if they paid Rs. 1 each.

The other villagers led by this time came at six and sat down within hearing distance. From Karia was told to bring the money. The villagers then returned to their village where they met in two groups. Seven persons paid Rs. 2 each to Karia (P. W. 6) who was collected Rs. 14 including Rs. 2 of his own. Similarly Chahalal (P. W. 7) collected Rs. 9 from six persons including himself. Thereupon they went to Munderbol to the applicant, and told him they had brought the money from 12 and seven persons respectively. He told them not to let it break and took it, went near a lamp, asked whose money they had brought, wrote something, and said he was writing out the Rs. 7,120 people and relieving them by half. The two then went home. Gauraman (P. W. 11), the patwari in whose absence Chahalal (P. W. 12) was acting when he prepared the list Ex. (C), had been cooking his food while this interview was taking place. Before retiring for the night he looked at his lists and said that in the list Ex. (C) there were corrections in red ink which did not exist when that list had been made over to him by Chahalal. Next morning he asked the applicant why the corrections were made, and he replied that he had filled in the amounts without inquiry into the haisiyat of the villagers, but as some had begged and prayed he had changed their items. He made a fresh copy of Ex. (C) as corrected by applicant by his direction (Ex. D).

(3) The case as detailed above rests principally upon the evidence of P. W. 6 and P. W. 7 and of P. W. 11 and P. W. 12, the two patwaris whose evidence is mainly in connexion with the lists Exs. (C) and (D). One piece of material evidence in the case is that of P. W. 10, Bhagirathia banker of Raipur, who deposes to the accused having paid Rs. 1,600 on account of an outstanding loan on 4th May 1917. The other evidence supports some part or other of the above story and is of minor importance.

(4) Upon this evidence the applicant was charged as follows:

"First head: That you, on or about 7th April 1917, at Munderbod, cheated Karia Chamar by dishonestly inducing him to deliver Rs. 16 to you, and thereby committed an offence punishable under S. 420, I. P. C., and within my cognizance."

The second and third heads of the charge were in the same terms, but referred to the Rs. 9 paid by Chirai Chamar and Rs. 15 paid by Hira at Bhainsa. There were also three alternative charges under S. 161, I. P. C., in respect of the three sums named above. The applicant denied taking any of the above sums, and denied going to Munderbod at any time between 1st and 10th April 1917. He produced no evidence in defence. The trying Magistrate came to the conclusion that the evidence justified conviction under S. 420, I. P. C. He says in para. 7 of his judgment:

"There is no doubt that the accused obtained money from the above persons by practising a deception on them. He well knew that he had no authority to fix an amount on them or to reduce any amount so fixed. There is also no doubt that the poor credulous villagers made the payments firmly believing that the accused had power to reduce the amounts which he had imposed in the exercise of his authority. Since there was deception it is immaterial in which way it was practised. It may arise even from a dishonest concealment of facts (Explanation to S. 415, I. P. C.) as in the present case. The accused in receiving the moneys from Hira, Karia and Chiraidas undoubtedly acted fraudulently and I accordingly find him guilty of three offences under S. 420, I. P. C."

It is not quite clear what persons the Magistrate refers to when he speaks of the "above persons," whether all the 15 who contributed to the total amount received by the applicant or to Hira, Karia and Chiraidas alone who are named as the persons cheated in the charge. The Sessions Judge has held that the applicant must be taken to have cheated only Karia and Chiraidas.

"The essence of his action, he says, was dealing with collections of people through representatives and realizing lumpsums of money from the representatives."

It might be mentioned at this stage that the proceedings in this case originally commenced in the Court of the District Magistrate. After the latter had taken down the depositions of nine witnesses the applicant obtained an order from this Court for a transfer of the case, which was then tried by Mr. Smellie, the Magistrate who has given judgment in the case. Before Mr. Smellie commenced his proceedings the accused applied for a de novo trial. This was refused on the ground that the right to claim it had been given up by the accused's counsel before the High Court when he obtained the order of transfer from the District Magistrate's Court. The argument in appeal before the Sessions Judge proceeded on grounds substantially the same as those urged in revision in this Court. The grounds are: (1) that the trial was preceded by such executive action and judicial procedure as operated to prejudice the applicant materially and this Court ought not to allow a conviction so obtained to stand; (2) the trial was illegal in some respects and materially irregular in others; (3) neither the facts charged, nor the variation of them irregularly introduced by the Sessions Judge, nor the prosecution evidence, if believed, satisfy the definition nor furnish and establish the ingredients of an offence under S. 420, I. P. C. (4) Under the 1st ground it is urged: (a) that the actions of the police and the District Magistrate in suspending the applicant in order to obtain evidence with reference to the charge against him, and in making the inquiry behind his back was unfair and prejudicial to his subsequent judicial trial, and the lower Courts have ignored the presumption against the credibility of witnesses which arose from the above executive actions; (b) further that the applicant's suspension by the District Magistrate and the latter's conduct in the course of the proceedings, which took place in his Court before the transfer, showed that he had already condemned the applicant, and this must have unconsciously prejudiced the trying Magistrate.

As regards point (a) I notice that the learned Sessions Judge has considered the matter urged therein in para. 47 of his judgment. As regards (b) the statement, that the trying Magistrate must have been prejudiced, can at the best be only a conjecture. All the circumstances which are relied upon in support of this point had happened before the order for transfer from this Court was obtained and might have been urged then to get the case transferred out of the district, but it is admitted that only a transfer to another Magistrate in the district (who must necessarily be one subordinate to the District Magistrate) was applied for. It is not suggested that the trying Magistrate was particularly prone to such unconscious prejudice.

Under the second ground it is urged that there was: (a) illegal contravention of S. 350, Criminal P. C.; (b) non-compliance with Ss. 222 and 223 Criminal P. C., causing in fact a failure of justice, and illegal misuse of S. 230; (c) contravention of S. 233 read with S. 241, Criminal P. C.; (d) failure to comply with S. 342, Criminal P. C., to an extent which caused serious prejudice to the accused, and therefore a failure of justice. Before the Sessions Judge the argument with reference to S. 350 was based on the assumption that it was applicable to the present case, which was one transferred from the Court of one Magistrate to that of another. In para. 13 of his judgment the Sessions Judge says:

"A large number of rulings have been cited to show that S. 350 applies to cases in which the trial is transferred from one Magistrate to another as well as to cases in which the Magistrate is transferred, dies or otherwise vacates his office, a proposition of which I needed no convincing."

It is somewhat strange that the applicant should have failed to rely upon the rulings of the Court to the contrary which would have served his purpose better and more fully, and that both the trying Magistrate and the Sessions Judge should have overlooked or ignored the rulings of their own High Court which they were bound to follow. These rulings are Emperor v. Kasim (1), Emperor v. Gokul (2), Ladha v. Emperor (3) and Emperor v. Ramprasad (4). In this Court the argument advanced with reference to S. 350 is twofold: First, reliance is placed upon the above rulings to show that the section does not apply to transferred cases and therefore the case ought to have been tried de novo by Mr. Smellie. Second even if S. 350 applies, there should have been a trial de novo as applicant had demanded it at the proper time before Mr. Smellie and the refusal on the ground that the accused had waived his right was illegal. In my opinion the view taken of the applicability of S. 350, Criminal P. C., in the rulings of this Court referred to above is the correct one. The general rule is that the decision as to the innocence or guilt of an accused person must be by the Judge who has heard all the evidence: see Ladha v. Emperor (3) and Emperor v. Ramprasad (4). S. 350, Criminal P. C., introduces an exception to this general rule, and I do not think that the exception should receive a more extended interpretation than its actual words clearly justify. I am not inclined to agree with the more recent view taken in Mohd. Ghous v. Sultan v. Emperor (5), Kudratullah v. Emperor (6), Pasarkundh Ghanmer v. Emperor (7) and Tom Dass v. Emperor (8).

If therefore S. 350 has no application in this case, it is unnecessary for me to discuss the points involved in the alternative argument, but assuming that the section applies and there are no other valid reasons for refusing the applicant's demand for a trial de novo, it seems to me that the lower Courts were not justified in refusing it on the ground of waiver in anticipation before this Court at the hearing of the application for transfer. The circumstances of the case reported as Kudratullah v. Emperor (6) were different. Not only was there no demand for a trial de novo made; but the transfer had been made to suit the convenience of the accused which would not have been served by a trial de novo. In the present case there was a demand made at the proper time, and the only question was whether the applicant's counsel's previous statement as to the applicant's intention operated as an estoppel as the learned Magistrate seemed to think, and justified him in ignoring it. I do not think that it did. The learned Sessions Judge in discussing the case of Gomer Sirda v. Queen-Empress (9) says: "In that case the accused had never expressly waived his right to a trial" implying that in this case the accused had done so. The only record of the statement of the applicant's counsel in this Court is in the last sentence of this Court's order for transfer, which runs thus:

"The applicant's counsel tells me that he does not intend to apply for a rehearing of the case."

These words do not, in my opinion, amount to an express waiver. In Ram Dass v. Emperor (8) the transfer was made on the express undertaking that the accused would not ask for the rehearing of the entire evidence and no demand for a trial de novo had been made; yet it was held that if the accused had repudiated the undertaking and offered some explanation of his conduct in doing so, it would have been the Magistrate's duty to consider the application and give such effect to it as he thought just and lawful. Here the application has not been considered on the merits at all.

The second point raised under this ground is that the charges did not give the accused the necessary notice of the matter charged that he was entitled to under the provisions of Ss. 232 and 223, Criminal P. C. It is said that the charge did not contain any particulars of the manner in which the applicant cheated, whether by act or illegal omission, and if so what; that the Magistrate's record apart from his judgment does not anywhere specify any act or words by which the accused deceived the men who parted with money or the men who carried it to the accused, or of the illegal omission or dishonest concealment by which the deception was brought about. Reliance is placed on Ilus. (b) and (c) to S. 225 in this connexion. It would, no doubt, have been better to have set out in the charge the manner in which the cheating was effected, but the omission cannot be regarded as material as it is not alleged, and does not appear to me, that the accused was in fact misled by such error: S. 225, Criminal P. C. The chalan and the evidence in the case must have sufficiently indicated to the accused the manner in which he was said to have cheated the villagers. There is evidence on the record which, if true, goes to show that the applicant by his words and conduct induced a belief that the villagers would have to pay the amounts entered against their names, unless they were reduced or cut off altogether by him.

It is further urged* that the charges of cheating and bribery were based on inconsistent facts, and the trial of those charges together, apart from its not being justified under S. 236, Criminal P. C., has been the cause of prejudice to the applicant. It is said that at the stage of argument the Magistrate himself stated to the pleader for the applicant that no case of cheating had been made out and he confined his argument to the charges of bribery. I cannot decide the question of prejudice to the accused under this head of objection without further inquiry, and as I find that the trial is bad on other grounds I think it unnecessary to go any further into this objection. On the record as it is the charge of bribery was rightly dropped by the Magistrate.

The third point argued on this ground is that the charges framed are in contravention of the provisions of Ss. 233 and 234, Criminal P. C. It is argued that assuming there was cheating, the number of individuals cheated was 15, i. e., 13 from Mauza Bhotidhi and 2 from Mauza Puran, that 15 offences were thus committed, that the Magistrate wrongly combined 15 charges in respect of them in one trial, and that the proceedings are irremediably bad in law on account of this error, and the convictions cannot stand: Subrahmanya Ayyar v. Emperor (10). It is admitted by the learned counsel for the applicant as well as the Crown that according to the evidence on the record all or most of the persons from Bhotidhi who parted with money were present at the first interview with the applicant outside the village and heard the terms he proposed. There are witnesses whom the lower Courts have relied on: see para. 2, p. 6 of the Magistrate's judgment and para. 30 of the Sessions Judge's judgment, who give evidence to the effect that Karia shouted out to the villagers, who were sitting apart, whether they had heard the terms and that they agreed. If this is so, then it appears to me that the representation made and the inducement, offered by the applicant were made and offered to each of the villagers collected there, and when the applicant took the money

Reliance is placed by the Sessions Judge on Johan Sabarna v. Emperor (11) and Girwardhari Lal v. Emperor (12), for holding that there was only one offence in respect of each hundi supplied by Hira, Karia and Chiraidas. I am not prepared to accept the view taken in Johan Sabarna v. Emperor (11). The attempt complained of in that case was, in my opinion, nonetheless an attempt to deceive each individual separately, because it was made simultaneously. The last paragraph on p. 1063 (of 13 C. W. N.) in Girwardhari Lal v. Emperor (12) seems to me to go against the view of the Sessions Judge rather than to support it. It is not the case here that the applicant treated the transaction as a single one and was unwilling to reduce or cut off the subscription of any one unless all of them combined and made a combined payment. It is difficult to reconcile the view taken in Girwardhari Lal v. Emperor (12) with the one taken in Johan Sabarna v. Emperor (11), unless we assume that the Judge overlooked the former circumstance, the facts in the latter case to be somewhat different from those stated therein. I hold that the trial in this case is not on account of misdirection of charges. Under S. 231 the applicant could not have been legally tried for more than three charges.

The fourth point urged under this ground is that there was a failure to comply with the provisions of S. 342 Criminal P. C., which has resulted in prejudice to the accused. The Sessions Judge in para. 50 of his judgment has found that the applicant paid to his auditor Bhagirathi, P. W. 10, Rs. 1,600 on 3rd or 4th May 1917 on account of a debt owed on a hundi, which had been running for three years without any repayment. He refers to this as a damning piece of evidence against the accused (para. 51 of his judgment says, "this evidence has much value as corroborating the prosecution story"). It is urged that when this evidence was tendered the applicant by cross-examination elicited that he had been accompanied by another man when the money was borrowed and also that he had offered to pay off the hundi in February 1917. It is said that the object of this cross-examination was to prove that the money was borrowed on the personal security of the accused for a relation who was unknown to the lender, and the borrower had sent the money for payment in February 1917 to the applicant. It is urged that any inference arising from this payment of the applicant at the moment it was found that the applicant had money to pay off the hundi in his possession before the cross-examination was set on foot. It is said that the admissions elicited from Bhagirathi in his cross-examination were not questioned or explained away by cross-examination, nor did the Magistrate ask the witnesses any further question on the point of the February tender, and wholly omitted to question the auditors about it. Under these circumstances it is urged that the facts stated were a case of misleading against the applicant, this piece of evidence.

I think there is much force in this contention of the applicant. In the circumstances stated above, the applicant could be justified in concluding that the Magistrate did not accept the payment of Rs. 1,600 as a circumstance against the applicant. There was no reason for the Magistrate to suppose that the statement as to the February tender, couched as it was in a witness produced by the prosecution, could be disbelieved, as the Sessions Judge seems to have done. If circumstances against or against a person are depicted by a prosecution witness, it is necessary that the Magistrate should be the better known, by questions put to him in his examination, which of them tell against the accused in his mind, and it is more particularly necessary where the witness has deposed to other circumstances favourable to the accused which nullify the value of the circumstances against the accused. The failure to comply with the provisions of S. 342 in this connexion may well have prejudiced the applicant by leading him to conclude as above and to ignore the evidence of Bhagirathi so far as his defence was concerned.

The third and the last of the main grounds of appeal urges that neither the facts charged, nor the variation of them introduced by the Sessions Judge, viz., that the cheating was practised on Karia and Chiraidas as the representatives of collections of villagers, nor the prosecution evidence, if believed, established a case under S. 420, I. P. C. As regards this contention I think it advisable at this stage to do no more than refer to what I have already said in the latter part of para. 4, p. 26, surpara.

Holding as I do that the trial is bad for the reasons stated above, I do not think it is open to me to go into the merits as I have been asked to do. I do not see how I can decide on evidence on which it is not open to the lower Courts to decide on account of the contravention of the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code referred to above. I set aside the applicant's conviction and sentence and order that he be re-tried in accordance with law.

The applicant has been released on bail by an order of this Court passed on 22nd February 1918. He will surrender before the District Magistrate, Drug, on or before 22nd April 1918. It will be open to the District Magistrate to make such further order as to bail as he deems proper.

Second Appeal No. 554 of 1915, Decided on 24th October 1916, against decree of Divl. Judge., Nagpur, Divn. in C. A. No. 175 of 1914, D/- 26th June 1915.

(a) Mortgage — Usufructuary — Right of mortgagee—Right to possession determined by terms of contract—Mortgagee can be ejected by mortgagor.

A mortgagee whose right to possession is unconditionally and automatically determined by the terms of the contract cannot claim to remain in possession thereafter in spite of demand by the mortgagor. In such a case the mortgagor can maintain a suit for ejectment against the mortgagee. (P 29 C 2)

(b) Mortgage — Usufructuary — Rights of mortgagee—Suit for ejectment by mortgagor on determination of right to possession—Subsequent suit for mesne profits is not barred—Mesne profits.

In 1885 plaintiffs' father mortgaged certain land to the defendant. For the satisfaction of the balance due on the mortgage, he executed, in 1891, a lease for 14 years. In 1898 for a fresh advance he granted a further term of three years to come into force after the expiration of the previous lease. The lease expired in 1907-08, but the defendant refused to give up possession, and the plaintiff brought a suit to eject the defendant in 1908. In that suit it was held that the documents of 1891 and 1898 were usufructuary mortgages and the suit was decreed. The plaintiff then brought a suit to recover mesne profits accruing after the date of the previous suit:

Held: that the previous suit being a suit for ejectment and not a suit for redemption, the present suit for mesne profits was not barred. (P 29 C 2)

Judgment.—In 1885 the plaintiffs' deceased father mortgaged khudkast field No. 95. For the satisfaction of the balance due on the mortgage he executed in 1891 a lease for fourteen years. In 1898 for a fresh advance of Rs. 60 he granted a further term of three years to come into force after the expiration of the previous lease. The lease expired in 1907-08. The defendants having refused to deliver possession, the plaintiffs brought a suit for its recovery in 1908. The suit was ultimately decreed by this Court in Second Appeal No. 309 of 1911. The present suit was instituted on 28th October 1912 for mesne profits accruing after the date of the previous suit. The Courts below have partially decreed the plaintiffs' claim and the defendants have filed this second appeal, and the plaintiffs have filed a cross-objection. The question for decision is whether the present suit is barred, either under S. 11, or under O. 2, R. 2, Civil P. C. The former suit was in the form of a suit for ejectment, and the present suit is one for mesne profits. If this is the true character of the suit, then in view of the provisions of O. 2, R. 4, which merely permits the joinder of a suit for recovery of immovable property with one for mesne profits, the present suit will lie; Lessor Babui v. Janki Bibi (1). Moreover, this is a suit for mesne profits subsequent to the former suit, and there will be no bar to the institution of such a suit. The argument on behalf of the appellants however is that whatever be the form of the former suit, it must be regarded as a suit for redemption, and the present claim one for surplus profits recovered by the mortgagees. The appellants point out rightly that upon the view suggested of the true nature of the suit, the present claim is not tenable. Their learned counsel cites the cases of Satyabadi Behara v. Harabati (2), Rukhminibai v. Venkatesh (3) and Ram Din v. Bhup

Singh (4). The respondents rely upon the provisions of S. 62, T. P. Act, as authorizing a suit for ejectment. They cite some of the observations made by this Court in Kalu v. Laljee (5).

To appreciate the arguments before me it is necessary to state that in the former suit the contention on behalf of the plaintiffs was that the instruments of 1891 and 1898 were mortgages, whilst the defendants contended that they were leases, and that they had become ordinary tenants of khudkasht land, and were therefore protected from ejectment except for nonpayment of rent. This Court held that the documents in question created a mortgage, and upon this finding the plaintiffs' suit for possession was decreed. It must be therefore taken as conclusively decided between the parties that the documents of 1891 and 1898 were usufructuary mortgages. The respondents therefore cannot now be allowed to say that they were leases. Under the terms of the documents, there was to be no accounting between the parties, and the amount advanced was to be deemed to have been satisfied on the expiration of the lease.

The dicta in Kalu v. Laljee (5) may require to be carefully reconsidered, but I think the present case can be disposed of without my expressing any opinion on them. The Calcutta and Bombay cases cited for the appellants establish that, under the scheme of the Transfer of Property Act, a mortgagee after tender remains a mortgagee with somewhat onerous obligations. As pointed out by their Lordships of the Calcutta High Court, the provisions of S. 75 (1) and S. 81 show that, notwithstanding a valid tender or deposit in Court, the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee does not come to an end. But here we are concerned with the case of a payment and not merely a tender. The Allahabad case cited however is more in point. There the mortgage money had been paid off out of the usufruct, but the case may be distinguished on the ground that the mortgagor, by bringing a suit for redemption, admitted the subsistence of the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee. At p. 230 (of 30 ALL.) Karamat Husein, J., cites the following passage from Ashburner on Equity:

"The possession of the mortgage before redemption is possession for the mortgagor and he becomes a trustee for the mortgagee after he has been paid."

I have not been able to find the book referred to, but it seems to me that the English law is somewhat different. If the passage refers to a legal mortgage, then we must not forget that, under such a mortgage, the legal estate is vested in the mortgagee subject to an equity in favour of the mortgagor. In India however the mortgagor remains in possession, and the mortgagee has merely an interest in the property. If he becomes a trustee in India, this is an obligation in the nature of a trust, within the meaning of Ch. 9, Trusts Act. It does not follow that, in such a case, a mortgagee, after a demand for possession, cannot be treated as a trespasser by the person in whom the ownership is vested. There are no limitations, so far as I am aware, in the Transfer of Property Act that a mortgagee, whose right to possession is unconditionally and automatically determined by the terms of the contract, can claim to remain in possession thereafter in spite of demand by the mortgagor. Under S. 56, Trusts Act, a beneficiary may compel the trustee to transfer the trust property to him. It seems to me that a trustee and a mortgagor a quasi trustee, after demand of possession by the beneficiary is in the position of a wrongdoer. In Yates v. Hamley (6), Lord Hardwick compares the position of a mortgagee to whom an estate is conveyed until he shall have received principal and interest out of the rents and profits, to a tenant by eligit so that as soon as the principal and interest were satisfied the estate ceased and the mortgagor might maintain ejectment. I cannot therefore agree with the appellant that a mortgagor can under no circumstances sue the mortgagee in ejectment.

The plaint in the suit of 1908 is based upon the allegation of a demand for possession of field No. 95 and a wrongful withholding of the same by the defendants. I have therefore come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had a right in the circumstances of the case to bring a suit in ejectment, and, as I have already noted, their suit was in form one in ejectment. Therefore it follows that the present claim for mesne profits is not barred. The third ground of appeal cannot be entertained, as the appellants did not file an appeal from the previous order of remand in Civil Appeal No. 89 of 1913. The appeal is therefore dismissed with costs.

The respondents question the amount of damages decreed. The Courts below have given their findings upon such evidence as they considered reliable, and no good grounds have been shown for interference in second appeal. There is an objection also to the award of costs. I see no reason to interfere with the actual order, but if, as suggested, there is an arithmetical mistake in the calculation of costs, it will be rectified by my decree, if the respondents satisfy me, before the decree is signed, that there is any such error. The cross-objection subject to this reservation is also dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—The parties to the suit and one Dukbram Kurmi are cosharers malguzars of 9 annas $\frac{1}{75}$ pies share of mauza Tanda, tahsil Bilaspur. Plaintiff sues for possession of field No. $\frac{1}{2}$, area $\frac{1}{9}$ acres, of the village. During the pendency of the suit the parties referred the question in dispute to arbitration without the intervention of the Court.

The reference to the arbitration was in writing and the arbitrators gave their award on 5th October 1914.

They gave the field in suit to the defendant and gave the field No. 1/3 belonging to the defendant to the plaintiff. But the plaintiff refused to accept this award on the ground that a plot not in dispute had been awarded to him. The trial Court treated the matter as one falling within Sch. 2, Civil P. C., and finding under para. 21 of that schedule that as no grounds mentioned in paras. 14 and 15 were proved, ordered the award to be filed and dismissed the suit. On appeal the District Judge, Bilaspur, came to the conclusion that the case did not fall under Sch. 2 and that the submission to arbitration and the award might be recorded as an agreement or adjustment compromising a suit; and that submission to arbitration and a valid award constitute a proper adjustment, and the only question for determination was whether the award was valid. He held that it was necessary to remand the case for a fresh trial on the ground that it had to be determined whether the parties had referred the question of plot No. 1/3 to arbitration and that if this matter was not referred to arbitration, a further question would arise whether the decision of the arbitrators with respect to plot No. 1/3 could be treated as null and void without affecting the rest of the award. Against that order of remand the present appeal has been filed.

It seems to me very clear that the reference to arbitration admittedly made by the parties in this suit with regard to plot No. $\frac{1}{2}$ does not fall within the provisions of Sch. 2. Paras. 1 to 16 of that schedule plainly apply to arbitrations in a suit and paras. 17 to 21 to arbitrations initiated by the parties. Here, though the arbitration took place during the pendency of the suit, yet it was not referred through the Court. It must therefore be held that as a reference to arbitration was made without the intervention of the Court the award may, if the Court thinks fit, be recorded as an agreement adjusting or compromising the suit, and a decree may be passed in terms of such award, the Court having power to inquire into the disputed compromise and to record it, if satisfied that the compromise was properly arrived at: Harakh.

bai v. Jhmnabai (1) and Pragdas v. Girdhardas (2).

It is pressed that even in this view of the case there is sufficient material on the record to enable this Court to come to a final decision in the matter. It is said that as the award was only objected to on the ground that because a plot not in dispute was awarded to the plaintiff and the solitary witness examined proved that the plaintiff accepted the award, it should be held that he is bound by the terms thereof. But whether the plaintiff did or did not accept the award was not put into issue and that question cannot be decided until the parties have been examined as regards it. The record as it stands does not enable me to give any decision on the question as to what matters beyond the question of plot No. 1 were referred to the arbitrators for disposal. If they were given a free hand in the matter and were empowered to dispose of plot No. 1/3 in arbitration, then their decision must hold good. In cases where the parties have had a dozen separate matters in dispute, only one of which is pending before a Court, there is nothing to prevent them in referring every matter, including that in the Court, to a single arbitration; the decision in which would bind them as regards not only the matter in Court but the other matters as well. In the present case the parties must be questioned as to what disputes were actually referred to the arbitration and until this is done the case cannot be satisfactorily disposed of. If the defendant alleges, as he seems to do, the plaintiff immediately accepted the award made and that point is disputed by the plaintiff, an issue on it will be necessary. In dealing with the question as to whether plot No. 1/3 was included in the reference to the arbitrators I would direct the first Court's attention to para. 6 of the defendant's written statement filed on 7th October 1914. It seems to me that the order of remand appealed from is correct. I therefore dismiss this appeal with costs.

Order.—This case has been reported by the Sessions Judge, Indulapur, under S. 138 Criminal P. C. and the applicant has been allowed to appear in support of the reference. The accused, Rao Bahadur Seth Jiwandas, is under trial on a complaint filed under the sanction of the Municipal President by one Hobbilax, Sanitary Sub-Inspector. He is accused of contravening a bye-law framed under S. 105 (j), Municipal Act. The particular bye-law said to have been broken is No. 2 of those contained by the Hon'ble the Chief Commissioner in his Notification No. 3145 of 10th March 1905.
Jiwandas is accused of allowing some 60 persons to occupy the servants quarter in bungalow No. 31, now being rebuilt, in contravention of the bye-law that "such quarters shall only be occupied by bona fide servants of the occupier of the bungalow and the families of such servants."

Objections were taken in the Magistrate's Court that the Sanitary Sub-Inspector had no power under the Municipal law to lodge the complaint and that the bye-law in question was ultra vires. On these being disallowed, Jiwandas applied to the Sessions Judge for revision with the result that the case has been reported on the ground that the proceedings are bad because instituted by a person without authority. The Sessions Judge also holds that the bye-law is ultra vires if passed under S. 105 (j), Municipal Act, though possibly it might have been framed under S. 105 (s) of that Act.

There is no doubt that this Court can interfere with interlocutory orders; see Chandi Pershad v. Abdur Rahman (1), Jagat Chandra Mozumdar v. Queen-Empress (2), Kuppusami Aiyar, In re (3), Queen-Empress v. Nageshappa Pai (4) and Hari Charan Gorai v. Srish Chandra Sadhukhan (5). But the powers to be exercised with great care and only in most exceptional cases: Inamulla v. King-Emperor (6), and it is inadvisable to interfere:

"in a pending case unless there is some manifest and patent injustice apparent from the face of the proceedings and calling for prompt redress: Jagat Chandra Mozumdar v. Queen-Empress (2)."

It seems to me that the present is not a case for interference at an intermediate stage. The applicant has, beside the two legal questions, raised other defences, namely, that the bye law, which is supposed to have been infringed and under which the complaint is lodged, has no application to the facts and circumstances of the case and that as there is no bungalow now in existence to which the buildings mentioned in the complaint could be said to have been attached as servant's houses, they are not servant's quarters. He denies that the buildings were crowded and states that they had only been occupied by the Sub-Registrar with his family and his own servants. It is further contended that the prosecution is not bona fide but in retaliation for the accused having complained against the misuse of the Raja Gokuldas Dharamsala by Municipal servants. The defence evidence is yet to be recorded and until that is recorded, it is impossible to say whether the case will result in a conviction. The accused has been allowed to appear by pleader except on the day on which he was examined. He is therefore being put to no personal inconvenience and as the punishment for the offence he is accused of is but a fine of Rs. 50, it is not as if there is any danger of his going to jail in place of paying it. It cannot be said that in the present case delay will be injurious. Whether the Sanitary Sub-Inspector had not power to file the complaint is a matter that can well await the conclusion of the trial and though the question whether the bye-law is ultra vires, is doubtless one of great importance, I do not see why the Municipal Committee should be put to the expense of showing in this Court that it is valid until the question is raised by a person who has been convicted under it. The case is one which, in my opinion should not have been reported and I decline to interfere at this stage of the trial. The record to be returned.

First Appeal No. 30 of 1916, Decided on 12th September 1916, from decree of Dist. Judge, Raipur, D/- 29th November 1915, in Civil Suit No. 30 of 1914.

(a) Mahomedan Law—Acknowledgment—Father acknowledging child—Presumption is of legitimacy—Burden of proof is on person denying paternity and legitimacy.

Where a child has been acknowledged by a Mahomedan father, the burden of disproving the paternity and legitimacy of such child lies heavily on the person who denies them. The evidence necessary to disprove the paternity and legitimacy must be extremely cogent to displace the presumption of legitimacy, which is not an ordinary presumption of evidence but a strong rule of the Mahomedan law. The mere oral testimony of partisan witnesses is quite insufficient.

The effect of acknowledgment by a father of his son is such that, even if it cannot legitimize a bastard, it raises so strong a presumption of legitimacy as to throw a heavy onus on the person denying it to establish his allegation, and in order to succeed such person must show either that lawful marriage between the acknowledging father and his son's mother was impossible, or that such marriage did not take place before the child was born: Case law discussed.

Judgment.—The following genealogical tree is evolved from the record of the suit out of which this appeal has arisen.

Mt. Ramotin=Abbas Ali Sograbi (plaintiff).

Zakir Ali (defendant 1).

Wajid Ali was the proprietor of the two villages named Sirnabhata and Dagania in the Revenue Tahsil and District of Deeg, which is a part of the civil District of Raipur. He was a Mussalman of the Sunni sect. He died in 1889, and was succeeded by his son Abbas Ali, who died in 1894. On the death of Abbas Ali, mutation of names in respect of the villages took place in favour of Zakir Ali and Asabi. The plaintiff Sograbi instituted this suit in the Court of the District Judge of Raipur on 15th March 1915, claiming possession of a 10 annas 10 $\frac{3}{4}$ pies share of the above villages, as being her alleged inheritance (a) as the daughter of Wajid Ali, and (b) as the sister of Abbas Ali. The defendants admitted that the plaintiff was entitled to a 4 annas 8 pies share of the villages, as an heir of her father Wajid Ali; but pleaded that she was entitled to no share in the estate of her brother Abbas Ali, being excluded by his son Zakir Ali. The plaintiff, however, replicated that though Zakir Ali was the son of Abbas Ali, he was the illegitimate offspring of one Ramotin, a married Gond woman, with whom Abbas Ali had formed an adulterous intercourse. The defendants rejoined that Abbas Ali was legally married to Ramotin before Zakir Ali was borne and that Abbas Ali had so acknowledged Zakir Ali as his son, as to give him a legitimate status under the Mahomedan law. The following issues were framed and tried:

1. Was Ramotin converted to Islam, and if so when?
2. Was she married to the deceased Abbas Ali, and if so where?
3. Is defendant 1 the legitimate son of Abbas Ali? 4. Had Abbas Ali recognized defendant 1 as his legitimate son? And was defendant 1 treated and brought up as a son in the family as pleaded? 5. Is the defendant entitled to inherit the properties left by Abbas Ali as his son? 6. What share is the plaintiff entitled to get in the properties in suit?

The learned District Judge found upon a careful consideration of the evidence

(1) that Abbas Ali, formed an illicit intercourse with Ramotin, while she was a Gond living with her people, and that Zakir Ali was the offspring of that intercourse; (2) that Abbas Ali married Ramotin by nikah ceremony after the birth of Zakir Ali, and that he acknowledged Zakir Ali as his son and treated him as if he were legitimate; (3) that such acknowledgment could not legitimatise Zakir Ali, who was in fact a bastard and as such could not inherit any part of his father's estate.

Upon these findings the learned Judge gave the plaintiff a decree as claimed by her. From this decree the defendants have made the present appeal, and I have had the advantage of hearing both sides of the case extremely well argued. Having regard to the fact that the litigation represents a purely family dispute I throw out a suggestion that the case was a fit subject for amicable settlement, but this proposal was not seriously taken up, and it is necessary to adjudicate upon the legal rights of the parties, at least so far as is now possible.

Though the arguments before me occupied some time the substance of them can be stated in a few words. On behalf of the appellants the contention was this: that under Mahomedan law, as interpreted by a series of decisions by the High Courts in India and their Lordships of the Privy Council, an acknowledgment of a son by his father is conclusive as to the legitimacy of the former and in the presence of it, no evidence of birth in wedlock is necessary. It was also urged that such evidence as had been given in this case, assisted by the acknowledgment of the father, was sufficient to prove that Abbas Ali married Ramotin before Zakir Ali was born. On behalf of the respondent it was argued that the finding of the lower Court, that the marriage of Abbas Ali and Ramotin was not proved, displaced any presumption arising from the acknowledgment of Zakir Ali by his father; that acknowledgment could not legitimatise a bastard and that in face of the positive finding on the evidence there was no room left for any presumption. It is manifest that a material error has been committed in the trial of the case in respect of the onus of proof. The learned Judge of the Court below first placed on the defendant Zakir Ali the burden of proving that his parents had been married before he was born: and then, finding the marriage unproved, he went on to hold that the father's acknowledgment could not prevail in the fact of that finding. The learned Judge seems to have assumed that a failure to prove the marriage was the same thing as a disproof of it, much in the same way as our subordinate Courts sometimes declare an unproved document to be a forgery. This error in the present case started with the framing of the issues, in which the learned District Judge was guided, somewhat naturally, by the normal rules of pleading and proof, overlooking the bearing thereon of the Mahomedan law. In my opinion the proper issues would have been the following:

1. Did Abbas Ali acknowledge the defendant Zakir Ali as his son? If so,
2. Is not Zakir Ali the legitimate son of Abbas Ali?

As will presently be made apparent, the effect of acknowledgment by a father of his son is such that, even if it cannot legitimatise a bastard, it raises so strong a presumption of legitimacy as to throw a heavy onus on the person denying it to establish his allegation: and, in order to succeed, the evidence must show either that lawful marriage between the acknowledging father and his son's mother was impossible, or did not in fact take place before the child was born. It would not be just to decide the question here without giving the plaintiff an opportunity of discharging this onus. Therefore if the presumption of legitimacy raised by the acknowledgment is not conclusive but is rebuttable, then the case must go back for a trial from the proper standpoint.

I may say that the acknowledgment of Zakir Ali by Abbas Ali was not disputed before me. It is most clearly established by the evidence on both sides that from the time of his birth Abbas Ali treated Zakir Ali as his son; and, if not before birth—a controversial point on which I refrain from expressing any opinion—at any rate shortly after, Abbas Ali installed mother and child in his own house as his wife and son, and thereafter gave them all the domestic status and overt recognition due to a wedded wife and lawful son. And we have seen that Zakir Ali succeeded as the heir of his father in 1904 without any objection by his grandmother, the defendant Asabi, who was apparently then also the guardian of her minor daughter, the plaintiff, though this fact has not been made clear. It is not disputed that Zakir Ali is the son of Abbas Ali. There is no question of any ascription of the son to some other person. There is no controversy whatever on the point of filiation. The issues between the parties are merely as to his legitimacy in fact, and his legitimatization by law; and I must deal first with the latter; because, if acknowledgment is conclusive for the purpose of making Zakir Ali the heir of his father, then it will not be necessary to direct a further trial for a decision of the question whether, in fact, this defendant was born or begotten out of wedlock.

The question of law is one of considerable difficulty, and there is unquestionably some variation of opinions upon it in the published decisions and the textbooks. It seems expedient to examine some of the more important cases bearing upon it. In Ashruffoodowlah Ahmed Hossein v. Hyder Hossein Khan (1) it was laid down that mere continued cohabitation, without proof of marriage or of acknowledgment, is not sufficient to raise such a legal presumption of marriage as to legitimatise the offspring. Marriage and acknowledgment may be presumed, but the presumption must be one of fact, and, as such, subject to the application of the ordinary rules of evidence. A subsequent marriage, so far from furnishing a ground for presuming a prior marriage, prima facie at least, excludes that presumption. In this case their Lordships regarded acknowledgment of paternity under Mahomedan law as being "a recognition, not merely of sonship but of legitimacy as a son." Their Lordships further remarked that though the general rules of evidence of the Mahomedan law did not prevail in the British Indian Courts, still, in relation to this particular subject of establishment of paternity and legitimacy, so intimately connected with family feelings and usages deference to those rules was recommended if not enjoined : and in this connexion, they quoted a passage from their own decision in Khajah Hidayut Oollah v. Rai Jan Khanum (2) as follows:

"We apprehend that in considering this question of Mahomedan law we must at least to a certain extent, be governed by the same principle of evidence which the Mussalman lawyers themselves would apply to the consideration of such a question."

In the case last quoted, which was decided in 1884 A. D., it was held that under the Mahomedan law continual cohabitation and acknowledgment of parentage is presumptive evidence of marriage and legitimacy; and that view, at least, is now so firmly established that there can be no question that the lower Court, in this case, wrongly called for proof, when it should have demanded disproof of the legitimacy of Zakir Ali. The same rule was affirmed in Khajooroonissa v. Rowshan Jehan (3), another decision by the Supreme Tribunal. In Mahomed Azmat Ali Khan v. Lalli Begum (4) the Judicial Committee laid down that:

"the acknowledgment and recognition of children by a Mahomedan as his sons, giving them the status of sons capable of inheriting as being of legitimate birth may without proof of his express acknowledgment of them be inferred from his treatment of such children, provided that certain conditions negating this relationship are absent."

In the course of a comprehensive judgment their Lordships ruled that in the face of a proved acknowledgment of his two sons by the father it was not necessary to pronounce a distinct opinion upon the question whether the marriage in fact took place, as the sons were entitled to succeed upon the ground that acknowledgments of them by their father had been proved. But the case does not lay down that an acknowledgment is conclusive on the point of legitimacy. Their Lordships said at p. 432:

"The only question which remains on this part of the case is as to the effect of these acknowledgments. Both the Judges of the Chief Court, who have given learned and careful judgments, have gone very fully into the authorities upon this question. Their Lordships however are relieved from a discussion of those authorities, inasmuch as the rule of Mahomedan law has not been disputed at the Bar, viz., that the acknowledgment and recognition of children by a Mahomedan as his sons gives them the status of sons capable of inheriting as legitimate sons, unless certain conditions exist, which do not occur in this case. That rule of the Mahomedan law has not been questioned at the Bar."

As will appear hereafter there has been some diversity of opinion in this country as to the proper interpretation of this ruling; but Mr. Ameer Ali, in his standard work on the Mahomedan Law, Edn. 3, Vol. 2, at p. 258, following the opinion of Mahmood, J., in a case to be presently noticed, considered that their Lordships "never intended to imply that an acknowledgment by a man of his natural-born children—of his offspring by a woman between whom and himself there could not be any valid union, or notoriously there was none—would give the children the status of legitimacy, though the Courts in India have to some extent understood the decision in that sense."

My opinion is that the Judicial Committee left the question undecided because, as they expressly stated, the admission at the Bar relieved them from the necessity of deciding it. A decision which follows an admission or agreement of the parties on a point of personal law cannot be interpreted to represent the judicial opinion of the tribunal on that point, so as to constitute case-law. The uncertainty was however somewhat enhanced by the decision of the Judicial Committee in Sadakat Hossein v. Mahomed Yusuf (5). The placitum in this case reads thus:

"The acknowledgment and recognition of a natural son by a Mahomedan as his son gives him the status of a son capable of inheriting as a legitimate son, unless certain conditions exist. Whether the offspring of an adulterous intercourse can be legitimated by any acknowledgment is an open question."

The High Court had found that the boy concerned had been begotten by his father upon a woman who had been in an inferior station in his household, and was born out of wedlock; but they relied upon the decision of the Supreme Tribunal in Ashraffoodowlah Ahmed Hossein v. Hyder Hossein Khan (1) in ruling that he had been legitimated by his father's acknowledgment, and was entitled to inherit as a legitimate son. The Calcutta Court had further declared that it was not necessary to decide whether the parents had or had not been married. In disposing of the appeal before them their Lordships of the Privy Council said:

"The real issue in this case, and the only issue upon which their Lordships feel it necessary to decide, is whether Selim—who was beyond question the actual son of Amir Hossein by a woman known as Domni—had been so recognized by Amir Hossein as to give him the status of a son capable of inheriting. The suit relates to the property of Amir Hossein. * * * A question of importance was raised by the counsel for the appellant. He contended that Selim could not be treated as having acquired the status of a son capable of inheriting, because he alleged that the intercourse between Amir Hossein and Domni was an adulterous intercourse as she had been previously married to a person then and still living, and that consequently whether her connexion with Amir Hossein was preceded by a marriage ceremony with him or not, yet still the intercourse was adulterous and that according to Mahomedan law, the issue of that adulterous intercourse could not inherit as heir or acquire the status of a son by recognition. It therefore becomes necessary to consider in the first instance whether the alleged marriage of Domni to a man named Jummun has been established by satisfactory proof."

The evidence and probabilities for and against this alleged marriage having been considered, the judgment proceeds:

"Their Lordships have then come to the conclusion that the parties fail to establish this marriage between Jummun and Domni. That relieves them from offering an opinion upon the very important question of law which was raised by the counsel for the appellant, namely whether, if there had been this marriage, the offspring of an adulterous intercourse could be legitimated by any acknowledgment. The absence of reliable proof, such as their Lordships could act upon, of the marriage of Domni and Jummun, appears to their Lordships to relieve the case from further difficulty. They do not intend in the least to depart from the statement of the law upon an appeal to the Privy Council in the case of Mahammad Asmat Ali Khan v. Lalli Begum (4)."

Their Lordships then cited the rule of Mahomedan law already set out herein, which was admitted by the parties and adopted by the Board in that case, and then proceeded:

"Their Lordships do not intend at all to depart from that rule, or to throw any doubt upon it. The Judge of the primary court who saw and who heard the witnesses, and the Judges of the Supreme Court who examined into the evidence afterwards, concur in opinion that there was sufficient evidence of the acknowledgment by Amir Hossein of Selim as his son, from which an inference is fairly to be deduced that the father intended to recognize him and give him the status of a son capable of inheriting. Upon that point both the Courts come to one conclusion; and that conclusion their Lordships adopt. They think that the status of Selim as son has been sufficiently established by recognition so as to enable him to claim as heir."

It seems clear from this decision that while the question whether an offspring of an adulterous intercourse—by which is meant offspring begotten on the lawful wife of another man—could be made an heir of the natural father by acknowledgment was left an open question, their Lordships favoured the view that a son begotten on a maid or widow, though born out of wedlock, could be legitimated by such acknowledgment. But the efforts of Mussalman lawyers in India have consistently and successfully opposed that view, as will hereafter be made apparent.

In Abdul Razak v. Aga Mahomed Joffer Bindanim (6) their Lordships of the Privy Council ruled that under the Mahomedan law the legitimation of a son born out of legal wedlock, may be effected by the force of his being of legitimate birth, but that a mere recognition of sonship is insufficient to effect it. Acknowledgment, in the sense meant by that law, is required, viz., of antecedent right and not a mere recognition of paternity. This decision purports to explain certain passages in Ashruffoodowlah Ahmed Hossein v. Hyder Hossein Khan (1) already cited above but makes no reference to any of the other cases, though they were all put forward at the Bar. It is undoubtedly difficult to reconcile the later of these two rulings with the clear and correct enunciation of the Mahomedan law contained in the earlier of them that an acknowledgment of sonship is also an acknowledgment of legitimacy. Abdul Razak v. Aga Mahomed Joffer Bindanim (6) was the case of a child born of a union between a Mussalman and a Burmese woman who had not been converted to Islam. With all respect and due submission, it seems clear that an incontrovertible principle of the Mahomedan law was overlooked, namely that the status of legitimacy is not confined to the offspring of a valid marriage but extends to the offspring of all unions which are not wilfully incestuous, adulterous, or otherwise within the definition of zina.

As pointed out by Mr. Ameer Ali in his Mahomedan Law, Edn. 3, Vol. 2, p. 234, et seq., the presumption of legitimacy is so strong that only the offspring of a connexion where the man has no right or semblance of right in the woman either by marriage or by the relationship of master and bondswoman, is a 'walad uz zina' or child of fornication. The learned author also mentions the great difference between a marriage which is void ab initio (batil) and one which is merely invalid (fasid) but capable of being validated; and shows that while even the issue of an involuntary batil marriage, i. e., one contracted in error or ignorance of the facts, may be legitimate, the offspring of a fasid union is always legitimate. The marriage of a Mussalman with a heathen woman would only be fasid, for she might at any time adopt Islam or any other revealed faith, and thus remove the cause of invalidity. Therefore the children of such a marriage would be legitimate. In this connexion the following commentary of Mr. Ameer Ali on Abdul Razak v. Aga Mahomet Jaffer Hindanum (6) appears in a note under p. 235:

"In view of this recognized principle, it seems to me that * * * the real question was raised * * * before the Judicial Committee. For if there was a de facto marriage, the prior conversion of the woman, so far as the legitimacy of the child was concerned was immaterial."

Again a Mussalman may not marry two sisters by the same contract, or one after another whilst the previous marriage with one of them is subsisting. But if he should do so in fact, the later marriage is fasid and not batil, because the prior marriage may become dissolved at any time by death or divorce and automatically validate the second union. Accordingly, although the Qazi may separate the parties on the ground of invalidity of the marriage, and the woman can acquire no right of inheritance thereby unless and until it is validated, nevertheless if it is consummated while fasid the issue would be legitimate: Ameer Ali's Mahomedan Law, Vol. 2, p. 319; Wilson's Digest of Anglo Mahomedan Law, Eln. 4 pp. 118 and 120. It is true that in dizunnissa Khatoon v. Karimunnissa Khatoon (7) such a union was held to be batil, and the issue illegitimate. The error of this view is clearly pointed out by Mr. Ameer Ali at pp. 236 and 368 of his above volume, and with due respect for the Calcutta High Court I think that the learned commentator rightly says that some confusion appears to have arisen in that case between the title of the second wife to inheritance and the status of the children born of her; and at p. 387, of his above volume Mr. Ameer Ali gives good reasons for the view that a passage from the Rudd-ul-Muhtar which refers only to the particular case of a union between a non-Moslem man and a Moslem woman was misapprehended by the learned Judges as being applicable to a contemporaneous marriages with two sisters where all the parties were Moslems. Sir R. K. Wilson in his above Digest has not appreciated these points in discussing the same decision at p. 118, and according to a note at the foot of that page, he was puzzled by an apparent conflict of authority which has no real existence in Mahomedan law. I now turn to the Indian decisions. In Qomla Beebee v. Syud Shah Jonab Ali (8) it was held that according to Mahomedan law, the acknowledgment of a father renders a son or daughter a legitimate child or an heir, unless it is impossible for the son or daughter to be so. This decision was given by so eminent an authority as Sir Barnes Peacock. In an earlier case, Rooh Begum v. Shahzadun Walagachur Shoh (9), it was ruled, under the same law, by Lock and Glower, J.J., that a public acknowledgment of paternity will of itself raise a presumption of marriage between the person who makes it and the mother of the child, without the father specifically connecting his paternity with any particular woman. To rebut this presumption, the onus of proving the impossibility of the marriage is on the other side.

In Najmooddeen Ahmed v. Beebee Zuhoorun (10) Macpherson, J., raised the presumption from the position of one that is rebuttable to that of one that is conclusive and absolute, by holding that the acknowledgment of the father renders the son a legitimate son and heir, whether the mother was or was not lawfully married to the father. This decision was influenced by certain observations of the Privy Council in the case of Ashruffoodollah Ahmed Hossein v. Hyder Hossein Khan (1) above quoted. The rule, as to the onus of proof being on the party disputing the legitimacy of an acknowledged son, was again enunciated in Zulfekar Khan v. Golam Murteza Khan (11). In Nubo Kant Roy v. Mahatab Bibee (12) Jackson and Mitter, J.J., described an acknowledgment of sonship made by the father to a third party as "conclusive against all parties," and claimed authority for that proposition from the decision in Bibi Najibunnissa, In the matter of the Petition of (13), a case in which Mr. Ameer Ali thinks the Mahomedan law was misapprehended: see p. 255n of the above volume of his Commentary. In Mt. Butoolun v. Mt. Koolsoom (14) Garth, C. J., and Ainslie, J., replaced the presumption from acknowledgment upon its proper footing as one which may be rebutted, and found ample authority for that view in Mahomed Bauker Hoossain Khan v. Shurfoon-nissa Begum (15).

The latest decisions of the Privy Council had however left an impression that, in some cases, a child born of an illicit intercourse, which was not incestuous or adulterous, could be legitimatised by the acknowledgment of his sonship by the father, and the Allahabad High Court were called upon to deal with the question in a case which has since become a leading authority on the point. Mohamed Allahadad Khan v. Mahomed Ismail Khan (16) first came before a Division Bench (Petheram, C. J., and Brodhurst, J.), in which the learned Judges were divided in opinion as to the legal effect of an acknowledgment of sonship by the father. In appeal, the case went before a Bench of three Judges, namely, Edge, C. J., Straight and Mahmood, JJ. The dictum of Edge, C. J., and Straight, J., was as follows:

"The rules of the Mahomedan law relating to acknowledgment by a Mahomedan of another as his son are rules of the substantive law of inheritance. Such an acknowledgment, unless certain impediments exist, confers upon the person acknowledged the status of a legitimate son capable of inheriting. Where there is no proof of legitimate birth or of illegitimate birth, and the paternity of a child is unknown in the sense that no specific person is shown to be the father, then the acknowledgment of him by another who claims him as a son affords a conclusive presumption that he is the legitimate child of the acknowledger, and places him in that category. Such a status once conferred cannot be destroyed by any subsequent act of the acknowledger or of any one claiming through him."

In the same case Mahmood, J., decided as follows:

"Acknowledgments of parentage and other matters of personal status stand upon a higher footing than matters of evidence and form a part of the substantive Mahomedan law. So far as inheritance through males is concerned * legitimate descent depends upon the existence of a valid marriage between the parents.

Where legitimacy cannot be established by direct proof of such a marriage acknowledgment is recognized by the Mahomedan law as a means whereby the marriage of the parents or legitimate descent may be established as a matter of substantive law. Such acknowledgment always proceeds upon the hypothesis of a lawful union between the parents and the legitimate descent of the acknowledged person from the acknowledger and there is nothing in the Mahomedan law similar to adoption as recognized by the Roman and Hindu systems or admitting of an affiliation which has no reference to consanguinity or legitimate descent.

A child whose illegitimacy is proved beyond doubt by reason of the marriage of its parents being either disproved or found to be unlawful, cannot be legitimatised by acknowledgment. Acknowledgment has only the effect of legitimization where either the fact of the marriage or its exact time with reference to the legitimacy of the child's birth is a matter of uncertainty."

Now there can be no doubt that so much of the above view as I have underlined (italics) is in apparent disregard of the two Privy Council cases Mahammad Asmat Ali Khan v. Lalli Begum (4) and Sadakat Hussein v. Mahomed Yusuf (5), wherein some observations of their Lordships seem to imply that legitimation might be effected by acknowledgment in spite of proof that the mother of the acknowledgee was not the wife of the father at the time of the acknowledgment. But in both these cases Mahmood, J., argued that marriage had been alleged and had simply been held not to be proved (though it is difficult to justify this as a correct interpretation of the later case) and he felt himself still at liberty therefore to maintain p. 337 (of 10 All.) that

"there is no warrant in the principles of the Mahomedan law to justify the view that a child proved to be the offspring of fornication adultery or incest could be made legitimate by an act of acknowledgment."

Whatever may be the value of the learned Judge's interpretation of the Privy Council view in Sadakat Hossein v. Mahomed Yusuf (5), I am of opinion that his enunciation of the Mahomedan law is unquestionably sound. With all respect to their Lordships of the Privy Council if they intended to lay down that a child born of an intercourse which though amounting to fornication is neither incestuous nor adulterous can be made legitimate by acknowledgment it is impossible to find in any known authority on Mahomedan law, any support for the suggested distinction between the son of a mere fornicatress and the son of an adulteress. As pointed out by Wilson, at p. 172 of his above Digest, such a distinction is wholly foreign to that law which includes all forms of intercourse not legalised by marriage—whether valid or capable of validation—or by proprietorship under the one appellation of zina and subjects all alike to the ban of the criminal law. The dictum of Mahmood, J., on this point though obiter has been consistently acknowledged as correct in several subsequent decisions by the High Courts in India. In Liaquat Ali v. Karimunnissa (17) it was followed. Edge, C. J., and Burkitt, J., held that a Mahomedan cannot by acknowledging him as his son render legitimate a child whose mother at the time of his birth he could not have married by reason of her being the wife of another man. This ruling however was not even in apparent conflict with the Privy Council view in Sadat Hossein v. Mahomed Yusuf (5) because it dealt with the offspring of adultery; and their Lordships had expressly left undecided the question whether the fruit of an adulterous intercourse could be legitimatised by acknowledgment. The Allahabad Bench decided that question against the alleged acknowledgee. But that does not touch the question of the position of an acknowledgee who is the issue of non-adulterous and non-incestuous fornication.

In Aizunnissa Khatoon v. Karimunnissa Khatoon (7), already cited above in connexion with the legitimacy of a child born of a union with the sister of an existing wife—a point with which we are not concerned in this case—the Calcutta High Court expressly followed the above dictum of Mahmood, J., and held that the doctrine of acknowledgment is not applicable to a case in which the paternity of the child is known, and it cannot therefore be called in to legitimatise a child which is illegitimate by reason of the unlawfulness of the marriage of its parents. But, here again, the decision is of no value on the particular question whether the issue of simple fornication cannot be legitimatised by acknowledgment. For if the marriage with the sister was batal—as held by the Calcutta Court—then there was a condition present which rendered legitimacy impossible, namely the impossibility of a lawful union between the parents; while, if the marriage was fasid, there was no need of acknowledgment, the child of such a union being recognized as legitimate by the law.

However, in Dhan Bibi v. Lalon Bibi (18) we have a case directly in point, because the child concerned was neither the child of adultery, as in Liaquat Ali v. Karimunnissa (17), nor of incest, as he was considered to be in Aizunnissa Khatoon v. Karimunnissa Khatoon (7), but the offspring of simple fornication. The Privy Council cases above mentioned were fully considered, and it was held that, under the Mahomedan law, where a child is begotten by a Mahomedan father on a Hindu prostitute living with him, no acknowledgment by the father can confer on the child the status of legitimacy. This view was subsequently distinguished but not dissented from, by three Judges of the same High Court, who decided in Bilee Fazilatunnissa v. Hibeet Kamrunnessa (19), that unless there is an absolute bar or impediment to a valid marriage, acknowledgment has the effect of legitimation according to Mahomedan law, where either the fact of the marriage, or its exact time with reference to the legitimacy of the child's birth, is a matter of uncertainty. It was further held in this case that the doctrine of acknowledgment is an integral portion of the Mahomedan family law, and the conditions under which it will take effect must be determined with reference to Mahomedan jurisprudence, rather than to the Evidence Act. It will thus be seen that the dictum of Mahmood, J., in the leading Allahabad case was again substantially approved and followed. That was also the course adopted by the Bombay High Court in the very recent case of Mardansaheb v. Rajasaheb (20), where it was ruled that under Mahomedan law a person can acknowledge a child as a son, when there is no proof of the latter's legitimate or illegitimate birth, and his paternity is unknown in the sense that no specific person is shown to have been his father. It is not permissible to acknowledge a child born of zina (i. e., fornication, adultery, or incest). In this case the learned Judges had before them all the previous decisions above examined, but they confined themselves to an unconditional adoption of the law as laid down by Mahmood, J., in the case of Muhammed Allahdad v. Muhammad Ismail Khan (16).

In Sundari Letani v. Pitambari Letani (21), where a Hindu married woman, undivorced from her Hindu husband, embraced Islam and married a Mahomedan according to the forms of Mahomedan law, and had sons by him during the lifetime of her Hindu husband, it was held that the sons were illegitimate; and Dhan Bibi v. Lalun Bibi (18) was relied upon as an authority for that view. But the case was decided from the Hindu point of view, and should not, I think, be regarded as laying down what would have been the position of the sons with reference to their right of inheritance from their Mahomedan father, either by virtue of the nikah, or by his acknowledgment of them, if any. There does not appear to be any published decision of this Court upon the legal effect of an acknowledgment of sonship under the Mahomedan law, though the question must frequently have arisen. I have therefore made a full examination of the authorities in this case. I have been unable to find any ruling of the Madras High Court, but it seems to me that there is sufficient case-law available for my guidance. Before summing up the matter, it seems expedient to mention one or two other points which have some bearing on the question.

The decision of Mahmood, J., above cited lays down the proof or presumption of a valid marriage as a condition precedent to the legitimacy of a son under Mahomedan law. It is somewhat difficult to reconcile this with the very clear enunciation of that law by Mr. Ameer Ali in his above treatise according to which illegitimacy is confined to the offspring of zina, in which is included a union, albeit obtained by going through the ceremony prescribed for lawful marriage, between persons whose lawful marriage is impossible by reason of some absolute and insurmountable barrier so that the attempted marriage is batil. But even where a void marriage of that kind is entered into in error or ignorance as to facts the issue thereof conceived before discovery of the error and nullification of the union by the Judge is held legitimate and in every case the issue of a fasid marriage even though the woman fails to acquire thereby all the status of a wife is declared to be legitimate without acknowledgment and despite subsequent severance of the parents. I must take this to be the law notwithstanding that the dictum of Mahmood, J., suggests that the issue of an invalid marriage is, ipso facto illegitimate.

Again, in considering the absolute bars to legitimacy, we must bear in mind that there can be no legitimate "per subsequens matrimonium" under the Mahomedan law. That law requires that the child should be born not less than six months after the date of marriage proved or presumed; but acknowledgment will secure legitimacy to an earlier child by certain fictions in favour of legitimacy, to which Mr. Ameer Ali refers at pp. 232 and 323 of his said volume. Legitimacy is also presumed in the case of a birth within two years of the termination of a valid marriage. These presumptions being a part of the substantive law of the Mahomedans will not be affected it seems by the rule laid down in S. 112, Evidence Act. Wilson's Digest, p. 169, Ameer Ali's Mahomedan law, Vol. 2, p. 234. It is not enough that the child should be born in wedlock. It must be conceived as the result of a union which is not zina, i. e., an act of fornication.

So far then as the present case is concerned the Mahomedan law applicable may be summarized thus: (1) In all cases in which marriage may be presumed from cohabitation combined with other circumstances for the purpose of conferring upon the woman the status of a wife, it may also be presumed for the purpose of establishing paternity and legitimacy. (2) Paternity is established in the person said to be the father by proof or legal presumption that the child was begotten by him on a woman who was at the time of conception his lawful wife or was in good faith or reasonably believed by him to be such, or whose marriage being merely irregular (fasid) and not void (ab initio batil) had not at that time been terminated by actual separation. In all such cases the offspring of the union is legitimate. (3) Paternity and legitimacy may also be presumed from acknowledgment by the putative father in every case where it is humanly and legally possible that he might have been the father in the fact, and there might have been a valid marriage between him and the mother of the acknowledged child. (4) This presumption of paternity and legitimacy can be rebutted by—(a) disclaimer on the part of the acknowledgee, he or she being of an age to understand the transactions; (b) such proximity between the ages of acknowledgee and acknowledgee as would under the alleged relationship be physically impossible; (c) proof that the acknowledgee is in fact the child of some other person; or (d) proof that the mother of the acknowledgee could not possibly have been the lawful wife of the acknowledgee at any time when the acknowledgee could have been begotten, and that such child is therefore waladuz-zina. (5) A marriage by a Mahomedan with a non-Moslem woman unconverted to Islam, who is not at the time the lawful wife of another man is merely irregular (fasiq) and the child born of such a union is legitimate. (6) Where a child has been acknowledged by a Mahomedan father the burden of disproving the paternity and legitimacy of such child lies heavily on the person who denies them. (7) Neither paternity nor legitimacy can be obtained by adoption and a child begotten by zina cannot be made legitimate by the subsequent marriage of its parents before its birth, S. 112, Evidence Act, being inapplicable to Mahomedans.

In this view of the law it seems obvious that the case must go back for retrial. I do not think it would suffice to refer back an issue as to the legitimacy of the defendant Zakar Ali. It is necessary to have a full examination of the parties so as to ascertain their allegations as to the circumstances under which Ramotin became the mother of Zakar Ali. Such vague allegations as the following, made by the defendant's pleader, cannot be accepted:

"Abbas Ali married Ramotin by nikah after converting her into Islam, but when this nikah took place my clients cannot say."

It is the business of Zakar Ali's guardian and advisers to ascertain the facts from Ramotin who is said to be alive; and that lady should certainly be examined as a witness on the point. Their general allegations of marriage or of illegitimacy, are quite insufficient. The plaintiff must prove according to definite allegations, that there was an insurmountable barrier to a lawful marriage between Ramotin and Abbas Ali. Failing that the presumption of marriage will be all but conclusive, and though marriage can be disproved the evidence must be extremely cogent to displace the presumption which is not an ordinary presumption of evidence but a strong rule of the Mahomedan law. The mere oral testimony of partisan witnesses would be quite insufficient. The appeal is allowed; the decree of the lower Court is reversed and the case is remanded for a fresh trial and decision with advantage to the above remarks. There will be no refund of court-fees. Costs here and thither will abide the result.

Judgment.—This is an appeal from a suit to enforce a mortgage deed, dated 28th October 1912, executed by the deceased Ruprai for himself and for his minor uncle Narayansingh. The suit is against Noharsingh, minor son of Ruprai, and Narayansingh who has since attained majority. Out of the consideration of Rs. 5,500 secured by the mortgage, Rs. 3,500 was for the redemption of a prior mortgage dated 11th March 1909 also executed by Ruprai in favour of one Amritrao for Rs. 2,700. The plaintiff claims to have redeemed this prior mortgage and produced the original mortgage-deed (Ex. P.5), which contains an endorsement of satisfaction purporting to be in the handwriting of Amritrao. The plaintiff has been given a decree against the four annas share of Ruprai and the suit has been dismissed as against the shares of Narayansingh and Noharsingh, the lower Court holding that no legal necessity has been proved. The first point for decision is whether the plaintiffs has proved legal necessity for either of the mortgages. Both the documents contain the usual recitals which would make out a case for necessity. The transactions however are so recent that little weight can be attached to these recitals. The plaintiff who is the original mortgagee of the deed in suit, has not gone into the witness-box to depose to the representations made to him, nor is there any evidence that he made any inquiries, and was satisfied about the necessity for the loan. There is no oral evidence of any kind to prove that the loans were necessary. The prior mortgage, it will be noted, was also by Ruprai and not by any ancestor of Narayansingh. It may be conceded, as argued for the appellant, that Ruprai was the manager though the lower Court was disposed to think otherwise, but this concession does not carry the plaintiff's case any further.

Reliance however is placed upon certain statements made by Narayansingh and contained in Exs. P.2, P.4, and P.6. In these statements the plaintiff's mortgage debt is admitted as an existing debt. Narayansingh applied to the Deputy Commissioner under S. 45, Tenancy Act, for sanction to transfer sir land without reservation of expropriatory occupancy rights. He had to establish that the debts could not be met except by such a transfer. This statement is made by Narayansingh as representing himself and the minor Noharsingh. It is to the following effect:

"We owe Rs. 5,500 to Dilesar (plaintiff) under a mortgage-deed and our 12 annas of Babarhod is mortgaged for this debt."

The lower Court has attached no importance to this statement as, in its opinion, Narayansingh had just attained majority; but it is pointed out that Narayansingh's age as given in the deposition (Ex. P.6) was 22. It is urged that this statement amounts to an admission which shifts the burden of proof as against both him and the minor Noharsingh. I agree with the contention of the appellant that the statement is relevant also against Noharsingh. The following statement of the law from Taylor on Evidence has been held by Garth, C. J., in Kowsulliah Sundari Dasi v. Mukta Sundari Dasi (1) to be applicable to India under S. 18, Evidence Act:

"When several persons are jointly interested in the subject-matter of the suit, the general rule is that the admissions of any one of those persons are receivable against himself and his fellows, whether they be all jointly suing or sued, provided the admission relates to the subject-matter in dispute and be made by the declarant in his character of a person jointly interested with the party against whom the evidence is tendered."

To the same effect is the recent judgment of Mookerjee, J., in Ambar Ali v. Lutfe Ali (2), where other authorities have been collected. It is urged that the statement of Narayansingh amounts also to an admission on the part of Noharsingh under S. 18, Evidence Act, and this admission has the effect of shifting the burden of proof on both of them. In support of this the appellant cites the Privy Council case of Chandra Kunwar v. Chaudhuri Narpot Singh (3). The case in the Privy Council was concerned with the admission of a party himself and it was also upon a question of fact regarding his adoption. Although I have held that the statement of Narayansingh is receivable in evidence against Noharsingh, it is only an admission by construction of law. I doubt whether such a constructive admission has the

The Privy Council laid down that where there is an admission by a party, he has to show that the admission was untrue in fact vide p. 195 (of 29 All. of the report). Their Lordships quote the following passage from the judgment of Baron Parke: "What a party himself admits to be true may reasonably be presumed to be so." The statement above referred to (Ex. P. 6) makes no allegation regarding the purpose for which the loan was taken from the plaintiff. It merely states the existence of a debt. Its binding character is only to be inferred. According to the view hitherto taken by the Court in such cases, it is binding to the extent of Ruprai's share in the family property. The mortgage is one by conditional sale in which there is no personal covenant to pay. It is not likely that Narayansingh would know whether he could repudiate Ruprai's mortgages until he went to a lawyer, so far as his share was concerned. The allegation so far as it relates to the existence of the debt, is not disputed now. The plaintiff was no party to those proceedings and there was no occasion for making a statement as to whether the debt was binding on Ruprai's share alone or on the whole family property. The utmost that can be contended is that Narayansingh at the time probably believed that the mortgage was binding. This is a mixed question of law and fact regarding which Narayansingh's belief may be well founded or ill founded. The plaintiff is now seeking to draw some far-fetched inferences from that admission. The Privy Council case, in my opinion, is no authority for drawing such inferences from the statement contained in Ex. P. 6. The same observation applies to Exs. P. 2 and P. 4. I hold that the burden of proof is not shifted by those statements.

On the whole I agree with the lower Court that legal necessity for either of the mortgages has not been proved. This disposes of the case so far as Narayansingh is concerned and also the case against Noharsingh, except as regards the item of Rs. 3,500. As against Noharsingh it is argued that there was an antecedent debt of the father which the mortgagee had paid off. To prove the endorsement of Amritrao on the back of his mortgage the plaintiff called one witness P. W. 7. The witness says:

"The endorsement on the back of Ex. P. 5 appears to be in Amritrao's handwriting. I cannot say for certain if the handwriting is Amritrao's. I have some doubts, I cannot say it is a forgery."

This was all said in examination-in-chief. I agree with the lower Court that the evidence of this witness is insufficient to prove the endorsement. There is no other witness on the point. It is however rightly pointed out that the plaintiff has produced the original mortgage deed from Amritrao. Some presumption, no doubt, arises from this fact but it is still impossible to hold on this presumption that the plaintiff had paid Rs. 3,500 to Amritrao; and without a finding regarding the amount paid by the plaintiff it is impossible to give a decree. I am asked to give the plaintiff a further opportunity of proving the endorsement. This I am not prepared to do, especially as no application to this effect was made to the lower Court after the examination of P. W. 7 or at any later stage. In Sahu Ram Chandra v. Bhup Singh (4) Lord Shaw lays down what sort of antecedent debt will justify the father in charging the family property. His Lordship says:

"It must be an obligation not only antecedently incurred, but incurred wholly apart from the ownership of the joint estate or the security afforded or supposed to be available by such joint estate."

The father's power in the absence of necessity to deal with the joint family property is treated in the judgment as an exception to the general principle of Hindu law. This judgment then proceeds:

"The exception being allowed, as in the state of the authorities it must be, it appears to their Lordships to apply, and to apply to the case where the father's debts have been incurred irrespective of the credit obtainable from immovable assets which do not personally belong to him but are joint family property. In their view of the rights of a father and his creditors, if the principle were extended further, then the exception would be made so wide as in effect to extinguish the sound and wholesome principle itself, viz. that no manager, guardian, or trustee can be entitled for his own purposes to dispose of the estate which is under his charge. In short, it may be said that the rule of this part of the Mitakshara law is that the joint family estate is in this position: under his management he can neither obtain money for his own purposes for it nor can he obtain money for his own purposes upon it. To permit him to do so would enable him to sacrifice those rights which he was bound to conserve. This would be equivalent to sanctioning a plain and, it might be, a deliberate breach of trust. The Mitakhsara law does not warrant or legalize any such transaction. The limits of the principle of the exception have been thus set forth, because in their Lordships' opinion they form a guide to the settlement of the conflict of authority in India on the subject of antecedent debt."

The previous debt, having been secured upon the credit of the joint immovable property, was not such an antecedent debt for which Ruprai could have charged his son's share in the joint family property. The decree of the lower Court has awarded the plaintiff the mortgagor's share in the mortgaged property. There is no appeal from this decree by the defendants. There appears to be an accidental slip in the judgment and decree which requires correction. Although no application has been made to me under S. 152, Civil P. C., I have the power to correct the decree, especially in view of the new section, O. 41, R. 33. Ruprai's share in the family property was four annas. The lower Court says that the mortgage is binding on the defendants in respect of Ruprai's four annas. It then proceeds to add that the plaintiff is entitled to foreclose Ruprai's four annas share of the village. The family however owned only twelve annas in the village, as correctly pointed out in an earlier part of the judgment. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to foreclose one-fourth of twelve annas, that is three annas of the village. This was a mistake due to inadvertence, and the decree will therefore have to be modified by showing three annas share of Mouza Baharhod as the property to be foreclosed under the decree. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Order.—On 5th February 1917 information was laid under S. 145, Criminal P. C. by the Sub-Inspector of Police, Deolapar, in the Court of the Sub-divisional Magistrate, Ramtek, to the effect that there was a dispute regarding three fields situated at Mauza Karwahi between Madho Prasad and Ramnarayanlal on the one hand and Jagansi Gond on the other and that the said dispute was likely to cause a breach of the peace. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate directed the parties to appear before him on 15th February 1917 at Deolapar and to put in written statements of their respective claims as to actual possession of the property in dispute and as the case appeared to be one of some emergency, the Magistrate attached the three fields pending decision of the case. On 15th February 1917 the case was taken up, not at Deolapar, but at Chorbaoli, a village some nine miles from Deolapar. It was called at 3 p. m. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate in his order states that he had issued orders to the Sub-Inspector the previous day that case would be heard at Chorbaoli and as Madho Prasad and Ramnarayanlal were absent when the case was called, the Magistrate proceeded ex parte and passed an order stating that finding Jagansi was in possession of the property in dispute, he should retain possession until evicted therefrom in due course of law.

Against that order, the present application for revision is filed by Madho Prasad and Ramnarayanlal. I am satisfied that the Magistrate's order which is not on record said to have been issued on 14th to the Sub-Inspector telling him to inform the present applicants that they should attend at Chorbaoli in place of Daolapar, was not served on them in time to allow them to be present. They had engaged Mr. Parakh, Pleader, to represent them in the case. Mr. Parakh, who is present in the Court, tells me that he reached Daolapar with his clients at 8 or 9 a. m. on the morning of 15th February. He put up with the Sub-Inspector there, but was told nothing as regards the change in the place of hearing until about 4 o'clock in the afternoon when apparently on a chit received from the Sub-Divisional Magistrate's reader the Sub-Inspector told the pleader that the Court was at Chorbaoli that day. Mr. Parakh, pleader, states that on his way back he inquired at Chorbaoli and was told that the case had been disposed of. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate at that time was absent from the bungalow. This was on the evening of the 15th. There is no reason to doubt Mr. Parakh's word.

Whether it is the fault of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate's clerk or of the Sub-Inspector that information did not reach the applicants in time, it is not my business to decide, but I am clearly of opinion that it was not possible for the two applicants to attend the Court at Chorbaoli at the time the case was called. Therefore if the Sub-Divisional Magistrate's order is open to revision, I have no hesitation in setting it aside. Counsel for Jagansi argues that this Court cannot interfere with the order in revision. I am referred to S. 435, Criminal P. C., and to Murat Singh v. Paika Bai (1) in support of this proposition. It seems to me that this Court cannot under S. 435 ordinarily interfere with orders passed under Ch. 12, Criminal P. C., but where an order purporting to be under S. 145 exceeds the powers given by the section, this Court can interfere. Irregular and illegal proceedings under Ch. 12 are subject to the revisional jurisdiction of this Court. See Pandurang Govind, In re (2), Pandurang Govind Pujari, In re (3), Dewan Chand v. Queen Empress (4), Dhani Ram v. Bhola Nath (5) and Ab- dulla Khan v. Gunda (6). I hold the proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C. are not within jurisdiction unless the procedure prescribed there is strictly adhered to and therefore when a party to the dispute has had no opportunity of appearing and putting in his written statement, this Court can set the proceedings aside.

This Court is not entitled to interfere merely because there has been an irregularity in the proceedings or an erroneous decision on a question of fact or law, but it can and will interfere when there has been a material irregularity which has prejudiced a party to the proceedings: Parmessar Singh v. Kailaspati (7). The irregularity here has prevented the applicants from having a fair trial. I do not question the Magistrate's power to proceed ex parte against a party in proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., when that party having due notice of the date fixed for hearing fails to attend in person or by pleader to put in a written statement of his claim, but in the present case the applicants were not given notice in time that the case would be heard at Chorbaoli and they are entitled to be heard and must be heard before the final order under S. 145 is passed. I set aside the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, dated 15th February 1917 and direct that the case be proceeded with and dealt with according to law. It is pressed here that the case should not be returned to the Court of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Ramtek, for disposal. Mr. Bourne, as seems clear from para. 4 of the District Magistrate's reply to the notice calling upon him to show cause why the order should not be set aside, has since the disposal of the case made a local inquiry into the question of possession, an inquiry made on the application of Jagansi, the non-applicants, for making a false report in this case to the police. Under these circumstances as the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, Ramtek, must have made up his mind on the question of possession, the case will be now disposed of by such other Magistrate as the District Magistrate may direct.

(a) Landlord and Tenant — Agricultural holding is not transferable in Berar.

An agricultural holding is a personal right not transferable unless expressly declared to be so by contract or by statute. In Berar there is no law which permits an annual tenant of an agricultural holding to transfer his right.

(b) Landlord and Tenant — Under Berar Land Revenue Code tenant right is transferable—In absence of fresh contract with landlord transferee obtains merely transferor's right title and interest—If transfer is from woman with limited interest right ceases on her death.

Under the Berar Land Revenue Code a tenant right is heritable and transferable as "property" but a transferee of a tenant right by contract who does not make any fresh contract with the landlord obtains only the right title and interest of the transferor and if the transfer is from a woman with a limited interest his right to occupy the land would come to an end on her death or remarriage.

Bipin Krishna Bose and Lal Mohan Vivian Bose—for Appellant.

Judgment.—The plaintiff is the owner of a jagir in Berar. The defendant is in possession of land which was formerly occupied by a tenant named Ananda. This tenant died a few years ago and on 29th May 1912 his widow, Mt. Lakshmi executed a document whereby she purported to sell the tenant right to the defendant. The plaintiff brought the suit out of which this appeal has arisen to evict the defendant as a trespasser. The defendant pleaded that Ananda was the holder of a hereditary and permanent tenant right which his widow had inherited from him and transferred to the defendant who therefore claimed to be a permanent tenant and as such not liable to be evicted. This original pleading was further evolved into the plea that Ananda was an ante-ijara tenant. The Courts below found that an ante-ijara tenancy was not proved but that by reason of the antiquity of the tenancy no satisfactory evidence of its commencement and term is forthcoming. They ruled therefore that the tenancy was permanent by which I understand them to have applied S. 78 (2), Berar Land Revenue Code, and to have held that the term of the tenancy is co-extensive with the duration of the plaintiff's jagir as such. The Courts below have further found that the tenant right is alienable and declaring the defendant to be a permanent tenant have dismissed the suit. The plaintiff has therefore made this second appeal. Two main grounds are put forward on her behalf, namely: (1) that the tenant right was not liable; and (2) that in any case the defendant has only purchased the limited interest of Mt. Lakshmi.

The learned advocate for the appellant felt himself unable to press the first of these grounds in the face of the decision of Mitra, A. J. C. in Ishwari v. Tukaram (1), in which the same learned advocate had successfully sustained an opposite contention. For that reason I abstain from deciding the point in this case. I must confess to feeling considerable doubt with all due respect to the correctness of the assumption that because there is no law in Berar which expressly forbids an annual tenant from transferring his rights therefore such rights are transferable. There is abundant authority for the view that an agricultural holding is a personal right not transferable unless expressly declared to be so by contract or by statute. Therefore it seems to me that it would be more correct to say that there is no law in Berar which permits an annual tenant of an agricultural holding to transfer his rights. Under the Bengal Tenancy Act, 1859, which was the predecessor of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act of 1883, inter alia, it was generally held that an agricultural tenancy was not transferable. No doubt S. 6, T. P. Act, 1882, which was applied to Berar in 1907, enacts that property of any kind may be transferred. But the Act avoids any definition of the important word "property" and as pointed out by Dr. Gour at p. 12, Edn. 4 of his work on the Transfer of Property, it is necessary to construe the word with circumspection. A wife is the property of her husband in the eye of the law, but she is not ordinarily transferable. However there is a good deal to be said on the other side, and as the contention is not pressed before me I see no reason to come to any finding which might possibly be in conflict with the published ruling.

For the purposes of this appeal, therefore I will assume, without any decision of my own on the point, that the tenant right of the late Ananda was heritable and transferable in the ordinary way. The provisions of the Berar Code are not very clear in their applicability to tenancies in alienated land as compared with tenancies and other forms of holdings in unalienated land. No doubt some attempt is made in S. 222 to set out a general rule; but S. 224 provides exceptions thereto which are rendered somewhat vague by use of the words "as far as may be." Moreover, is a tenant in an alienated village included in the category of "holders of alienated land", or is he a tenant from a holder of such land? For if Ss. 72 and 73, which applying to the alienee from Government, do not apply to his tenants, then the heritability and alienability of an ijara tenancy becomes extremely doubtful. S. 223 contains express provisions for the protection of an auto-alienation tenant; and that suggests that post-alienation tenants are left to make their own terms with their landlords and receive no statutory protection independently of their contracts. But I am inclined to hold that Ch. 7 of the above Code is one of general applicability, and that S. 78, with which that chapter opens, applies as much to tenants in alienated villages as to tenants in unalienated lands. Therefore I accept the finding of the Courts below that the tenant right of Ananda was of the kind provided for by S. 78 (2) of the Berar Code.

We have it, then, that Ananda held a tenant right which was heritable and transferable, for a term co-existent with the duration of the plaintiff's jagir as such. But S. 72, which deals with the devolution and transfer of occupancy of unalienated land, can only apply, as far as may be, to a tenant from a holder of alienated land like the plaintiff. The Deputy Commissioner can "recognize" heirs and transferees of occupancies held directly from Government. But, obviously, he cannot take that course in regard to the tenants of private proprietor. Therefore we can only apply

S. 72 to such cases as the present by holding that the tenant right is heritable and transferable as "property." The difference is very substantial. Each transferee of an occupancy who is recognized by the Deputy Commissioner becomes a fresh occupant, and holds with all the rights of an original occupant. It does not matter in his case that the occupant for whom he has been substituted was a woman with a limited interest, or the last of a line of holders, on whose death the occupancy would have lapsed. The new occupant becomes the first of a fresh line of devolution until another transfer again starts yet another line of proprietor and successors. But a transferee of a tenant right by contract who does not make any fresh contract with the landlord, obtains only the right, title and interest of his transferor. In the present case, following the assumption already made as to the tenant right of Ananda being heritable, it was inherited by his widow Lakshmi Bai. The defendant bought the right, title and interest of Lakshmi Bai, and nothing more. He stands in the shoes of his vendor, and his right to occupy the land comes to an end on her death or remarriage. I therefore modify the decrees of the Courts dismissing the suit by adding the words

"became the defendant as the transferee of the right, title and interest of the tenant Lakshmi Bai, widow of Ananda, is entitled to occupy the land as a tenant of the plaintiff until the death or remarriage of his vendor, the said Lakshmi Bai."

I make no order as to the costs of this appeal. In the Courts below costs will be paid as ordered by the lower appellate Court.

Tort—Trespass—Suit against joint trespassers acting in concert—One defendant can rely on title of another.

Judgment.—The plaint alleges that defendants 1 to 4 illegally dispossessed the plaintiffs of the eastern half of survey No. 29, which belonged to the latter and was in their possession till 1915. Para. 2 of the plaint further states the cause of action against the remaining defendants in the following terms:

"Before the Record of Rights the khata of the field stood in the name of Dhurpati, defendant 5. As she and defendants 1 to 4 have given the field in suit in mortgage to Narayan Sah, defendant 6, in the year 1912, she and Narayan Sah have been impleaded as defendants 5 and 6. Defendant 7 is joined because he helped in removing the crops."

The plaintiffs' prayer was that they be put in possession of the eastern half which defendants 1 to 4 have taken possession of and that the defendants be directed to pay Rs. 97 as mesne profits. Defendants 1 to 4 pleaded that they were in possession under a mortgage of 1888 executed by one Gopai, the predecessor-in-title of defendant 5, who was according to these defendants owner of a half share in the survey number. The case proceeded ex parte against the remaining defendants. The Munsif held that the plaintiffs were the owners of the whole field and were in possession till 1915, that Gopai's title to the half share was not proved, and that defendant 7 did not help defendants 1 to 4 in taking away the crops. Dismissing the suit against defendant 7, the Munsif passed a decree in favour of the plaintiffs against all the other defendants directing them to deliver back possession and to pay Rs. 40 as mesne profits. Against this decree defendants 1 to 4 appealed. The Additional District Judge held that the plaintiffs were in possession till 1915, that Gopai the predecessor-in-title of defendant 5, had an interest in the field but that the interest was lost by lapse of time. The lower appellate Court further held that the mortgage by defendants 1 to 4 was not proved. On these findings the appeal was dismissed.

This second appeal has been filed by defendants 1 to 4. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs-respondents that the findings of the lower appellate Court regarding the appellants' mortgage is fatal to the appeal and that no question of title on the part of defendant 5 can be raised by the present appellants by way of jus tertii. It is also urged that O. 41, R. 4, does not apply to the case, as the appellants are bound to fail upon the findings that their mortgage is not proved. It is contended that R. 4 applies only when the Court is competent to interfere with the decree in favour of the appellants without reference to the merits of the case so far as the non-appealing defendants are concerned and that the non-appealing defendants can only be given the benefit of a decision so arrived at in favour of the appellants. On behalf of the appellants reliance is placed upon O. 41, R. 33, and it is further contended that the decree of the lower Courts proceeds upon a common finding applicable to all the defendants that the plaintiffs have proved their title. I have come to the conclusion that the appeal must succeed even if the scope of O. 41, R. 4, is limited in the manner contended for by the plaintiffs-respondents and apart from a resort to the provisions of O. 41, R. 33.

The plaint is not very clear as to the cause of action against the defendants other than the four defendants. Although the actual dispossession was by the first four defendants, yet mesne profits have been claimed against all and the Court has decreed both ejection and mesne profits against all defendants except defendant 7. In other words the decree has been passed against the representatives of Gopal under whom the appellants claimed. This could only have been passed upon the view that all the defendants acted in concert in dispossessing the plaintiffs, and this appears to be the suggestion made in para. 2 of the plaint. Upon any other interpretation of the plaint it is difficult to see how the plaintiffs were entitled to anything but a declaratory relief against defendants 5 and 6. The decree of the Courts below proceeds then upon the ground that although ejection was by defendants 1 to 4, all the defendants against whom the suit has been decreed were acting in concert. To act in concert with another person is to act under his authority and hence the trespass may be justified by showing title in that person.

based upon their mortgage-deed of 1888, but I think they are entitled to say that as the plaint proceeds upon an allegation of joint trespass, they are entitled to defeat the plaintiffs' claim by showing title in one of the co-defendants. The plaintiffs cannot maintain a suit based merely upon their previous possession against defendant 5 if the latter has a title to the land. Under these circumstances the argument that defendants 5 and 6 have not appealed does not carry much force. A defendant who is sued as a trespasser can rely upon the title of his co-defendant if both are alleged to have been acting in concert, even though his own derivative title is not proved. There is nothing in this view which militates against the view adopted in Nand Ram Patel v. Narbad Patel (1), which is strongly relied upon by the plaintiffs-respondents. I think that notwithstanding the adverse finding on their mortgage the appellants are entitled to show that defendant 5 has a title to the land in dispute. The plaintiffs denied that Gopal ever had any interest in land. There was therefore no plea or issue about Gopal losing her rights by lapse of time. This can only be decided after taking proper pleadings and framing proper issues. The decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside as against defendants 1 to 6 under O. 41, R. 4, and the appeal is remanded to the lower appellate Court for a fresh decision with advantage to the above remarks. Costs will follow the result. There will be no order for refund of court fees.

Criminal Revn. No. 96-B of 1918, Decided on 5th October 1918, against judgment and finding given by Magistrate, First Class, Nagpur, in Criminal Case No. 43 of 1918, D/ 28th June 1918.

Railways Act (9 of 1899), S. 122—Entry originally lawful—Subsequent unlawful act does not render entry unlawful—Accused not refusing to leave on being asked, cannot be convicted under S. 122 (2).

Accused, a dalal, entered the railway goods shed line to take delivery of a consignment on behalf of the consignee and without the permission of the goods clerk broke the seal of a wagon. It was found that dalals were allowed to enter the goods shed without express permission from a railway servant:

Held: (1) that the accused could not be convicted under S. 122 (1) as the original entry being lawful, the subsequent unlawful act did not relate back and render the entry unlawful;

(2) that as the accused never refused to leave the railway on being requested to do so, he could not be committed under sub-S. (2), S. 122;

(3) sub-section (1), S. 122, makes an unlawful entry punishable and sub-S. (2) provides for cases where original entry was lawful as well as unlawful. [P 50 C 1, 2]

M. T. Shareef—for Applicant.

G. K. Dick—for the Crown.

Order.—The applicant has been convicted under S. 122, sub S. (1), Railways Act. The charge against him is that he unlawfully entered the goods shed line and without the permission of the goods clerk or the unloading foreman broke the seal of wagon No. 563 containing 527 bundles of jaggery.

The accused is a dalal and came to take delivery of the consignment of jaggery on behalf of one Haji Yusuf Gani. It is in evidence that dalals are allowed to enter the goods shed without an express permission from a railway servant. The Railway Sub-Inspector (P. W. 3) says that he advised the goods clerk and the accused that the accused should not enter the goods office without the permission of the railway authorities. This however was not a prohibition but only advice and it is doubtful whether the witness had any authority to pass an order. On behalf of the prosecution the entry of the dalal is not complained of. It is the subsequent act of breaking the seal of the wagon which is urged as unlawful. S. 122 runs thus:

(1) If a person unlawfully enters upon a railway, he shall be punished with fine which may extend to twenty rupees.

(2) If a person so entering refuses to leave the railway on being requested to do so by any railway servant, or by any other person on behalf of the railway administration, he shall be punished with fine which may extend to fifty rupees, and may be removed from the railway by such servant or other person."

The case does not come under the second class, as the accused never refused to leave the railway on being requested to do so. Now the original entry being lawful, it is difficult to hold that the subsequent unlawful act related back and rendered the entry unlawful. It seems to me that sub-S. (1) makes an unlawful entry punishable and sub-S. (2) provides for cases where the original entry was lawful as well as unlawful. The argument that the applicant should be deemed to have entered with the intention of breaking the seal of the wagon is far-fetched and cannot be accepted, nor do I find that the Magistrate has come to any such finding. The result is that the order of the lower Court is set aside and the applicant is acquitted. The fine if paid is ordered to be refunded.

Pyarelal—Accused.

Criminal Revn. No. 75 of 1917, Decided on 27th June 1917, against order of Sessions Judge, Nerbudda Division, D/- 2nd April 1917.

Penal Code (1860), S. 376—Fact that family of injured girl condoned offence on being paid sum of money should not be taken into consideration in determining punishment to be inflicted.

The measure of punishment for an offence of rape, under S. 376, should be proportioned to the greater or less atrocity of the crime, to the conduct of the criminal and to the defenceless and unprotected state of the injured female. The fact that the family of the injured girl have condoned the offence on being paid a sum of money should not be taken into consideration in determining the heinousness of the offence, or of the punishment to be inflicted: 6 W. R. Cr. 59, Foll. [P 51 C 1]

G. P. Dick—for the Crown.

Order.—Pyarelal, son of Mukandlal a Bania boy, 18 years of age, has been convicted by the District Magistrate, Betul, of raping one Rasi, a Rajput girl aged 13 or 14 years of age, and sentenced under S. 376, I. P. C., to six months' rigorous imprisonment. The conviction and the sentence have been confirmed in appeal. The Local Government applies in revision for enhancement of the sentence on the ground that the sentence awarded is grossly inadequate. The accused, though noticed, is not represented in this Court. The District Magistrate, replying to the Rule calling upon him to show cause why the sentence should not be enhanced, states that in view of the accused's youth and position he is of opinion that the sentence awarded is sufficient and that to protract this sentence to a term of years is merely to habituate the prisoner at an impressionable age to the companionship of criminals without enhancing the deterrent effects of the punishment. The offence of which Pyarelal has been found guilty, and there is no question as to his guilt, is one of a particularly atrocious kind. The offence was premeditated and the medical evidence shows that considerable injury was done to the girl. That her family may have condoned the offence on being paid Rs. 20 is not a fact that should be taken into account in determining the heinousness of the offence or the punishment to be inflicted. It has been held that in these cases the measure of punishment should be proportioned to the greater or less atrocity of the crime, to the conduct of the criminal and to the defenceless and unprotected state of the injured female: see Queen v. Jhantha Noshyo (1). The accused is a young man but he is old enough to know the seriousness and consequences of the offence he has committed. The sentence is clearly inadequate. I enhance it to three years' rigorous imprisonment.

Order.—As observed by the Judicial Commissioner in Civil Revision No. 75 of 1912, it is not the practice of this Court to interfere in revision when the applicant for revision has the remedy of an appeal. In this case a final decree for redemption has already been passed before the date of the application for revision and an appeal lay against the decree, and in appeal against the decree it could certainly be urged that the decree for redemption was improper as the final decree for foreclosure should not have been set aside. The order before me is an interlocutory order necessarily to be followed by a decree. In these circumstances I do not consider that this Court should interfere in revision with the order. The application is dismissed. No order as to costs.

Except in a case governed by the Bombay School of law, an authority to adopt a specified boy cannot be exercised with respect to any other boy. But the Maharashtra School, which permits an adoption without the express consent of the husband, holds that where a husband authorising an adoption specifies the child he wishes to be taken and the child dies or is refused by his parents, the authority given warrants the adoption of another child, the presumption being that the husband desired an adoption and by specifying the object merely indicated a preference: 22 Bom. 995, Foll.

Judgment.—One Shrivani, son of Chandrabhanji of Saor in the Amraoti Taluk, died about 28th December 1912, leaving the large estate now in dispute. His widow Savitri Bai and Jana Bai are the first two defendants in the present case. The plaintiff Shankar sues contending that on 11th February 1913, Savitri Bai, the senior widow, who alone had the right to adopt a son to her husband, adopted him and that he is therefore entitled to Shravanji's estate. Jana Bai is stated to have adopted defendant 3 Shamrao on 9th February 1913 and the two widows are said to have partitioned between themselves the whole of Shravanji's property in the month of May 1913. The plaint asks that Shankar be declared the proper and legally adopted son of the deceased Shravanji and that it be held that the property described in the three schedules attached to the plaint belongs to the plaintiff and that it be put into his possession. The further prayers in the plaint are that it be declared that Jana Bai having no right to adopt, her adoption of Shamrao be cancelled and that the partition effected between the two widows be held not to bind the plaintiff. Mesne profits of the immovable property in dispute and the appointment of a receiver pending the decision of the case were also asked for. Ganoba, defendant 4, was joined as the father of Shamrao and because he claimed as owner, three of the disputed fields.

Defendants 5 and 6 were joined as persons who had been meddling with the estate. The case proceeded ex parte against the senior widow. The other defendants denied that the plaintiff was adopted by Savitri Bai and contended that even if adopted, the adoption was invalid in law. The genuineness of Ex. P-1, the deed of adoption, executed in favour of the plaintiff by Savitri Bai, was not denied. The defence is that Shravanji shortly before his death adopted defendant 3 Shamrao, and as owing to his weakness the necessary religious and social ceremonies could not be performed he directed his widows to perform them should he not live to do so. As the senior widow refused to observe her husband's directions, the junior widow Jana Bai did so. Shravanji is said to have stated in distinct terms that he wanted the boy Shamrao and no other to be his adopted son, and defendants 2 and 3 submit that even if it be assumed that what took place in the lifetime of Shravanji was not sufficient in law to constitute the boy Shamrao his adopted son and further, even if there had been no directions by Shravanji, the rites and ceremonies performed by Jana Bai constituted Shamrao the validly adopted son of Shravan from the date of these ceremonies. The senior widow had thus no right to take the second boy in adoption.

It was further pleaded that the adoption of the plaintiff by defendant 1 was invalid as it was made by the widow maliciously and capriciously and not in the bona fide performance of religious duty. In any case as it is clear from the documents on which the plaintiff based his claim that his adoption was conditional and that defendants 1 and 2 were entitled to remain in possession of the property as long as they were alive and to exercise over such property the rights of Hindu widows succeeding as heirs to their husband, the plaintiff had no present right to claim possession.

These defendants also pleaded that the plaintiff having agreed to the partition of the estate between the two widows he was now estopped from questioning the same although Shamrao was in no way bound by that agreement. Jana Bai in a schedule attached to her written statement mentioned the property she was in possession of and contended that the ornaments mentioned therein were her stridhan and that the pots, pans and other moveable property were necessary for her personal use and maintenance. Ganoba supported the case of his son and stated that Shravanji as a near relation gifted to him orally a quarter-share in field Surveys Nos. 28, 29 and 30 of Mauza Kalamgavan before his death, since when he has been in possession of them as owner. He admitted that he realized Rs. 500, which amount he made over to defendant 2. Defendant 5 denied managing the estate or having any interest therein and defendant 6 admitted that he cultivated jointly with the deceased a 1/5th share of field Survey No. 10 of Rajegaon and that he was ready to make over, to whomsoever the Court ordered, the proportionate produce of this share if he was paid Rs. 75 as his cultivating expenses. He denied that he had any interest in the rest of Shravanji's property.

The plaintiff in his replies contended that he had been actually adopted by Savitri Bai, all necessary ceremonies being performed. He denied any giving and taking of Shamrao by Shravanji and also the alleged directions said to have been given to the widows with regard to that boy. He also denied that Shravanji had expressed the wish that Shamrao and no other person should be adopted, and contended that even if the adoption rites and ceremonies were performed by Jana Bai in connexion with the adoption of defendant 3, they were not performed before his own adoption and that Shamrao's adoption if any is illegal.

The plaintiff denied that his adoption was conditional and pleaded that the conditions in the adoption deed detrimental to his rights as an adopted son were invalid in law. He also denied being a party to the partition of the property between the widows and stated that he was entitled to possession of all the property he claimed. He also stated that defendants 4 and 5 were in possession of the amounts shown in Sch. C attached to the plaint and that defendant 6 was in possession of Shravanji's share of field Survey
No. 10 of Rajegaon and also the crops for 1913-14. He denied that Rs. 75 were due to this defendant on account of cultivating expenses.

The Judge who decided the case did not take it over until it had been closed for argument. He finds it clearly proved that the plaintiff was adopted by Savitri Bai on 11th February 1913 and that in pursuance thereof she executed the deed of adoption Ex. P-1. Dealing with the question of Shamrao's adoption the Judge finds that the evidence is conclusive and shows that on Thursday, 26th December 1912, two days before his death, Shravanji sent for respectable residents of his own and neighbouring villages and in their presence expressed a desire to adopt a son. Ganoba was asked if he would give Shamrao in adoption, and on his agreeing the boy was sent for and given to Shravanji. Though the boy could not be actually placed on his new father's lap owing to the latter's weakness he was made to sit near Shravanji, who accepted him as his son and put kunku on the boy's forehead in token of his acceptance.
Sweets and pan supari were then distributed and the two wives were directed to get the remaining religious and social ceremonies performed in the event of Shravanji not living to do these himself.
He also directed that in the event of his senior wife refusing to perform these ceremonies, they should be undertaken by Jana Bai. The lower Court holds it satisfactorily proved that when Savitri refused to follow her deceased husband's directions with respect to Shamrao, Jana Bai did so on 9th February at Saor in the family house, the deed of adoption being executed the following day. He writes:

"The adoption of Shamrao having taken place in consonance with the direction and authority of Shravanji on 9th February 1913 the subsequent adoption by defendant 1 in direct opposition to that authority was invalid and would not divest the estate invested in Shamrao."

The Judge also finds Savitri Bai's adoption of the plaintiff malicious. It is unnecessary for the purpose of this appeal to enter into other matters decided by the learned Additional District Judge.
He dismissed the plaintiff's case on the ground that Shamrao having been validly adopted, the senior widow had not the power to adopt the plaintiff. Against that dismissal the present appeal has been filed. It was stated at the hearing in this Court that the plaintiff would be satisfied with a declaration that he is the adopted son of the deceased Shravan and that defendant 3 is not. Possession is not here asked for and grounds Nos. 5 and 6 of the memorandum of appeal are not pressed. We agree with the learned Additional District Judge that there is ample evidence to establish that the plaintiff was adopted by Savitri Bai on 11th February 1913 at Aroraoti. The evidence of Savitri Bai and the plaintiff, corroborated as it is by the statements of P. Ws. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10, proves beyond doubt that this adoption took place and that defendant 1 executed the adoption deed (Ex. P-1) in the plain-tiff's favour. There is a large amount of evidence to support the story of Jana Bai and Shamrao.

Before entering upon the grounds upon which that evidence is attacked, we will briefly state what the evidence itself is.
The first witness for the defendants, Motiram, gives a long and detailed account of what happened on Thursday 22nd December 1912, at the Shravanji's house at Saor. He states that many persons having been sent for, Shravanji told them that as he did not expect to survive, he intended to adopt a son and said that he wished to adopt Ganoba's son Shamrao, a boy 7 or years of age. Ganoba, who was present, consented and went and fetched his son, who was made to sit near Shravanji. Shravanji then called for

kunku and water and applied the red powder to the boy's forehead. He then had sugar and pan supari distributed and declared that he had adopted the boy. He was very ill at the time and his weakness prevented him from actually taking the boy on his lap. He then said that if he survived he would perform the adoption ceremony himself, but should he die, his elder wife Savitri Bai should do so. Should she not do so, then Jana Bai was to get this ceremony performed.

He stated that if the elder widow completed the adoption, then Jana Bai was entitled to receive 12 tiphans of land; but if Jana Bai and not the elder widow did so, then Savitri Bai was to be given the same area of land. He is said to have further stated that as he was obliged to Ganoba, he gave him 18 acres of land and also directed that a thousand rupees should be spent in a village feast and gave an acre of land at Rajgaon to the temple of Maroti, an acre at Saor to the gol iatta and one acre of the same village to the temple of Pandharinath. This witness states that after Shravan's death the co-widows commenced to quarrel and that Jana Bai proposed to Savitri Bai that as directed by their husband, the necessary ceremonies should take place and was told in reply that there was no hurry about the matter. Some time later Jana Bai sent for Balabhau Balaji who was asked to fix an auspicious day for the adoption ceremony. He did so. Others were sent for and Savitri Bai was asked as regards the matter. She was unwilling, so Jana Bai adopted the boy on Sunday 9th February 1913. Balabhau Brahmin who officiated asked Ganoba to put the boy on Savitri's lap. She however refused to take him and her co-widow then did. He states that there was a talk about a will, Shravanji having proposed it, but Savitri Bai told him that this was unnecessary as she was willing to adopt as directed.

D. W. No. 2 is an old Marwari aged 75 years. He says that he and others were called to Shravan's place, where Shravan told his wives that they should adopt Ganoba's son. Shravan was at the time lying on his cot and Shamrao was some six feet distant. He states that Shravan did not adopt the boy in his presence. He merely stated that he wanted to do so. This witness says that he was at the place for only a quarter of an hour and that great confusion prevailed. Witnesses 6, 7 and 8 are three other Marwari residents of the same village. No. 8, Ramdhan, states that all the Marwaris went together about one o'clock and stayed there for half an hour, returning home together. He says that plaintiff gave 3 acres of land to three different gods, 18 acres to Ganoba, Rs. 1,000 in charity and told them that he adopted Ganoba Patel's son Shamrao. The witness states that there was no talk of reducing the matter to writing and that he knew nothing of the actual adoption.

Asram, D. W. 6, states that Shamrao was sent for and made to sit near Shravan. Ganoba then said that he gave his son in adoption to Shravan and Shravan told those present that if he recovered he would adopt the boy and go through the ceremony and should he not recover he wished his widows to adopt him. He states he was present at the place for two or three hours leaving about 5 p. m. There was no talk of reducing Shravan's wishes to writing. He states that Shravan declared that he "had, as it were, adopted Ganu Patel's son Shamrao." The remaining Marwari witness Ramrakh, D. W. 7 says, that on their arrival at the house, Shravan told them that he adopted Shamrao who was sitting there and that he had given 50 acres of land to each of his wives for maintenance, 18 acres to Ganoba, and 3 acres to three gods. He further directed that Rs. 1,000 should be spent in charity in his name. He states that Shravan did not say who was to perform the adoption ceremony. He also states that the Marwaris were there for about 20 minutes and went and returned together. Ganoba owes this witness money.

D. W. 3 is Narayan, the father of Jana Bai, and therefore a very interested witness. He says that on the day in question Shravan stated that he intended to adopt Shamrao. Ganoba then brought the boy who was made to sit in front of Shravan, who said that the boy was to be adopted by his wives if he did not survive. If the elder wife would not adopt, the younger was to do so, in which case Savitri was to retain her ornaments and to be given 12 tiphans of land. If Jana Bai did not pull on well with her co-widow, she was to be given the same and that during the minority of the boy the widows should have control of the property. He says that after her husband's death Savitri Bai was asked to adopt Shamrao, but she refused to do so and said that Jana Bai should do so if she liked and this was done, the adoption deed being executed and registered at Asegaon on 11th February 1913. It is noteworthy that this witness makes no mention of Shravan's applying the kunku to the boy's forehead.

Rajaram D. W. 4 states that he was present and his account of what took place was that Shravan asked Ganoba if he was willing to give his son Shamrao in adoption. Ganoba brought the boy and said he was. Red powder was then applied to his forehead and the boy was made to sit near Shravan. He then directed that after his death his elder wife should adopt Shamrao and that if she failed, Jana Bai was to do so; and further left instructions that 12 tiphans of land was to be given to each wife if they did not pull on with the adopted son. The witness mentions the bequests to the three gods and the thousand rupees to charity. This witness also attended the adoption ceremony of Shamrao by Jana Bai. The boy was first offered to Savitri Bai and when she refused to allow him to be placed on her lap, he was taken and placed on the lap of the older widow. The sister of this witness is married to Ganoba's cousin. D. W. 5, who admits that Narayanji the father of Jana Bai is his maternal uncle, and D. W. 9 make similar statements. P. W. 10 is a hostile witness and states that in his presence nothing was said by Shravan about adopting any particular person, though he admits that three or four days before his death Shravan gave 3 acres of land to three gods and directed that a thousand rupees should be spent in a feast and charity. This witness has attested the deed whereby Jana Bai adopted defendant 3. He is apparently on bad terms with Ganoba. Considering the deed itself, he states that Shravan took Shamrao in adoption and that he attested the deed knowing its contents. It seems to us that his statement that Shravan never said anything about adoption cannot be relied upon. Amritrao, D. W. 11, speaks to Shravan a month or one and a half months before his death stating that he adopted Ganoba's son; this apparently is a mistake, for his deposition undoubtedly refers to the incident of the 24th December. He says that Shravan stated that if he survived he would adopt Shamrao, and if he died his wife was to do so and if his senior wife refused to do so, his junior wife was to adopt the boy. He says nothing about any actual adoption having taken place and gives the place where the talk took place as the diwan-khana, while the other witnesses state it as the chowk. D. W. 12, Venkatesh, says that he was there on that Thursday for an hour from 8 a. m. and that in his presence Shravan gave 3 acres of land to the 3 gods and a thousand rupees to Datta and 50 acres of land to each of his wives. But when he was asked about the adoption by those present Shravan said that he would speak about it the next day. Shamrao, D. W. 13, supports the defence story as to the adoption of the boy and states that Shravan told his wives that if he survived, he would perform the adoption ceremony, but, if he died, the elder wife was to perform it and if she failed to do so, the younger widow was to adopt the boy. The witness also speaks to Jana Bai's adoption of the boy on Savitri Bai's refusal to accept him and was present when the adoption deed was registered.

Chandrabhan, D. W. 14, who lives at Saor, speaks to Shravanji having settled to adopt Shamrao on that Thursday. Ganoba was asked about it and he agreed. The boy was then brought in and Ganoba took him near Shravan. He made him sit in front of Shravan and red powder was applied by Shravan to the boy's forehead and sugar and pan supari were distributed. This witness also speaks to 18 acres of land being given to Ganoba and 3 acres of land to gods and a thousand rupees to charity. He says nothing about any land being given to the wives, although he states that Shravan said that if he was unable to perform the adoption ceremony, his elder wife should do so and in the event of her refusal Jana Bai should perform the adoption ceremony. He also speaks to the adoption of the boy by Jana Bai. He says that Shravan said that the boy should be named Vishwanath, thus contradicting D. W. 4, who says that at that time no new name had been given to the boy. It is somewhat remarkable that this witness and witness 15, who were both examined on the same day, are alone in using special words to describe the adoption, that Ganoba said that the boy was "his son" before but had become "Shravan's son". D. W. 15 speaks to the adoption by Shravan and to the boy being formally adopted by Jana Bai. D. W. 16, Gopalji, is defendant 5, in the case. He mentions that Shravan asked Ganoba to give him his son Shamrao, and Ganoba agreed. Whereupon the boy was called up and made to sit in front of Shravan, who then gave directions to his wives to perform all the adoption ceremonies in the event of his being unable to do so himself. This witness is an interested one, as he is related to Shravanji. As this witness is also blind, he might have heard what took place but could not have seen what actually happened. D. W. 17 belong to the same family as the deceased. He states that the boy was sent for and Shravan applied red powder to his forehead and distributed sugar and said that he would perform the adoption ceremony himself if he survived, otherwise his older wife should do so and if she refused to, Jana Bai should get it done. He also speaks to the ceremony of 9th February 1913 and to the execution of the adoption deed by Jana Bai. He also speaks to gifts made by Shravanji. D. W. 18 identified Jana Bai before the Sub-Registrar when the adoption deed was registered. D. W. 19 is Ganoba, the last witness in the case. He supports the story of the adoption of his son by Shravan and speaks to the gift of 18 acres of land to himself and to the adoption by Jana Bai.

The plaintiff's evidence is mostly directed towards proving his own adoption and the realization of money by Ganoba. He has produced little evidence to refute that called to show that Shamrao was taken by Shravan as his son and that adoption ceremonies were performed by Jana Bai. Savitri, as P. W. 1, denies that Shravan stated anything about adopting a boy or that the widows were directed to do so. She denies she was pressed by Jana Bai to adopt Shamrao and says she knows nothing of that adoption. She pretends that she does not remember if she was at Saor on Sunday, the 9th February 1913. She admits the division between the two co-widows. Jana Bai, witness 2, is the defendant and naturally supports her pleadings and Shamrao's story. She admits Savitri's relations were not present when Shravanji stated Shamrao was to be adopted. She admits adopting Shamrao on 9th February 1913 on Savitri's refusing to do so. Savitri's relations were again not present at this ceremony. She states Savitri was at Saor at the time and left the village the same day, to return on Wednesday or Thursday with the boy she said she had adopted. Witness 3 is the plaintiff himself. His witnesses 4 to 10 speak to his own adoption, and witnesses 11 to 16 are in regard to the cultivation and payment of lease money of certain fields. Witness 18, a Brahmin priest called Balabhat alias Ramachandra Joshi of Saor, says he knows nothing of the alleged adoption of Shamrao by Shravan or his widow. This is the priest said to have officiated at Shamrao's adoption by Jana Bai. He is a village priest who denies having done so and says it was not his turn to work as Joshi of the village that year. Mahadeo, P. W. 19, states that he visited Shravan on the Monday in question, but denies that any people had collected at the house or that any adoption took place.

It is settled law that no religious ceremonies of adoption are necessary in the case of Sudras. Even the Dattahoma is a mere matter of unessential ceremonial: Thangathanni v. Ramu Mudali (1). The same view is held in Bengal: Indromoni Chowdhurani v. Beharilal Mullick (2). But giving and taking accompanied by actual delivery of the child are absolutely necessary to transfer the boy from one family to another. The gift and acceptance in adoption are to be made by the corporeal delivery of the boy. In the present case if the evidence on record as to the giving of Shamrao by his father and the acceptance by Shravan can be depended on, it is clear that the adoption is valid. This is not disputed by the appellant's learned counsel. It is however contended that the evidence on which the finding of the lower Court is based is vague, discrepant, and insufficient to prove that Shravan himself adopted the boy or gave his widows directions to perform the social and religious ceremonies or that he said that Shamrao alone should be adopted. It is argued that though the pleadings state that defendant 3 alone was to be adopted, no evidence has been adduced to show that the adoption of any other boy was prohibited. In para. 3 of their written statement of

(1) [1882] 5 Mad. 358.

(2) [1880] 5 Cal. 770=7 I. A. 24 (P. O.).

26th November 1913, defendants 2 and 3 said that

"Shravan stated in distinct terms that he wanted the boy Shamrao and no other to be his adopted son."

The same is stated in Shravan's deed of adoption, Ex. 2, D-1. Their advocate's statement of 16th February 1914 shows what was really meant by this plea, viz.

"that the mere expression of his wishes by Shravan that Shamrao should be adopted by his widows was such a specific authority to adopt as could permit the adoption of defendant 3 only and debarred defendant 1 from adopting the plaintiff."

If the evidence of the defendants can be believed, and it is not held that Shravan himself actually took the boy in adoption, it is clear that he specified the boy to be adopted. It seems the husband's directions in such a case must be followed and that except in a case governed by the Bombay School of law an authority to adopt a specified boy cannot be exercised with respect to any other boy. The Maharashtra School, which permits an adoption without the express consent of the husband, holds that where a husband authorizing an adoption specifies the child he wishes to be taken and that child dies or is refused by his parents, the authority given warrants the adoption of another child; the presumption being that the husband desired an adoption and by specifying the object merely indicated a preference: Lakshmi-bai v. Kajari (3). The question whether the junior widow may adopt without the consent of the senior if the latter refused to adopt will be discussed later. The fact that the exact date of Shamrao's adoption was not given in the pleadings nor yet in his adoption deed shows, it is argued, that the date the witnesses now depose to was determined during the trial. There is little weight in this contention. If it was essential for the appellant to get the exact date before framing of the issues, the matter should have been pressed and the Court would doubtless have seen that it was brought on record. The omission to give the exact date in the pleadings does not really justify a conclusion that the evidence as to the incidents of 24th December 1912 is false. The plaintiff was given an opportunity on 5th October 1914 of calling rebutting evidence. The time of the alleged adoption by Shravan had then been disclosed by defendants' witnesses and plaintiff did in fact examine one witness (P. W. 19) to show that no people had assembled at Shravan's house that Thursday. It seems to us obvious that the appellant has in no way been prejudiced by the failure of the defendants to state in their pleading the exact date of Shamrao's adoption.

The evidence of D. W. 1, Jodram, is objected to on the ground that he has gone through the insolvency Court, but this fact alone seems to us to furnish no adequate reason for disbelieving him. There is no presumption that a bankrupt is necessarily untruthful. We cannot disregard his evidence on this ground alone. His statement that Ganoba went to fetch the boy is contradicted by the testimony of D. W. 14, who states that the boy was brought there by Chintaman. D. Ws. 3, 4, 9 and 13 however confirm Motiram's story. Ganoba himself merely says that the boy was sent for D. W. 7, Ramrakh and D. W. 8, Ramdhan speak to the four Marwari witnesses going to and coming back from Shravan's house together. One of them, D. W. 6, however says he got thereafter the other three. D. W. 2, Sheolal, one of these witnesses, says he was there for a quarter of an hour. D. W. 6, Asaram, states that he remained there for two or three hours. D. W. 7 puts the time at 20 minutes and D. W. 8, at half an hour. There is also some variance in their statements. Sheolal states that Shravan did not adopt anybody, but said that he wanted to adopt Ganoba's son and also says that Shravan did not mention which of his two wives was to adopt him. D. W. 6, Asaram, says that Shravan declared that he, as it were, adopted Ganoo Patel's son Shamrao. Ganoba gave the boy to Shravan and Shravan said that if he recovered, he would adopt him and go through the ceremony and if he did not recover, he wished his widows to adopt him. Ganoba in their presence said that he gave his son in adoption to Shravan and the boy was sent for and made to sit near him. Ramrakh D. W. 7 testifies to Shravan's telling them that he had adopted Shamrao, though the witness does not know if any actual adoption ceremony took place. He says that when Shravan said that he adopted Shamrao, Ganoba replied that he gave the boy in adoption. The last Marwari witness Ramdhani, D. W. 8, speaks to Shravan saying that he adopted Ganoo Patel's son Shamrao and Ganoo accepted it. He admits that he knows nothing of the actual adoption.

It is noticeable that none of these Marwari witnesses speaks in clear terms to the actual giving and taking and it seems to us that their testimony only shows an expressed intention on Shravan's part to adopt the boy. Sheolal, according to D. W. 7, is Ganoba's banker. Yet the old man clearly states that Shravan did not adopt anybody but told his wives that they should adopt Ganoba's son. The statement of D. W. 6, Asaram, shows that Shravan said that if he recovered he would adopt Shamrao and go through the ceremony or in the event of his death he wished his widows to adopt him. These witnesses seem to us, as outsiders, to be more reliable than the others who are called to prove the actual giving and taking of the boy. The following witnesses who speak to the boy being actually given to Shravanji are related to, or are interested in, the defendants' case viz. D. W. 3, the father of Jana Bai, D. W. 4 whose sister is married to Ganoba's cousin, D. W. 5 who admits that D. W. 3 is his paternal uncle, D. W. 16 the defendant, D. W. 17 a relative of the family, and D. W. 19 Ganoba.

It seems to us that all defendants' evidence can really be held to prove is that Shravan on the day in question expressed his intention to adopt Shamrao, should he survive and that he told his widows in the event of his death they should adopt him. We are unable to find that there was any actual giving and taking in Shravan's lifetime. The fact that Shravan expressed his desire that a son should be adopted to him can be inferred from the recital in plaintiff's adoption deed (Ex. P. 1), where Savitri says :

"I have approved you as my adopted son and have taken you in adoption as directed by my husband."

It is remarkable that witness after witness for the defence stated that Shravan said that if he lived he would adopt the boy but that if he died his widows should do so. This seems to us to show fairly clearly that Shravan himself, though the boy may have been sent for, did not think that any adoption had taken place. Among these people it is customary for both the secular and religious ceremonies of adoption to be performed on the same day, the adoption then being evidenced by a registered deed.

The fact that after Shamrao's adoption by Jana Bai and plaintiff's adoption by Savitri, the two widows agreed to partition their husband's estate points strongly to no adoption having taken place during Shravan's lifetime; for if, as alleged, it had taken place and Shamrao was at Shravan's death his adopted son, it is not likely that Jana Bai would have agreed to half of the estate going to her co-widow. Her doing so later may well be due to doubts if an adoption by the junior widow was valid. We think that defendants have taken advantage of the fact that though Savitri herself was present on 24th December, yet she had none of her relatives or friends there to support her, and knowing that it would be difficult for Savitri to obtain evidence as to the happenings on that day, have exaggerated what did occur and tried to show that Shravan's directions as to the adoption of the boy by his widows were preceded by the actual giving and taking of the boy.

Though for the reasons we have stated we are unable to accept the defence story in its entirety, we think that the evidence adduced does show that people were sent for and that in their presence Shravan told his widows that if he lived he intended to adopt Shamrao and that if he died the senior widow should do so; and in the event of her failing, the junior widow should carry out his wishes. It is noticeable that none of the four Marwari witnesses state that the deceased said that in the event of the senior widow failing to adopt Shamrao, Jana Bai should do so. D. W. 2, Sheolal, says that Shravan told his wife that he wanted to adopt Shamrao but said nothing as to which of the two widows was to adopt him. D. W. 6 Asaram states that Shravan expressed his wish that his widows should adopt that boy. D. Ws. 7 and 8 say that nothing was said as to who was to perform the actual ceremony. On the other hand the following witnesses, D. Ws. 1, 3, 4, 5, 9, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17 and 19, are unanimous in stating that Shravan's directions to his wives were that the elder was to adopt Shamrao and that on failing to do so Jana Bai, the junior widow, should adopt the boy.

We have held it proved that Shraman did as a matter of fact direct that Shamrao should be adopted. It is possible that he anticipated that there might be opposition to his wishes from the senior wife as to the adoption of the boy; in which case it is not unnatural that he gave the directions deposed to. If he had made up his mind that this boy was to be adopted, his directions would naturally be such as to ensure obedience to his wishes. We are prepared to accept this volume of evidence as proving that Shraman did say that if Savitri Bai did not adopt the boy, Jana Bai was to do so. His further directions that in case either of the widows did not pull on with the boy each was to be given 12 tipthans of land are, in our opinion, also proved. We have no hesitation in finding that the boy was adopted by Jana Bai on 9th February 1913. D. W. 1, 3, 4, 5, 9, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16 & 19 prove this to our satisfaction. They show that Jana Bai was determined, doubtless under the influence of her father and Ganoba, to go through the ceremony of adoption after the elder widow refused to. The evidence shows that she was present, that she was asked to adopt Shamrao, and that on her refusal the boy was put on the lap of Jana Bai who adopted him to her late husband. It is clear that immediately after this Savitri left the house and proceeded to Amraoti, where on the 11th the ceremony of plaintiff's adoption was gone through. It has been proved that Shamrao's adoption deed was then executed and presented for registration at Asegon on 11th February.

We have now to consider the legality of Jana Bai's adoption of Shamrao. It has been held that when permission to adopt is given to widows severally, the elder woman and on her refusal, the younger can adopt: Ranjit Lal Karmarkar v. Dejoy Krishna Karmarkar (4) and Mondarkini Dasi v. Adinath Dey (5). Following these cases, we think that on the refusal of Savitri to adopt Shamrao, the younger widow was entitled to do so and that the adoption divested the estate that was in the elder widow, whose subsequent adoption of the plaintiff is invalid. A power must be strictly construed and we find that Jana Bai did act strictly in accordance with the power given by her husband.

It is no part of the appellant's case in this Court that Jana Bai was a minor on the 9th February 1913. We, therefore, do not enter into that question, nor is it necessary for the purposes of this appeal to discuss the other matters decided by the lower Court. The result is that this appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Order.—One Seth Kunjal Deochand whose munim the present applicant Nanakram is, filed Suit No. 71 of 1915 in the Court of the Sub-Judge, Khandwa, against Sandoo and others for the recovery of Rs. 2,000 on a mortgage deed, dated 23rd February 1903, said to have been executed by Sandoo. The original mortgage deed was said to be lost, but was subsequently found to have been filed in the record of Suit No. 813 of 1905 filed by the same plaintiff against Sandoo in the Court of the Munsif, Burhanpur. Nanakram, who had been examined as a witness, stated in it that no payment was made towards the debt of the suit; but when shown the bond, Ex. P-10, was forced to admit that Rs. 154 had been paid towards the debt. Nanakram had also stated that there was no separate khata of the mortgage-debt in the account-books kept by him; but it is shown that for the years Samvat 1959 to 1962 there was such a separate khata. The result of the proceedings instituted under S. 476 was that the Sub-Judge considered that Nanakram had committed offences under Ss. 193 and 463, I. P. C., and he laid complaint in the Court of the First Class Magistrate. The concluding portion of his order runs:

"I hence order the prosecution of the accused Nanakram for offences under Ss. 193 and 463, I. P. C."

Nanakram thereupon applied to this Court to get that order quashed. It was dealt with as Criminal Revision No. 227 of 1916 and the application was dismissed by me on 17th October 1916. The case was tried and Nanakram was charged by the Magistrate as follows:

"That you abetted the fraudulent and dishonest filing of a plaint for Rs. 2,000 claim in the Court of the Sub-Judge, Khandwa, knowing that the claim was false in Suit 71 of 1915 and thereby committed an offence punishable under S. 209-109, I. P. C., and that in the said case you made the following statements: There is no separate khata in our account-books for the mortgage-debts in suit and that no payments had been made towards the debt in suit knowing these statements to be false."

He was charged separately under S. 193, I. P. C., in respect of each statement. The Magistrate considered that he was justified in proceeding against the accused under S. 209/109, I. P. C., and under S. 195, sub-S. (5), Criminal P. C. The trial resulted in Nanakram being acquitted on the two charges of perjury on the technical ground that the Sub-Judge has failed to read over to him his depositions and in his conviction of the offences under S. 209/109 he was awarded one year's rigorous imprisonment. In appeal the learned Sessions Judge has confirmed the conviction and sentence. Against that decision the present application for revision has been filed. The first question raised here is that as the Sub-Judge in his proceedings under S. 476 did not lay a complaint against the applicant for an offence falling under S. 209, I. P. C., the Magistrate under the provisions of S. 195, Criminal P. C., had no power to entertain it, it being one of those offences of which no

Court can take cognizance except with the previous sanction or complaint of the Court concerned or of a Court to which that Court is subordinate. There is nothing to prevent a Court fulfilling the provisions of S. 195 by making an ordinary complaint in any of the forms open to a private individual; but as a rule it should proceed, as in the present case, under S. 476 to avoid the necessity of supporting the complaint like a private individual by a statement on oath in accordance with S. 200, Criminal P. C. It seems to me that an order properly passed under S. 476 is both a complaint and more than a complaint. It is a judicial proceeding and an order of the Court, but it is not in my opinion a sanction "within the meaning of S. 195, Criminal P. C." The question before me is whether in this case there should have been a complaint with reference to the particular offence the applicant has been convicted of. The matter of the offence under this section was before the Sub-Judge as disclosed by the proceedings under S. 476, but he preferred to proceed under Ss. 193 and 463, I. P. C., against the applicant.

It is argued by the learned Standing Counsel for the Government that even if there is no complaint from the Sub-Judge as regards the offence of which the applicant has been convicted, and there is clearly no complaint as regards an offence under S. 209/109, I. P. C., yet under the provisions of S. 195 (5), Criminal P. C., the Magistrate was entitled to frame a charge under S. 209/109, I. P. C., as that offence was disclosed in the inquiry under S. 476, Criminal P. C. I am unable to accede to this proposition. In my opinion the provisions of S. 195 (5) only apply when a Court has, on the application of some person, sanctioned the trial of any of the offences named under S. 195 and cannot apply to a case sent to a Magistrate under S. 476, Criminal P. C., for an order under the latter section is not a sanction. The reason why the law apparently allows a Magistrate taking cognizance of a case started on complaint with previous sanction to frame a charge of any other offence disclosed by the facts, as long as it refers it to the offence for which the sanction was given, seems to me to be that in these cases it is difficult for the sanctioning Court to always ascertain the exact facts or to determine exactly all the offences which may be disclosed at the trial; but when a complaint is made under S. 476 the Judge or Magistrate must move and should definitely know what offence or offences he committed. The matter becomes a public prosecution and it is the duty of the prosecution to prove the exact offence of which complaint has been made of. I must hold that in the present case no complaint was made by the Sub-Judge as regards an offence under S. 209, that no sanction for the prosecution of the applicant under that section has been obtained, and that as the matter reached the Magistrate in the form of a complaint and not as a sanction, S. 195 (5) is not applicable and under these circumstances the trial is bad in law. S. 193 distinctly states that no Court shall take cognizance of an offence under S. 209, I. P. C., when such offence is committed in or in relation to any proceedings in any Court, except with the previous sanction or on the complaint of such a Court or of some other Court to which such Court is subordinate. It is argued that allowing this to be the case, S. 537 (b) saves the conviction but as already stated there is no question of sanction in this case; the case was on a complaint.

Though want of sanction under S. 195 may not vitiate a trial, yet where there has been no complaint under S. 195 as regards the offence of which the applicant has been found guilty, the absence of a complaint is not a mere irregularity. For these reasons I must set aside the conviction and sentence passed on the applicant. I do so and cancel his bailbond.

Order.—In Civil Revision No. 316 of 1916, Stanton, A. J. C., in his order, dated 24th February 1917, held that Sheikh Abdul Rahiman, the plaintiff in the case he was dealing with, had made a false claim. He held that the receipt, dated 11th September 1914, filed by the plaintiff was a forgery and the suit that was based on it a false suit. The concluding paragraph of his judgment runs:

"I leave to the discretion of the lower Court to decide whether any action is necessary under S. 476, Criminal P. C., 1898."

On the return of the case, the Small Cause Court Judge proceeded under S. 476, Criminal P. C., and finding there was a prima facie case against Abdul Rahiman, Imamali, Hemnath and Puransingh, decided that they should be prosecuted and directed a complaint to be laid before the First Class Magistrate. Puransingh and Hemnath filed this application for revision against that order. After they had filed their application, Abdul Rahiman and Imamali have filed similar applications. Criminal Revisions Nos. 187 and 188 of 1917. This order will dispose of all three applications. As regards the applications of Hemnath, Imamali and Abdul Rahiman there seems to me no ground to disturb the order of the Small Cause Court Judge laying a complaint to the First Class Magistrate. This Court has found the receipt to be a forgery and the Small Cause Court Judge, on a reconsideration of the evidence before him in the case, as he explains in his answer to the Rule issued in Puransingh's case, has in his discretion determined that there is a prima facie case against all four applicants. There are obviously no valid grounds on which his decision to bring three out of the four applicants to trial can be challenged. I have no hesitation in dismissing the application of Hemnath and rejecting summarily the applications of Abdul Rahiman and Imamali.

In Puransingh's case it is however urged that notice was not given to him to appear and show cause before the Small Cause Court Judge passed the order impeached in these revisions. That is so. Two attempts were made to serve Puransingh at Raipur. They failed because he is said not to live at that place, though the summons in the Small Cause Court suit was served on him there. The Small Cause Court Judge, in place of waiting and issuing a fresh notice, wrote that Puransingh's whereabouts were not correctly known and proceeded to pass his order. It is argued for Puransingh that want of notice vitiates the order. It has been held, I have no doubt correctly, that notice is on the face of the section not legally necessary: see Ram Piari Rai v. Emperor (1), Baperam v. Gouri Nath Dutt (2) and Queen-Empress v. Matabadal (3). But notice, although not legally necessary, is desirable, more especially where the matter has not been already judicially dealt with: Empress v. Narotam Das (4). Here the question, of the receipt being genuine or a forgery, had been judicially dealt with and therefore I do not think that want of notice in Puransingh's case invalidates the proceedings against him. I therefore also dismiss his application.

Criminal Revn. No. 9 of 1917, Decided on 12th March 1917, against order of Sub-Div. Magistrate, Chhindwara.

(a) Police Act (1861), S. 34—"Causes" means "allows to exist"

The word "causes," as used in S. 34, is not a word of art but a word used in ordinary English meaning "allows to exist." [P 62 C 2]

(b) Police Act (1861), S. 34—Conviction for offence punishable under S. 34 is not illegal because it is also punishable under C. P. Municipal Act (1903), S. 110.

A conviction for an offence under S. 34, Police Act is not illegal merely because the act complained of also constitutes a breach of S 110, C.P. Municipal Act, and as such is punishable under that Act as well. [P 63 C 1]

(c) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 439—Court of revision is not concerned with policy underlying enactment (obiter).

Obiter—A Court of revision is not concerned with the policy underlying a legislative enactment, it is only concerned with the legality of the proceedings sought to be revised. [P 62 C 2]

Atmaram Bhagwant and D. W. Kathale—for Applicant.

Order—The applicant has been convicted of an offence under S. 34, Police Act and fined Rs. 20. S. 34, Police Act Cl. 5, runs as follows :

"Any person who throws or lays down any dirt, filth, rubbish or any stones or building materials; or who constructs any cow-shed, stable, or the like; or who causes any offensive matter to run from any house, factory, dung-heap, or the like."

The Civil Surgeon noticed in the course of his inspection filth from the applicant's latrine flowing on the road. What was the cause of this has not been clearly stated in the judgment, nor anywhere on the record. From a note sent by the trying Magistrate through the District Magistrate it would appear that the cause of the offensive matter running out of the house was a bad state of repairs of the outlet, which has since been put in proper order. It is contended before me that there should have been a prosecution not under the Police Act, but under the C. P. Municipal Act, the terms of which are said to be much wider than those of the Police Act. S. 110, Municipal Act says:

"Whoever, without the written permission of the committee, causes or allows the water of any sink, sewer or cess-pool, or any other offensive matter, to flow, drain or be put upon any street or public place or into any sewer or drain not set apart for the purpose, shall be punishable with fine which may extend to twenty rupees."

It is also rightly pointed out that such a prosecution could only have been at the instance of an officer authorized by the municipal committee, and such an offence would have been compoundable. Reference has also been made to certain questions and answers in the local legislative council regarding the policy of prosecutions being left in the hands of the municipal committee, but as a Judge I am not concerned with any question of policy, but only with the legality of the proceedings sought to be revised. If the Municipal Act had been a contemporaneous Act instead of being an Act passed nearly half a century afterwards, I should have been inclined to accept the applicant's suggestion that there is a difference between "causes" and "allows". In ordinary English, a man is said to cause a thing if he allows it to exist. The word "causes" is not a term of art. S. 268, I. P. C., shows that a person may be guilty of a public nuisance by reason of an act or an illegal omission. The offence in this case is one of public nuisance provided for by the Police Act. On this ground I can see no reason for interference. The conviction does not appear to have been based upon anything observed at the local inspection, but upon the evidence given in the case. The local inspection, on the contrary, disclosed that proper repairs had been made to the outlet of the latrine, in other words, that the nuisance had ceased, a fact so far favourable to the accused. This does not, however discredit the evidence that the nuisance did exist on a previous date.

Ground 3 does not seem to have been urged in the Court below. The applicant does not say that he reported to the municipality about the dereliction of duty on the part of the municipal scavengers. If he had done so, it might have been taken by the lower Court in mitigation of punishment. I see no reason to interfere with the sentence. The application is therefore dismissed.

(a) Limitation Act (1908), S. 6—Applicability—Application to make decree absolute—Section does not apply.

Section 6 applies solely to the time for the institution of a suit or the time for an application for an execution of a decree. It does not apply to an application to make a decree absolute: 43 I. C. 870, Foll. [P 63 C 2]

D. T. Mangalmoorthy—for Appellant.

G. L. Subhedar—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The facts of the case out of which this appeal arises may be briefly stated. The plaintiff, who was then a minor, obtained on 19th October 1910 a preliminary decree for sale of immovable property on foot of a mortgage. On 1st October 1917 he applied under R. 5(2), O. 34, Sch. 1, Civil P. C., for a final decree for sale alleging that he had reached the age of 18 on 30th September 1917. The 30th September 1917 was a Sunday. The mortgagor did not oppose the application but the present appellant, who purchased the mortgaged property pendente lite, contended that the plaintiff attained majority in June 1914 and that in any case the application was time barred, S. 6, Lim. Act, 1908, having no application. The lower Court found on the evidence adduced by the plaintiff that he was born on 1st October 1896, and this conclusion is now accepted by the appellant though impeached in one of the grounds of appeal. The learned Additional District Judge held also that S. 6, Lim. Act, which he wrongly cited as S. 7, applies to applications generally and is not confined to applications for execution of decrees. From the fact that Maharaj Kumar Guneshwar Singh v. Jogadhatri Pershad Narain Singh (1), a case decided in 1898, was cited in support of this conclusion as well as from the citation of S. 7, it appears that the Judge had not before him a copy of the Limitation Act (9 of 1908) now in force.

The plaintiff having obtained a final decree for sale, the purchaser of the mortgaged property has preferred this appeal. That S. 6, Lim. Act, will not help the plaintiff-respondent is conceded on his behalf by his learned advocate and there is clear authority against the view taken by the lower Court in Nizam-ud-din Shah v. Bohra Bhim Sen (2), where it was pointed out that the section applies solely to the time for the institution of a suit or the time for an application for the execution of a decree. The appellant contends on the authority of Digamber v. Ganpat (3), Nizam-ud-din Shah v. Bohra Bhim Sen (2), above cited, and Lakshmi Achi v. Subbarama Aiyar (4) that a mortgage suit remains pending until a final decree is passed and that the application for a final decree, being governed by the Code of Civil Procedure, is subject to the limitation prescribed by Art. 181, Limitation Schedule now in force. For the respondent reliance is placed upon Madhab Moni Dasi v. Pamela Lambert (5), where it was held that Art. 181 does not govern an application for an order absolute under R. 3, O. 34. The case however must be distinguished on the ground that the preliminary decree for foreclosure was obtained before the present Code of Civil Procedure came into operation. As pointed out by Jenkins, C. J., in Amolak Chand v. Sharat Chandra (6), the Judges expressly refrained from deciding that the present Code applied and in fact treated the case as not falling under that Code by directing that an order absolute should be made.

Before the Code of 1908 came into force, the Calcutta High Court had long held that there was no period of limitation within which a mortgagee was bound to apply for an order absolute for sale in a suit brought for sale of the mortgaged property. The ratio decidendi was that the application was one to obtain a supplementary decree, that the general Art. (178 now 181) was the only article that could possibly be applied and that the said article applied only to applications under the Code of Civil Procedure. A similar view prevailed in this Court: see Tallappa v. Dattu (7) and Jaka v. Jamna (8). This view however is no longer tenable after the decisions of the Privy Council in Batuk Nath v. Munni Dei (9), Abdul Majid v. Jawahir Lal (10) and Munna Lal Parruck v. Sarat Chunder Mukerji (11). Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee have plainly approved of the position taken by the Allahabad High Court that an application for an order absolute for foreclosure or sale under the Transfer of Property Act was an application to execute or enforce the conditional decree and that the period of limitation was therefore three years from the date of the decree. The conflict of decisions above mentioned has now been removed by transferring to the Civil Procedure Code the provisions relating to mortgage decrees and by laying down that what follows the first decree is not an order for sale or foreclosure but a decree for sale or foreclosure. Such an application as that in the present case is therefore not one for execution of the first decree and consequently neither Art. 182 of the Limitation Schedule nor S. 6, Lim. Act. applies. That Art. 181 is applicable was held in Madho Ram v. Nihal Singh (12) and Ramji Lal v. Karan Singh (13).

The view I have taken is in accord with that of a Bench of this Court in Chunnilal v. Tikamdas (14), where it is held that the limitation for an application under R. 6, O. 34, is that prescribed by Art. 181. The appeal succeeds, the final decree for sale passed by the lower Court is set aside and the application for such a decree is dismissed. The appellant will pay the costs incurred by the respondent for translating documents, as the translations were required in connexion with the ground of appeal, which contest the finding that the respondent did not attain majority till 1st October 1914. The other costs in this Court will be borne by the respondent. The appellant will pay the costs incurred by the respondent for witnesses in the lower Court, but all the other costs in that Court will be paid by the respondent.

In dealing with a case under S. 147, I. P. C., an appellate Court is expressly empowered to pass an order under S. 106 (3) requiring security to keep the peace from the appellants. The making of such an order does not amount to enhancing the sentence. [P 65 C 2]

S. Y. Deshmukh—for Applicant.

Order.—This is an application by Maharaj Singh for revision of a sentence passed under S. 147, I. P. C., and upheld on appeal by the Sessions Judge, Chhat-tisgarh Division. The first point urged before me is that the conviction is bad inasmuch as the charge did not set out the common object of the unlawful assembly. According to the findings arrived at by the Courts below, the common object was to assault the complainant Baliram for reasons which are given in those judgments. The learned Sessions Judge has rightly held that the absence of particulars regarding the common object did not prejudice the accused in their defence. In other words they knew from the prosecution evidence what was being made out against them. The finding is that Maharaj Singh was the ring-leader of the party opposed to the complainant and took an actual part in the riot by ordering the accused to beat the complainant. There are three other petitions before me, and I may mention that none of these people have been in any way prejudiced in their defence. They also seem to be active participants in the assault and not merely persons present at an unlawful assembly.

The cases cited before me can be distinguished easily. Behari Mahton v. Queen-Emress (1) lays down a sound rule that an accused person is entitled to know clearly what he is being charged with and where a person is constructively made liable for the acts of another it is especially necessary to set out in the charge the common object of the assembly. I am prepared to concede that there are cases and there may be cases where an accused person is seriously prejudiced if the charge is defective. In the present case however nothing of the kind has happened. Sabir v. Queen-Emress (2) is a case of a trial by jury, and it was held that where a Sessions Judge in his charge to the jury referred to two possible common objects of an unlawful assembly, one of which only had been set out in the charge, it was impossible to say which view had been accepted by the jury. The case cannot apply here where there was no trial by jury. Lastly Poresh Nath Sinar v. Emperor (3) is relied upon for the applicant. The facts of the case were somewhat peculiar. The petitioners before the High Court had been already put in possession of some land in certain proceedings under S. 145, Criminal P. C., and it was not clear whether the dispute related according to the charge to the land so put in possession or to the land excluded from the order of the Magistrate. I held that S. 537 cures the irregularity. It is urged that the accused should not have been called upon to pay costs for recalling prosecution witnesses for examination. This is admitted by the learned Sessions Judge to be correct, but he points out the reason for giving up Dabalu was not the demand for costs, but the fact that several attempts were made to have him summoned and he could not be got. This is a complete answer to this ground.

It is urged that the learned Sessions Judge has practically enhanced the sentence by passing an order under S. 106 (3), Criminal P. C., requiring security to keep the peace from the applicants. No authority in support of this view has been cited nor do I know of any. It is a power expressly conferred on an appellate Court. On the merits of the order, I can find no ground for interference, especially as the security has been furnished as I understand. On the merits of the case the learned Sessions Judge has very carefully gone into the evidence and has arrived at conclusions which are unassailable in revision. The application is therefore dismissed.

Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 520—Order passed in favour of person should not be set aside behind his back.

Order.—The order of the Sessions Judge in this matter is not supported either by the learned standing counsel for the Crown or by the non-applicant's pleaders. It was passed without hearing the present applicant, to whom at the close of the non-applicant's prosecution for criminal breach of trust the property in dispute was delivered with the non-applicant's consent. The prosecution in fact was only withdrawn by the police because the non-applicant professed his readiness to allow the property to be so delivered. It is true that S. 520, Criminal P. C., does not prescribe the issue of a notice to any person before an order under that section is passed. But it is a general principle of law that an order duly passed by competent authority in favour of any person should not be set aside without that person being heard. If particular authority is required to support this proposition, I would refer to Laxman Rangu, In re (1). The Sessions Judge's order is set aside and he will now proceed to dispose of the application made to him under S. 520, Criminal P. F. W. Dillon and M. R. Dixit—for Appellant.

Bipin Krishna Bose—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The plaintiff-appellant is the superior proprietor of a village of which the defendant is a thekadar with protected status. On 15th May 1914 a decree was passed for arrears of rent, which provided that on failure to pay the amount on or before 11th November 1914, the defendants were to be ejected. The decretal amount was not paid and the plaintiff-appellant was put in possession of the village on 15th January 1915. On 19th January 1915 the defendants deposited Rs. 2,500, which was a few rupees short of the decretal amount, and asked that the time should be extended and they should be restored to possession. The first Court refused to do so. Against this order there was an appeal to the Divisional Judge, who remanded the case for an inquiry as to whether there was sufficient cause for the delay in payment. The plaintiff-appellant has filed this appeal against the order of remand.

The first point for consideration is whether S. 148, Civil P. C., empowers an executing Court to extend the time fixed for payment of the decretal amount. There is nothing in the language or the position of the section in the Code, which would make it inapplicable to an executing Court, if the condition required by the section is otherwise fulfilled. That section enables a Court to enlarge time, even though the period originally fixed may have expired. But time can be enlarged only when a period is fixed for the doing of any act prescribed or allowed by the Civil Procedure Code. It does not, in my opinion, apply to a case where time is fixed by a decree. The act which has to be done must be an act or a duty imposed by the Code itself and not by a decree under the Code. The following cases support the view which I have taken: Jug Ram v. Jema Ram (1), Het Singh v. Tika Ram (2), Suranjan Singh v. Ram Bahad Lal (3), Suranjan Singh v. Ram Bahad Lal (4) and Dharmaraja Iyer v. Sreenivasa Mudaliar (5). In Suranjan Singh v. Rambahad Lal (3) Charnier, C. J., points out that the same view has been accepted by Reil, C. J., in Hukam Chand v. Hayat (6) and by Messrs. Evans and Piggott in Narendra Bahadur Singh v. Ajudhya Prasad (7). It has been argued before me that although the payment of money is not prescribed by the Code, it is allowed by the Code, and O. 21, R. 1, is referred to. But that order merely provides for paying money under a decree. It is the decree however which creates the duty of paying the money. The words "not prescribed" refer to a duty and the words "not allowed" refer to a privilege created by the Code. The payment of decretal money is not therefore an act such as is contemplated by S. 148. I therefore agree with the appellant that the Courts below have no power under S. 148 to extend the time fixed by the decree.

It is urged for the respondents that the decree for ejectment was illegal, as there is no Statute applicable to the case which provides for such ejectment. S. 65 (a), sub-S. 7, Land Revenue Act, however, though not expressly providing for ejectment on the ground that the thekadar has failed to pay the theka jama, recognises the validity of an agreement providing for the re entry of the landlord on default of payment of theka jama. The defendants did not contest the claim for ejectment, and it is not possible to say whether there was such an agreement between the parties or not. It is next urged that the decree in this case should be regarded as a consent decree and relief against forfeiture granted on the principle recognised in a number of cases: Krishna Bai v. Hari Govind (8), Nagappa v. Venkat Rao (9) and Balamhat Karjibhat v. Vinayak Ganpatrao (10). These cases however proceed upon the view that a consent decree is merely the adoption of a contract with all the incidents of that contract. In the present case, there was no consent decree, but it is argued that as the defendant did not raise any objection to the relief for ejectment, they must be deemed to have consented to it. I can find no warrant for such a presumption. The failure to raise the plea is consistent with the existence of a contract providing for such ejectment.

Lastly it is urged for the respondents that this was a case for the exercise of the inherent power of the Court to enlarge time for the ends for justice under S. 151, Civil P. C. The Court passed a decree, rightly or wrongly, for ejectment against the defendants, if they failed to pay the arrears of rent within the time fixed by the Court. There was no appeal from the decree, nor was any review of that decree sought. I do not think S. 151 was meant to empower the executing Court to alter the decree, or in any way affect its finality. The case is undoubtedly a hard one, but it is my duty to give effect to the law as I understand it. The order of the lower appellate Court is reversed and that of the first Court restored. Each party will bear his own costs throughout.

Judgment. — The appellant Ramji Mahar, aged 20 years, has been convicted and sentenced to death for the murder of Bahini Mhalin. The Assessors concurred in thinking his guilt established.

The evidence was fully recorded by the learned Sessions Judge and is exhaustively discussed in his judgment. The appellant at his own request was produced before us, so that we had the advantage of hearing his defence from his own lips. What he wishes us to believe is that Timia Dhimar (P. W. 8) was seen to murder Bahini by Bakia the nephew and Damia the son of Ramji Kunbi (P. W. 11) and that they gave this out in the village before the police arrived to investigate. Bakia and Damia will be found mentioned, towards the close of the case-diary for 23rd October last, in a statement attributed to the appellant, but not as in any way cognizant of the crime. We may say at once that we entirely discredit this story. There is no indication of it in the record of the appellant's examination by the Commissioner, Drug, nor did he tell it to the Sessions Judge. The appellant complains that he was not properly examined by the Sessions Judge, and it must be conceded that the record of that examination is not as full as it should have been. He was however defended by a pleader at the trial—indeed on 2 out of the 3 days for which the trial lasted two pleaders represented him—yet the lengthy cross-examination of Timia contains no hint that he was, to begin with, accused of the murder, nor were Bakia and Damia cited as witnesses for the defence. To the committing Magistrate Timia was mentioned by the appellant as bearing him a grudge because he had accused another Dhimar Sonia of making an indecent proposal to his wife. In the grounds of appeal the improper overtures are attributed to Timia himself, and by what is evidently a similar afterthought that person is alleged to have himself murdered Bahini.

It is proved beyond possibility of doubt that Bahini, a girl of 7, was in her parents' house at Mauza Sangam on Thursday 22nd October up to about 10 a. m., that about 4 p. m. the same day her corpse was found covered with sand in a pit a mile from the abadi, and that she had been strangled and all her ornaments removed. The first information was laid at the Bhandara station-house at 9 p. m. by the Kotwar Kisnia (alias Pichgia), since deceased, and the Sub-Inspector Chunnial (P. W. 1) reached Sangam at 3.30 a. m. on 23rd October, being joined by the Circle Inspector (P. W. 9) at noon. The appellant was arrested at 3 p. m. and is said to have shortly afterwards given up all except two, a silver bindla and a gold nose ring, of the murdered girl's missing ornaments. The chalan was prepared on 24th October and on Monday the 26th idem the appellant was placed before the committing Magistrate. The investigation was thus completed with exceptional despatch a circumstance which tells very strongly if not conclusively, against any theory that evidence was fabricated. We would also observe that the Kotwar Kisnia, who was the appellant's uncle and lived on the same premises as the appellant's father, would in all probability have named Timia as the murderer in the first information had Bakia and Damia denounced him as the appellant now asserts.

Looked at in the light of these considerations, the evidence of Bahini's parents Dina (P. W. 4) and Jhega (P. W. 5), her sister, Maini (P. W. 6) and the little girl Sokri (P. W. 7) satisfies us, that the appellant seized a favourable opportunity of taking Bahini to the jungle on the pretext of giving her sitaphal from the trees of which his family had a theka and that he turned Jhega back from the jungle on her going thither in search of the child. He was staying for Diwali, then just over, with his father Yeshwantia, whose premises have an entrance opposite to and only a few paces from that of Dina's compound. The Sessions Judge writes that Sokri answered his questions fairly intelligently and that Jhega is a simple woman. Nor is there any suggestion that either Dina or Jhega has anything to gain by falsely accusing the appellant, who indeed appears to have been on friendly terms with the family. The appellant denies that he went to Dina's house at all on 22nd October, just as he denies that he went with Bahini to the jungle and gave up her ornaments. To the committing Magistrate he said he went to the jungle early that morning to watch the sitaphal crop which was already ripe, while in this Court he declared that he must have been back at home at the time the murder seem to have been committed: both of these statements, if true, might surely had been supported by evidence, especially as a next door neighbour would be likely to show himself or be referred to as soon as active inquiry for the missing child began to be made.

With regard to Tima, we think like the Sessions Judge that no sufficient reason for disbelieving him appears. It is not likely that Bahini found her way to the jungle alone or that a man and a child going there towards noon would meet or see nobody en route. Tima was asked in cross-examination about Sonia, and this is what he said:

"Sonia Dhimar is my caste-fellow. He had not made any gestures calling the accused's wife and I had no quarrel with Ramji on that account."

There remains the evidence that after being arrested the appellant undertook to give up the murdered girl's ornaments and did in fact produce all but two from a faggot of hemp twigs in his father's compound. In this Court the appellant says that the police searched the compound and so found the ornaments without any help or disclosure from him. In this connexion it is essential to bear in mind that the investigation began in the jungle, a mile from the abadi, and that the appellant was arrested in the jungle. The Circle Inspector having on the strength of a comparison between the appellant's footprints and those found in the jungle pronounced his guilt clear and undertaken to trace the stolen property in a similar way, the appellant may well have thought further concealment useless. Our experience leads us to believe that such an attitude of mind is common among ignorant criminals confronted with evidence of their guilt on the very scene of their crime. Nor can we find sufficient reason for doubting the testimony of Abdul Rashid (P. W. 10), malguzar of the neighbouring village Tiddi, to say nothing of Ramji (P. W. 11), mukaddam gomashtha of Sangam Sub-Inspector Chunilal (P. W. 1) and Circle Inspector Rachpal Singh (P. W. 9). No doubt there are discrepancies as to the entrance by which the police got into Yeshwantia's premises and whether, while still in the jungle, the appellant did or did not mention the faggot of hemp twigs as the place where the ornaments were concealed. The former may be due to some members of the party entering one way and the rest by the other. As to the latter Ramji is the witness who said that the appellant described the place of concealment before going to the dense, and his memory seems to be hazy on the point, for he said:

"When the darogha came the accused said the ornaments are not here, I will give them, they are at home. There he did not say that the ornaments were kept in the jankaris. Nor he did say there that the ornaments were in the sank aris. He said so within the hearing of the malguzar of Tiddi."

The ornaments found in Yeshwantia's compound are clearly proved to be Bahini's. If they were put there by some one other than the appellant, that other must have been the murderer, and we altogether fail to understand why when so strong a case had been made out against the appellant he should have sacrificed so large a part of the booty. Having given all the evidence our careful consideration we consider it established beyond reasonable doubt that the appellant is himself the murderer. We do not agree with the Sessions Judge that recent possession of property taken by murder can show no more than that the possessor was either the thief or the dishonest receiver. This is manifestly a case in which murder and robbery formed part of one transaction and in such it has been held that recent and unexplained possession of the stolen property, while it would be presumptive evidence against a prisoner on the charge of robbery, would similarly be evidence against him on the charge of murder; see Queen v. Empress v. Sami (1). The murder was a peculiarly cold-blooded and sordid crime and we find no sort of justification for declining to confirm the sentence of death passed by the Sessions Judge. The appeal is accordingly dismissed.

Judgment.—The following genealogical tree explains the relationship of the parties:

The plaintiff's case is that the 4 fields in suit situated at Daosari in the Pasad Taluq belonged to his grandfather Bhau, son of Tukaji Maratha, who died some 30 years ago. He says the family are separate and that Bhau's son Appa inherited the fields and cultivated them. He died in 1898 when the land came to his widow, Harnabai. Plaintiff was adopted by Harnabai. In 1901-02 Harnabai had leased the fields to Raoji, the deceased father of the present defendants. He paid the lease money till 1911, the year of his death since when the defendants have paid nothing and are cultivating the fields by force. He sues for possession. The defence is that the fields were not the self-acquired property of Bhau but were acquired by Tukaram, plaintiff's ancestor. After his death his four sons were his heirs. Bhau's son Appa was given in adoption to Nana some 40 or 50 years ago and by this adoption Appa lost all rights to the fields. After Jalba's death Raoji became the sole owner of the land and after his death the defendants have been peacefully enjoying the fields as owners. The lease was denied and it was stated that neither Appa nor his widow ever cultivated the fields during the last 30 or 40 years. Harnabai had filed a suit against Raoji, Suit No. 27 of 1908 on the file of the Munsif, Dharwar, to recover lease-money but that suit was dismissed. Defendant 1 had filed a suit against the plaintiff, Suit No. 265 of 1912, for mutation of names and got a decree. In that suit the question of adoption of Appa by Nana was decided and it is now res judicata. They deny all knowledge of the adoption of the plaintiff by Harnabai and state that if the adoption of Appa by Nana is not proved, then the family being joint Harnabai had no right to adopt a son. It was lastly contended that as defendants have been in possession as owners for more than 12 years they had acquired a valid title to the land. In his reply plaintiff stated he held possession within 12 years of suit and that Civil Suit No. 27 of 1908 was dismissed as a result of compromise out of Court by Raoji paying the lease-money to Harnabai; that he knows nothing about the question of the adoption of Appa being decided in Suit No. 265 of 1912 and if decided, the question was incidental and could not be res judicata.

The findings of the first Court may be summarised thus: (a) Bhau was separate and the fields in suit were his self-acquired property; (b) the decision in Suit No. 265 of 1912 as regards Appa's adoption by Nana was not res judicata but that there was evidence to show that Appa was so adopted; (c) plaintiff had been adopted by Harnabai to her husband Appa and that she had a right to adopt to him; (d) after Bhau's death Appa used to manage the lands in suit and after his death his widow, Harnabai let the fields to Raoji; (e) that the lease by Raoji in favour of the lady for the years 1311 to 1319 Fasli being unregistered could not be received in evidence; (f) that there was evidence to show that rent in money or in kind was paid by Raoji to his lessor; (g) plaintiff's predecessor was found to have been in possession within 12 years of suit and defendants' possession was not adverse. The claim was decreed. On appeal the finding that the plaintiff was validly adopted by Harnabai was not attacked and the Judge writes:

"Also in the argument it has not been disputed that Appa was given in adoption to Nana. The learned pleader for the respondent urges title of Bhau alone and also prescriptive title of Appa from 1894 and also the allotment of defendants as tenant which estops them. The property belonged to Bhau solely. If it belonged to the family and was held adversely to the family by Appa who had gone out of the family the defendants' right would be extinguished. If defendants took the land on lease from Harnabai then estoppel would work."

The Judge finds that the Bhagni Register of 1874, Ex. P. 2, showed Bhau as the owner of the fields alone and that Exs. D-10 to D-24 show that from 1899.00 to 1908.09 the assessment was paid by Harnabai, wife of Appa and from 1909.10 to 1912.13 it was paid by the plaintiff, the defendants not paying until 1913.14 (Exs. D. 25 and D. 26). The Court finds that the plaintiff's evidence established that the land belonged solely to Bhau but as Appa went out of the family by adoption, his interest in the land ceased but he continued to hold the land as his own and after him his widow did the same paying assessment and leasing out the fields; and further that this possession could not have been on behalf of the family since he was no member of it and hence it was adverse and for more than 12 years; and lastly among the lessees was Raoji, the father of the present defendants. The appeal was dismissed. Against that dismissal the present appeal has been filed.

Whether Appa's adoption by Nana is or is not res judicata it is unnecessary to consider, for both Courts have found the adoption proved. It is urged for the appellants that under Expl. 4, S. 11, Civil P. C., plaintiff's ownership by adverse possession on Appa's part not having been raised in the former suit could not be raised now. This question was not raised by the plaintiff in the former case, so the defendants in any case were not required to meet the issues not tended by the plaintiff. The present plaintiff then was sued as the son of Bapu. The case was ex parte and though an ex parte judgment can, of course, be res judicata yet in matters that travel beyond the record the principle cannot well be applied. A copy of the plaint in that suit is not on record, nor a copy of the decree. Stress is laid on the fact that Exs. D.6 to D.9, copies of the entries in the register of right with respect to these 4 fields show that they had been placed in the names of the defendants; but though there is a presumption as to the correctness of such entries, that presumption is rebuttable and it is obvious that the Judge of the Court below has considered the evidence sufficient to show that despite these entries the defendants are not the real owners of the land. The entries in Ex. P. 2 may not be inconsistent with the defendants' case, but we would have expected the names of the other members of the family to be entered in the column headed "Extent of the share held by sub-sharer, jointness shown in fractions of a rupee." The exhibit as it stands shows that Bhau was the sole owner of those fields. It is further contended that adverse possession was never advanced either in the plaint or the pleadings; that plaintiff claimed by inheritance; and that the lower appellate Court has made out a new case for the plaintiff. The plaintiff in his plaint certainly claimed possession as the son of Appa who held as the son of Bhau. He also stated:

"Appa, son of Bhau, Patel, cultivated the said field. Appa, son of Bhau, died in the year 1898 approximately and after him his widow Harnabai cultivated the said fields as owner thereof. The plaintiff is the adopted son of Appa Patel taken in adoption by Harnabai."

But if the land belonged solely to Bhau, which is the finding of the lower appellate Court and a finding of fact, on his death it would not go to his family but to his widow, if he had one. This point has not been made clear. But even if he had a widow after her death the land would revert to the family. The objection that the pleadings did not support the case of title by prescription by Appa and Harnabai is met by the learned Judge of the Court below in para. 8 of his judgment in these words:

"But the plaint itself states this long possession and clearly means as owner. The latter statement certainly gives the basis of this ownership as the self-acquisition by Bhau and the denial of adoption of Appa. But though one part falls the other remains and the plea is that plaintiff's predecessors have been in possession as full owners for very many years past. No further plea of fact is required to show that defendants' claim would be extinguished long ago. I do not think then that this is making out a new case. The case is contained in the plaint and pleadings. But apart from that the fact Raoji himself took the land on lease shows that this ownership was admitted. The relationship of landlord and tenant was established and cannot be denied so long as defendants remain in possession."

I think the lower appellate Court is correct. Issue 3 runs—

"Was the plaintiff and his predecessor-in-title in possession of the fields in suit as owner within 12 years before the institution of the suit?"

Under this issue plaintiff was entitled to show that he and Appa were owners either by inheritance or by prescription, and I do not think it can be said, as has been argued, that the defendants were taken by surprise and that the case of adverse possession on the part of the plaintiff and Appa and Harnabai is a new one. As regards the lease it is said that as it is not registered it cannot be admitted in evidence, nor is the evidence to prove it admissible. The lease has not been taken into account, but evidence to show that Raoji did as a matter of fact pay lease money is admissible and though the witnesses as to the lease have been rejected, there is nothing to prevent the evidence of witnesses who speak to the relationship of landlord and tenant being admitted, for a tenancy can be proved without proving the lease, if there be any; Amir Ali v. Aykup Ali Khan (1). The judgment in Suit No. 27 of 1908 Ex. D-4 shows that it was dismissed under S. 102, of the old Civil P. C., as the plaintiff was absent and therefore the decision in that case cannot help in this. The true facts of the case seems to me to be that Bhau was separate and the property being self-acquired on his death Appa, his natural son, was allowed to take possession after he had been given away in adoption. After Appa, Harnabai continued in possession and it was not until Raoji's death that the defendants asserted their title to the land. On a full consideration of the arguments advanced on behalf of the appellants I am of opinion that the case has been correctly decided. This appeal is therefore dismissed with costs.

Second Appeal No. 88 of 1915, Decided on 26th September 1916.

(a) C. P. Tenancy Act (11 of 1898), S. 41—Mortgage of absolute occupancy holding—Malguzar obtaining declaration of invalidity of mortgage—Attachment of holding by malguzar in execution of money decree—Holding could not be sold free from mortgage—Interest of tenant, i. e. equity of redemption, was only saleable.

One N., an absolute occupancy tenant, mortgaged his holding to the defendants. The plaintiffs malguzars obtained a declaration that the mortgage was not binding upon them. After the death of N the plaintiffs attached the holding in execution of a money decree, not for rent but for money lent, obtained against the son of N. The defendants mortgagees filed an objection, which was successful. The plaintiffs then sued for a declaration that they were entitled to sell the holding free of the mortgage as it was not binding upon them:

Held: that the mortgage, though not binding on the plaintiffs, was binding on the tenant and that the plaintiffs decree-holders could only sell the interest of the tenant which was a mere equity of redemption. [P 73 C 1]

(b) Execution—Scope of—Auction-purchaser derives his title from judgment-debtor.

An auction-purchaser in execution of a money decree derives his title from the judgment-debtor, and not from the decree-holder. [P 73 C 1]

(c) Execution—Scope of—Auction-purchaser does not derive any right which judgment-debtor may have to set aside or question validity of deed executed by him.

There is no authority for the proposition that the purchaser at a sale in execution of a decree of the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor acquires by that purchase not merely the right, title and interest of the judgment debtor, but any right which the judgment-creditor might have to set aside or question the validity of any deed which had been previously made by the judgment-debtor himself: 18 W. Judgment.—The plaintiffs are the malguzars of the village in which one Namnya Mahar was an absolute occupancy tenant. The latter mortgaged his holding to the defendants. No notice, as required by law, was given to the malguzars, nor was the mortgage consented to by them. The plaintiffs had sued the defendants and obtained a declaration that the mortgage was not binding on the plaintiffs. After the death of Namnya, the plaintiffs obtained a simple money decree, not for rent but for money lent, against his son Bajya and attached the absolute occupancy holding. An objection was then preferred by the defendants on the strength of their mortgage. The objection was allowed, and the property was ordered to be sold subject to the mortgage. The plaintiffs have now brought a suit for declaration that, as the mortgage is not binding on them, they are entitled to sell the holding free of the defendant's mortgage. The plaintiffs have failed in both the Courts below and have now preferred this second appeal.

The contention on behalf of the appellants is that, as the mortgage cannot be enforced against them, they are entitled to have the property sold free of the incumbrance. Now the mortgage, though voidable at the instance of the plaintiff malguzars, is binding upon the tenant. The mortgage though it is sought to be enforced against the malguzars is valid until a tenant right is set up by the mortgagee or his representative-in-interest. Under S. 60, Civil P. C., the Court can attach and sell such property over which the judgment-debtor has a disposing power. The latter can only sell his equity of redemption and the Court can therefore only attach and sell such equity of redemption. If the mortgagees had made no objection, and the property had been sold, the auction-purchaser, unless the malguzars themselves purchase it, would be bound by the mortgage, for an auction-purchaser in a money decree does not derive his title from the decree-holder, but only from the judgment-debtor. The fact that the mortgagees have put in an objection and the objection has been allowed ought not to make any difference. The decree-holder's right to avoid the mortgage does not pass to the auction-purchaser. In fact it is a right inseparably connected with his title as malguzar. In Lalla Ram Suran Lal v. Mt. Lokesh Koor (1) it has been laid down that there is no authority for the proposition that the purchaser at a sale in execution of a decree of the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor acquires by that purchase not merely the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor but any right which the judgment-creditor might have to set aside or question the validity of any deed which had been previously made by the judgment-debtor himself. If the property could be sold free of incumbrances at the instance of the plaintiffs then it seems that other creditors, not being malguzars, would be entitled to share in the rateable distribution of the assets, even though the mortgage could not be questioned by such creditors.

(1) [1872] 19 W. R. 39.

All the relief to which the malguzars are entitled, until there has been a foreclosure on the mortgage, is a mere declaration that the mortgage will not bind them. Practically the plaintiffs are now asking that the mortgage should be cancelled, as if it was absolutely void and of no effect whatever.

This cannot be done. They would no doubt be entitled to eject the mortgagees when he claims to be the malguzars' tenant, but no further relief can be granted to the plaintiffs at present beyond a declaration that the defendants by virtue of the mortgage will not become the plaintiffs' tenants. It is urged that under O. 21, R. 63, the plaintiffs are entitled to establish the right which they claimed to the property in dispute. The right which they claimed was the right to bring the property to sale free of incumbrances. If the property cannot be sold free of incumbrances, they cannot succeed in a suit under O. 21, R. 63, any more than they can in execution proceedings. I think there is no force in the argument based on res judicata. What was held in the previous suit was that the mortgagees cannot claim to be the malguzars' tenants. This they are not doing in the present suit. The order for sale must be read as subject to the declaration already obtained by the plaintiffs in the former suit. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Civil Misc. Appeal No. 1 of 1917, Decided on 22nd August 1917, from decree of Dist. Judge., Khandwa, in O. A. No. 83 of 1916, D/- 14th September 1916.

Civil P. C. (1908), Ss. 52 and 2 (11)—Legal representative—Executor de son is legal representative.

The term "legal representative" in S. 52, means a person who in law represents the estate of a deceased and includes any person who intermeddles with the estate of the deceased. An executor de son sort would therefore be a legal representative and liable to be brought on the record under that section on the death of a defendant. [174 C 2]

S. R. Pandit—for Appellant.

Judgment.—In this case the plaintiff sued in the Court of the Second Mun-

sif for possession of a house at Khandwa. His story was that it had been let to one Sukhnandan, now dead on 20th August 1915. Defendant 1 was said to be Sukhnandan's wife and defendant 2 a sub-lessee of defendant 1 of a portion of the premises. Defendant 1 pleaded that she was not the wife of Sukhnandan but his mistress. Plaintiff then said that in any case she came to live in the house as dependant of Sukhnandan and had no possession during the lifetime of her paramour. Other pleas were also raised which it is unnecessary at present to enter into. The first Court found that defendant 1 was a dependant of Sukhnandan and passed a decree in plaintiff's favour. In the lower appellate Court it was contended that defendant 1 was not the heir of Sukhnandan whose death extinguished the tenancy and therefore the plaint which had been valued at Rs. 18 a year as rental was insufficiently valued. It was further contended that the value of the house was Rs. 1,500 and the suit was therefore not triable by the Court of the Munsif. The lower appellate Court finds that defendant 1 could not step into Sukhnandan's shoes with reference to the continuance of the lease and that plaintiff could not enforce against her any liabilities under the lease. She was found to be a trespasser and therefore the plaint should have been stamped on the market-value of the house. This was said by the plaintiff to be Rs. 1,000 and by the defendant Rs. 1,500. The lower appellate Court has found that the case had to be remanded to determine the value of the house. It therefore directed that it be tried by a Sub-Judge.

It seems to me that in the present case the lower appellate Court would have been better advised if it had remitted an issue as to the value of the house in dispute to the original Court and on receiving a finding it could then settle whether the case had been properly tried by the Munsif. But as it has directed a remand I must consider whether the remand is justifiable. The first question for consideration is whether defendant 1 who is Sukhnandan's mistress is his legal representative. It seems clear from Exs. P-19 and P-20 that she was meddling with Sukhnandan's estate. Sukhnandan died when he had been sued in Suit No. 934 of 1912, in the Small Cause Court at Khandwa. Defendant 1 stated in Ex. P-19 that she was Sukhnandan's widow and his heir and in possession of his property and asked that her name be substituted for that of Sukhnandan. Ex. P-20 is an affidavit in support of that application. In S. 2(11), Civil P. C., a "legal representative" is defined. It means a person who in law represents the estate of a deceased and includes any person who intermeddles with the estate of the deceased. An executor de son tort would therefore be a legal representative and liable to be brought on record on the death of a defendant under S. 52, Civil P. C. On the case as laid, defendant 1 was wrongly shown as Sukhnandan's widow, a fact which the plaintiff or the pleader's clerk must have known to be false, for she is a Gond and Sukhnandan was a Teli. Defendant 1 is shown as holding over after Sukhnandan's death. Though she was not his widow, she is as stated above his legal representative and I think the plaint was rightly stamped. It was therefore unnecessary in my opinion to remand the case to have it determined what the market-value of the house was. I therefore set aside the order of remand and direct that the appeal be disposed of on its merits. I make no order as to costs.

Second Appeal No. 116 of 1916, Decided on 1st September 1917, from decree of Divl. Judge, Chhattisgarh Divn. D/-22nd November 1915, in Appeal No. 45 of 1915.

Registration Act (1908), S. 49—Unregistered instrument is admissible to prove collateral fact.

An unregistered instrument is admissible in evidence to prove a collateral fact, but to be collateral, the fact must be independent of or separable from the purpose to effect which the law requires registration. [P 75 C 2]

Plaintiff sued defendant for compensation for improvements effected by him as a lessee of a village under the defendant, and relied on an unregistered deed of lease containing an implied condition to compensate him for improvements:

Held: that the deed of lease was inadmissible in evidence under S. 49 inasmuch as the plaintiff sought to prove the terms of the lease for the purpose of enforcing those terms, and not merely for a collateral purpose. [P 76 C 1]

M. B. Kinkhede—for Appellant.

D. B. Tiwari—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The plaintiff-appellant was a thekadar of the village of Hathi Kanhar within the zamindari of Ambagarh Chowki. On the expiry of a previous lease the plaintiff was given a lease for a term of three years commencing from 6th May 1908. This instrument is unregistered. The defendant-respondent, who is the zamindar, instituted Suit No. 214 for the ejectment of the plaintiff and he was duly ejected in pursuance of the decree. It was held in that suit that the plaintiff was a lessee from year to year and that his lease was determined by a notice to quit given on 7th October 1913. The plaintiff now sues for compensation for improvements made by him. He built three houses, sunk a well and made an embankment. The claim for compensation is based upon the allegation that the plaintiff was encouraged by the zamindar to make these improvements. In support of his claim he has no evidence to tender except the unregistered lease. The lower appellate Court has held the lease to be inadmissible in evidence for want of registration and has dismissed the plaintiff's claim for compensation. In second appeal it is contended that the lease should have been admitted in evidence as the plaintiff is no longer making any claim to the village. He wants to establish that the zamindar induced him to make these improvements. The lease contains a covenant not to eject the lessee in case he improved the village and there is also by implication an agreement to compensate for such improvements. The sole question is therefore whether in view of the provisions of S. 49, Registration Act the lease should have been admitted in evidence. S. 49 provides that an instrument which is compulsorily registrable shall not affect any immovable property comprised therein.

So far as this part of the provision is concerned it does not stand in the way of the plaintiff, for the plaintiff does not seek to establish a charge or other interest in the village by reason of his improvements. He merely makes a claim for compensation. But there is another part of the section which lays down that such an instrument shall not be received in evidence of any transaction affecting such property. The expression "affecting such property" governs the word transaction and not "evidence." The contention of the appellant is that in all suits for money the instrument is receivable as evidence. This is a position which cannot be maintained. It is clear law that in a suit for rent the terms of the lease cannot be proved by putting in an unregistered deed of lease. The relationship of landlord and tenant can be proved but not the terms of the contract. As held in Narayan Bimoi v. Jaywant Singh (1), such an instrument is admissible to prove a collateral fact, but to be collateral, the fact must be independent of or divisible from the purpose to effect which the law requires registration. When the plaintiff says he seeks to give evidence of an encouragement on the part of the zamindar, he really means to prove an implied agreement in the lease to compensate him for improvements. This is part and parcel of the lease and the plaintiff cannot prove the terms of the lease when the lease is unregistered. A recent case decided by the High Court of Bombay and cited on behalf of appellant emphasises the distinction between the parties to a contract and proof of the terms of a contract: Chhotatal Aditram Travadi v. Bai Mahakore (2). None of the cases cited before me seems to have much bearing on the point for decision. In Balaji Teli v. Mt. Bana Bai (3) an unregistered lease was held not admissible in evidence in a suit for damages for breach of contract to retain the defendant in possession of certain lands. In Parmanand v. Birku (4) there was not only claim for damages but also for injunction and the unregistered document was held inadmissible in evidence.

In Gangabisan v. Tukaram (5) an unregistered deed of sale was held admissible in support of a claim for specific performance of a contract. The Full Bench in Rajah of Venkatagiri v. Narayana Reddi (6) held that in an action for damages for breach of contract to execute the lease an unregistered kabulyat was admissible in evidence to prove the contract. Upon a consideration of the cases cited before me I have come to the conclusion that the appellant is not entitled to prove the terms of the lease for the purpose of enforcing those terms. This is giving evidence of the transaction of lease, for which registration was essential. It is argued that the village is one of the Scheduled Districts and hence the Registration Act does not apply to it as no notification under the Scheduled Districts Act of 1874 has been issued, but the Registration Act of 1877 and the present Registration Act extend to the whole of British India.

"except such districts or tracts of country as the Local Government may from time to time with the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council exclude from its operation."

There is no such notification excluding Ambagarh Chowki from the operation of the Registration Act. It is contended that some of the covenants in the lease (i. e., those relating to improvements) should be regarded as mere license, and in support of this reliance is placed upon Narasindas v. Ratanlal (7). I am unable to agree with this contention. The ruling cited does not apply to this case. The lease in this case was not merely a license but was meant to create an interest in immovable property. The authority to build houses was not given independently of the lease but only as part of the lease. Moreover, it was merely an agreement not to eject the lessee if he makes certain classes of improvements. I cannot therefore regard part of the lease as merely creating a license and as such not requiring registration. The appeal fails and is dismissed, but in the circumstances of the case I direct that each party will bear his own costs of the second appeal.

Raisingh Chamar — Complainant — Applicant.

Patia Chamar — Accused — Opposite Party.

Criminal Revn. No. 23 of 1917, Decided on 30th March 1917, on a report by Sess. Judge, Raipur, against order of Subdivl. Magistrate, Mungeli, D/- 10th November 1916, in Criminal Case No. 89 of 1916.

Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 259—Warrant case—Charge framed—Complainant absent—Dismissal in default and acquittal based upon it are illegal.

It is no part of a complainant's duty to call any witness for cross-examination or any other purpose of the defence once a charge is framed, and S. 259 gives no power to the Court to dismiss a warrant case in default after a charge has been framed. An acquittal cannot be based on a dismissal in default. [P 76 C 2]

Order.—This case has been reported by the Sessions Judge. One Rai Singh prosecuted one Patia under S. 497, I. P. C., in the Court of the Subdivisional Magistrate of Mungeli in the Bilaspur District. Process was issued against the accused on 3rd October 1916, and on the 23rd of the same month, having taken all the evidence for the prosecution the Magistrate framed a charge against the accused, and fixed 10th November 1916 for hearing the defence. On this day the order sheet sets out the procedure of the Magistrate in these words:

"The complainant appeared before me 15 minutes ago and went away from the Court saying he would fetch his pleader without caring to obtain my permission to do so. I will wait 10 minutes more.

(Sd.) N. K. HARDAS.

The complainant has not turned up though I waited for him sufficiently long. It has been found that the complainant did not take steps to recall his witnesses for being cross-examined. This default is fatal to the prosecution. The case is therefore dismissed and the accused acquitted.

(Sd.) N. K. HARDAS,
Subdivisional Magistrate."

It is disappointing to find a Subdivisional Magistrate falling into childish errors of the kind here disclosed. It was no part of the complainant's duty to call any witness for cross examination or any other purpose of the defence once the charge was framed. S. 259, Criminal P. C., gives no power to dismiss a warrant case in default after a charge has been framed. Nor does it need any citation of the authorities referred to by the learned Sessions Judge to perceive that an acquittal cannot be based on a dismissal in default. The order dismissing the case is set aside, and the Magistrate concerned, or his successor or other Magistrate appointed by the District Magistrate, is directed to resume the case from the point at which the above illegal order stopped it, subject to the provisions of S. 350, Criminal P. C., and to dispose of the same according to law.

Judgment.—This appeal is under S. 42, Parsi Marriage and Divorce Act 15 of 1865. The appellant is the defendant who was the wife of the plaintiff. The appeal is brought on the ground that there have been two substantial errors or defects in the procedure of the case which may have produced error or defect in the decision of the case upon the merits.

The first error or defect alleged is that the two of the delegates appointed under S. 17 of the Act to aid the Judge in the trial of the case were possessed of such poor knowledge of the English language that they were unable to follow such of the proceedings as were in English, and consequently could not possibly have used independent judgment in arriving at their decision on the facts. The delegates whose knowledge of English is thus attacked are Messrs. Naoraji Pallonji Talati and Naoraji Cawasji Pavri, who number 4 and 5 in the list of delegates as given in the order sheet under the date 22nd January 1917. The whole of the proceedings of the Court were in English, except the evidence of witnesses 4, 6, 7, 8 and 9 for the plaintiff, witness 1 for the defendant and part of the evidence of witnesses 2 and 3 for the defendant and witness 2 for the co-defendant. The most important witnesses gave their evidence in English. In support of the allegation an affidavit has been put forward by the brother of the defendant appellant. His affidavit runs as follows:

"I, Minoocher, son of Manoharji Taden and brother of the appellant (Dinbai) make an oath and say that Messrs. Naoraji Pallonji Talati and Naoraji Cawasji Pavri are extremely poor in the English language."

A counter-affidavit has been put forward by the plaintiff-respondent to the effect that the above two gentlemen know English sufficiently well to have fully understood and followed the proceedings at the trial of this Court. It will be observed that the affidavit put forward by the defendant is extremely cautiously worded. It merely says that the above two gentlemen are extremely poor in the English language. It does not say that their knowledge of English was so poor as to incapacitate them from understanding the proceedings. Such an affidavit is of very little value for the person making it could not be prosecuted for perjury if the two gentlemen had any knowledge of English at all and whether they were or were not able to understand the proceedings. It is urged for the appellant that if the allegation is true, then there was a substantial defect in the procedure, for no trial can be satisfactory in which a delegate, who is to all intents and purposes a member of a jury, cannot understand the proceedings; so much I think may be conceded. It is urged on behalf of the respondent plaintiff that as the verdict of the jury, that is to say, the decision of the delegates, was unanimous, there would have been a majority in favour of the divorce even if these two persons did not understand the proceedings, and it is also urged that some of the instances of adultery which were believed by the delegates were proved by witnesses who did not speak in English. It is argued for the appellant that this will be no answer to her complaint, for it is possible that these two delegates may have been influenced as to these particular instances by the imperfectly understood evidence as to the other instances, given in English, and that they might have influenced the rest of the delegates if on a proper consideration of the evidence they themselves had come to a different conclusion. On referring to the order sheet I find the following entry under date 22nd January 1917 :

" I select the following gentlemen as delegates to aid in the trial of the suit and the parties have no objection to their selection."

It is urged for the respondent-plaintiff that having failed to object to these delegates at the proper time, the defendant cannot challenge them now for the first time in appeal. I consider that there is overwhelming force in this objection. There is certainly no precedent for a delegate under the Parsi Marriage and Divorce Act being challenged for the first time in appeal. A delegate is in a similar position to a jurymen. But there is certainly no precedent for a jurymen being challenged for the first time in appeal. It is pressed upon me that it would be very easy by an inquiry, by or by the direction of this Court, to ascertain whether or not the two gentlemen really understood English sufficiently to understand the proceedings and that such an inquiry should be ordered. I have to consider whether a case has been made out for such an inquiry. I am of opinion that no case has been made out. It is impossible for me to believe that if the gentlemen had not understood English, the matter would not have at once been brought to the notice of the Court either by themselves or by other members of the body of delegates. The foreman of the delegates was a very experienced Barrister, Mr. Kotwal, and Sir Bezonji Mehta was one of the delegates. It is impossible to suppose that two experienced men of the world like these two would have solemnly allowed the proceedings to go on if two of the delegates did not understand English, especially as the two delegates are perfectly well known to many other members of the body of delegates. Both these gentlemen live in Nagpur. Mr. Talati is a Civil Engineer in the mills managed by Sir Bezonji Mehta and he is perfectly well known to Sir Bezonji Mehta and to his son Mr. Sorabji Mehta, who is also employed in the mills and who was one of the delegates. Mr. Talati is also a close neighbour of the defendant and her brother who made the affidavit and the extent of Mr. Talati's knowledge of English cannot possibly be a new discovery. The defendant's father works under Mr. Pavri and the brother who made the affidavit lives in the same house with his father. It is not denied that his brother was present at several hearings of the case except at that part of the case which took place in camera. In the circumstances it would, in my opinion, require something much stronger than the very unsatisfactory affidavit of the appellant's brother to justify me in ordering in appeal an inquiry as to whether or not these two gentlemen understood English sufficiently to follow the proceedings. Everything must be presumed to have been done legally and according to order, and I find no prima facie ground for holding that this maxim is not to be followed in this case. The second alleged defect in procedure is that the learned Judge erred in submitting the case to the delegates without having before him and the delegates the written statement of the plaintiff's witnesses, which the Judge, in the course of the hearing of the suit, ordered the plaintiff to produce. In the course of his evidence, as his own first witness, the plaintiff stated that he took down the statements of some of his witnesses in writing and asked them to sign the same. He says that he did this because he wanted to send their statements to his step father to show to a good Counsel in Bombay. As a result of this admission by the plaintiff the Judge passed the following order on 31st March 1917 :

" At the request of the defence I order discovery of the written statements which the plaintiff took from his witnesses in November last. Mr. Deo (for the plaintiff) says he cannot obey this order without consulting his senior Mr. Abhyankar, who is absent to-day being ill."

There were three further hearings of the case on 2nd, 3rd and 4th April, during which days all the witnesses were examined, and on 4th April the delegates gave their findings and the Court recorded its finding on the question of law, that is to say, the Jury delivered their verdict and the Judge delivered something in the nature of a judgment. All that remained was for the Court to draw up its decree. On 5th April before the decree was drawn up and signed, the Counsel for the defendant represented that the plaintiff was not entitled to a decree because he had not obeyed the order of the Court for the production of documents. The Judge recorded the following order:

"The order was passed some days ago, and the delegates were advised by the Court to draw certain inferences with regard to these non-produced documents. This being so and the delegates presumably having considered the Court's advice before giving their finding, I do not think that the non-production of these documents is sufficient legal ground under S. 32 of the Act, for refusing a decree."

The Judge then proceeded to draw up and sign the decree. By the word "production" of documents in this order, the Judge evidently referred to the "discovery" ordered on 31st March, for discovery and production are not technically the same thing. This point is not of importance as the documents were neither discovered nor produced. The discovery was evidently ordered under O. 11, R. 21. It is contended for the respondent-plaintiff that the defendant and co-defendant took no further action as regards the disobedience of the order until they knew that the verdict was against them. Under O. 11, R. 21, a plaintiff is liable to have his suit dismissed for want of prosecution, but a Court will not necessarily take such an extreme step. In this case the defendant and co-defendant kept silent and made no further demand for the discovery of the documents until after the verdict had been pronounced. The Court was not asked to exercise its discretion or dismiss the suit while the suit was still proceeding. I am of opinion that there was no illegality on the part of the Judge and that the appellant is to blame for her own failure to press for the production of the documents. No penalty for the non-production can be asked for the first time after the case is closed. It is urged on behalf of the respondent-plaintiff that the documents were privileged under S. 129, Evidence Act. On the other hand authorities have been cited by the learned Counsel for the appellant according to which privilege is not extended to documents of this nature.

The ruling, according to the authorities, appears to be that if the statements of the witnesses were recorded for the special purpose of being shown to the plaintiff's legal advisers with a view to ascertaining whether there was a good case to go to Court, then they would be privileged, but not otherwise. It seems to me unnecessary to decide in this case whether the papers in question were privileged or not, since I am of opinion that the appellant, if she really wished the documents to be produced, should have pressed for their production before the evidence was relegated to the delegates for their decision. In pressing for their production after the verdict was delivered, I am of opinion that she asked too late that the Judge's order should be enforced. The appellant also asks that the alimony granted to her by the lower Court under S. 33 of the Act, should be continued pending the disposal of the appeal. In view of the ruling in Hirabai v. Dhurghilhoj Bomanji (1), this request has not been pressed by the learned Counsel for the appellant. For the above reasons I dismiss the appeal. The appellant asks that her costs may be paid by the co-defendant who has been made respondent to the appeal, and the respondent-plaintiff asks that the co-defendant and the defendant should pay his costs in this Court. I see no special reason why the ordinary rule in civil cases should be departed from. The plaintiff-respondent's proper course would have been to make the appellant to give security for his costs. I, therefore order that the appellant do pay her own costs and the costs of the plaintiff-respondent in this Court and that the co-defendant-respondent pay his own costs in this Court. Counsel's fees Rs. 100.

Second Appeal No. 120 of 1917, Decided on 21st November 1917, from decree of Dist. Judge, Raipur, D/- 16th December 1916.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 11—Proceedings before Revenue Officer—Dismissal for default—Proceedings not final—Decision on default does not operate as res judicata.

A dismissal in default does not under the Land Revenue Act operate as a bar to the institution of fresh proceedings. It is only when a Deputy Commissioner decides to enquire into the merits of an objection raising a question of title that the Civil Procedure Code applies. The dismissal of a suit not on the merits, but for default does not operate as res judicata. If there is an adjudication expressly or by necessary implication, then perhaps on general principles of law such adjudication will bar a fresh application for partition before a Revenue Officer. But omission to set up the question of title in the first application also cannot operate as res judicata, when the proceedings terminated in a dismissal for default. [P 80 C 2]

(b) Practise—New plea—Second appeal.

A new plea should not be allowed to be entertained for the first time in second appeal. [P 81 C 1, 2]

(c) C.P. Land Revenue Act (1881), S. 136-K—Proceedings in partition are not analogous to preliminary decree—Order is not final and not appealable.

A proceeding specifying the principles to be followed in making the partition is not analogous to a preliminary decree under the Civil Procedure Code. The order is not a final order and is not appealable. There is no appeal to the Commissioner, but the order of the Deputy Commissioner requires confirmation by the Commissioner. On completion of the partition the Deputy Commissioner submits the proceedings to the Commissioner whose sanction is essential to a final partition. [P 80 C 2]

B. K. Bose—for Appellants.

H. S. Gour and M. Y. Shareef—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The facts of the case are briefly as follows: The plaintiff is the recorded co-sharer to the extent of half-share in Mauza Tarponga. The defendants have purchased the remaining eight annas share from the plaintiff's brother. Since 1894-95 the plaintiff has been cultivating 41.95 acres of sir land, whilst his brother and after him the defendants have been holding 109.28 acres of sir land. This suit has been instituted in accordance with the order passed by the partitioning officer on 6th March 1916 under S. 136-G, Land Revenue Act, 1881. The order was passed in Revenue Case No. 9 of 1915-16. There was a previous application for partition (Revenue Case No. 12 of 1914-15) which after a certain stage was dismissed for nonprosecution, in consequence of the applicant's failure to deposit a certain sum of money for the expenses of the amin. It does not appear that any question of title was raised in these proceedings. The partitioning officer on 11th September 1915 recorded a proceeding which is said to be a proceeding by consent of parties and which is said to have been made under S. 136-K, (Ex. P-2). The present suit which is the outcome of the second application for partition asks for a decision on the question of title raised before the partitioning officer who directed the plaintiff to obtain a decision from the civil Court. The defendants pleaded a partition between their predecessor and the plaintiff of the sir land in 1894. They also relied upon the order of the partitioning officer, dated 11th September 1915 (Ex. P-2) as final and operating by way of res judicata. There was also claim for compensation put forward by the defendants. Both the Courts below have found the alleged partition of 1894 not proved. The lower appellate Court has found that the defendants are not entitled to compensation for improvements. These findings are not and cannot be attacked in second appeal.

The first point argued before me is that second application for partition was incompetent and that it was the duty of the plaintiff to have the former proceedings restored. A dismissal in default does not under the Land Revenue Act operate as a bar to the institution of fresh proceedings. It is only when a Deputy Commissioner decides to enquire into the merits of an objection raising a question of title that the Civil Procedure Code applies. Upon the first application for partition no question of title was raised and the Deputy Commissioner therefore did not try the case in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code. The bar created O. 9, R. 9 therefore does not apply, even if we regard the present application as based upon the same cause of action. The dismissal of a suit not on the merits, but for default does not operate in favour of the defendants as res judicata: Chand Kour v. Pratap Singh (1).

It is however contended that the order dated 11th September 1915 (Ex. P-2) is an order under S. 136-K, Land Revenue Act, 1881. It may be taken that this was a proceeding under S. 136-K though the Deputy Commissioner did not specify the lands held in severalty as required by the section.

I cannot however regard a proceeding specifying the principles to be followed in making the partition as analogous to a preliminary decree under the Civil P. C. It does not appear to be an appealable order. There is no finality attached to such an order. Under S. 136 (Q), Sub S. 2, the Deputy Commissioner may at any stage of the proceedings set aside the order of partition and order the proceedings to be quashed. On completion of the partition the Deputy Commissioner submits the proceedings to the Commissioner whose sanction is essential to a final partition. There is no appeal to the Commissioner, but the order of the Deputy Commissioner requires confirmation by the Commissioner. Having regard therefore to the provisions of S. 136-Q, Sub-S. 2, and the other provisions of the Land Revenue Act, 1881, I am of opinion that no final order was passed which would preclude the entertainment of a second application for partition.

It is not denied on behalf of the respondent that the proper stage for raising any question of title is the date fixed for objections to the partition by the proclamation. But it does not follow the Deputy Commissioner cannot entertain such an objection at a later stage before he is functus officio. This is made clear in S. 168 of the new Land Revenue Act (C. P. Act 2 of 1917): The Full Bench decision of the Allahabad High Court in Muhammad Sadiq v. Dault Ram (2) merely lays down that after a partition is complete no question of title can be entertained by the civil Court, and this view has been accepted in Seth Birdi Chand v. Mt. Kaim Bi (3). In Pandit Sitawati v. Nandkishore (4) the judgment, to which I was a party, lays down as follows:

"The provisions of the Civil Procedure Code relating to res judicata do not apply to an application before a Revenue Officer, but as pointed out by their Lordships of the Privy Council the provisions of S. 11 are not exhaustive: Munyal Pershad Dicit v. Girija Kant Lahiri (5) and Ram Kripal v. Mt. Rup Kanri (6). If there is an adjudication expressly or by necessary implication, then perhaps on general principles of law, such adjudication will bar a fresh application for partition before a Revenue officer."

Here there was no adjudication as I have already stated in reference to Ex. D-2. The omission to set up the question of title in the first application also cannot operate as res judicata when the proceedings terminated in a dismissal for default. In the lower Courts the appellants relied upon the order (Ex. D-2) as an adjudication binding upon the parties. It is now contended before me that there was an agreement come to between the parties which should be given effect to. There was no plea based upon an agreement. The order (Ex. D-2) recites that the parties had no objection to a certain scheme for partition drawn up by the Sub-Divisional Officer with the powers of the Deputy Commissioner. The plaintiff in his deposition before the Sub-Divisional Officer stated that he had no objection to the other cosharers becoming occupancy and ordinary tenants respectively of the sir and khudkasht land which may fall into his patti of his cosharers. I cannot regard this as an agreement. Certain erroneous view of the law was suggested by the Sub-Divisional Officer to which the plaintiff raised no objection. In the present appeal the agreement is sought to be enforced with reference to the sir, but not with reference to the kudkasht land. I think this new plea of an agreement and its effect should not be allowed to be entertained for the first time in second appeal.

Lastly it is contended in argument, though this point is not taken in the grounds of appeal, that the plaintiff has admitted before the partitioning officer that the sir land is held in severalty. The exact words used in the vernacular for the words "held in severalty" do not appear in the deposition. The Revenue Officer recording the deposition must have had present to his mind the distinction drawn in the ruling by the Chief Commissioner between land belonging to a cosharer and land held in severalty by a cosharer in the manner noted in the Revenue Manual. The deposition further says that no land is held in exclusive right by any cosharer in the village. This admission therefore is of no avail to the appellants in the partition proceedings. The sir land did not belong to any cosharer within the meaning of S. 136-L, according to the admission made by the plaintiff. The plaintiff seems to have in his deposition anticipated the very wording of S. 175 of the new Land Revenue Act which gives special privileges to the holder of sir land as his "exclusive" property. Under S. 136-L which corresponds to S. 173 of the new Act, lands held in severalty should be left in the possession of the parties holding the same so far as this is compatible with a fair partition. In this case it is admitted that since 1894-95 the defendants have been holding a larger area of sir land

Judgment.—This case comes before me in second appeal for the third time. In my judgment of 14th December 1914 disposing of Second appeal No. 152 of 1914, I remanded it for a fresh decision by the lower Appellate Court directing that explicit findings should be recorded on two points, namely : (1) Whether the mortgagee Kesho Rao occupied a position enabling him to dominate the will of the mortgagor Akaji ; (2) Whether the terms of the mortgage were unconscionable. Kesho Rao was an Honorary Magistrate at the date (July 1895) of the mortgage. The Subordinate Judge considered that Akaji was shown to be a clever man and declined to believe that the position of Honorary Magistrate gave his creditor any particular influence over him. On the second point the Subordinate Judge did not come to any explicit finding: he did however conclude that the parties dealt at arm's length with full knowledge of the terms of their bargain, that no question of penalty arises and that no equity entitling the defendants to relief exists.

The lower appellate Court duly considered the facts that Kesho Rao besides being member of a Bench of Honorary Magistrates was a local magnate, a Brahman by caste and already a creditor of Akaji. It held that in spite of these advantages Kesho Rao was not in a position to dominate Akaji's will and that the terms of the mortgage were not unconscionable. The defendant Deorao alone has appealed to this Court. It is contended firstly on his behalf that as a matter of law Kesho Rao was necessarily in a position to dominate Akaji's will. Illustration (b) S. 16, Contract Act, is cited as showing that such a question is one of law, not of mere fact. That illustration is worded thus :

"A, a man enfeebled by disease or age, is induced by B's influence over him as his medical attendant, to agree to pay B an unreasonable sum for his professional services. B employs undue influence."

I am unable to see that these words enable me to decide one way or the other on the point whether the question of power to dominate the will of another is one of fact or law. If it be conceded that the question is one of law, then I can only say that I agree with the Courts below. Akaji was himself a malguzar and lived not at Kesho Rao's town (Ashti) but at Lingapur, 5 miles away; he had other creditors and is not shown to have been in any way bound to take a further advance from Kesho Rao, while he was mentally able to look after his own interests. A member of a Bench has no independent power of dealing with complaints; even if he is authorised to sit alone it cannot be presumed that he will deal otherwise than according to law with any complaint brought before him or procure a complaint which the author would not voluntarily prefer. Qua Honorary Magistrate Kesho Rao held no authority over Akaji in the absence of any proceeding against Akaji in his Court and therefore the first branch of sub.S. (2), S. 16, Contract Act, has no application. Illus. (b) to the section is explained by the second branch of the sub-section combined with the first branch : We have there a doctor standing as such in a confidential relation to a patient and the patient permanently affected by age.

Upon the question whether the bargain in the mortgage deed is unconscionable, it is urged for the appellant that no reasonable man could possibly contemplate the accumulation of debt a hundredfold in 21 years, much less in 12. The mortgage provides the security of 22.35 acres of land and grain is commonly advanced without any security at all. Now as to the value of the security no evidence has been given. Nearly half the area mortgaged consists of an ordinary holding, which is of course unsaleable. Again, compound dethi the rate which causes a debt to increase a hundredfold in 12 years, applies in the present case to a principal quantity of less than 2½ kuras worth only Rs. 3.5-9, and no sort of explanation is vouchsafed of the failure to return the trifling quantity of under 4 kuras at the ensuing harvest. As to the stipulation for compound sawai which applies to the great bulk of grain, we have here a very ordinary agreement recognised by the general practice of the country based on the well known fact that while grain is dear at sowing time it is much cheaper at harvest. A bargain is unconscionable where it is such as no man in his senses and not under delusion would make on the one hand and as no honest and fair man would accept on the other : see Debi Dass v. Hanmat Singh (1). This definition is certainly not satisfied by a case where long delay in payment brings about a position where discharge of the debt is impossible, the debtor being like Akaji a man of intelligence. Such a man can by a simple enough calculation arrive at the position which will result if for several years he makes no repayments : if Akaji is incapable of making such a calculation, one would expect to find that the appellant examined him in order to establish this point, whereas Akaji was not made a witness by any party at any stage of the trial.

The respondents contend and, in my opinion, correctly contend, that the question whether a particular bargain is unconscionable or not is one of fact, not of law. In Dhanipal Das v. Maneshwar Bakhsh Singh (2) their Lordships of the Privy Council had to deal with the concurrent findings of the Courts below that a bargain was unconscionable and said :

"Their Lordships are not disposed to differ from a concurrent finding of the Courts below, even if it be not strictly a finding of fact."

I do not regard this statement as indicating that the question considered was one of law and in this connexion would refer to Pestonji Mancherji Mody v. Queen Insurance Co. (3), where their Lordships had to deal with an issue whether the defendant had reasonable and probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution. The judgment (p. 336) contains the following passage :

"It is quite true that according to English law it is for the Judge and not for the jury to determine what is reasonable and probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution. The jury finds the facts. The Judge draws the proper inference from the findings of the jury. In that sense there is a question of law. But where the case is tried without a jury, there is really nothing but a question of fact and a question of fact to be determined by one and the same person."

In England under the Money-lenders Act, 1900, it is for the Judge to decide whether the evidence shows "that the interest charged in respect of the sum actually lent is excessive, or that the amounts charged for expenses, injuries, fines, bonus, premium, renewals or any other charges are excessive, and that, in either case, the transaction is harsh and unconscionable or is otherwise such that a Court of equity would give relief;" see Abramson v. Bromwich (4), a decision by the Court of appeal.

But this view was rested on the wording of the Act (S. 1). In India the question whether a particular stipulation in a contract amounts to a penalty is one of fact rather than of law : see Bhagwant Almaram v. Ganpati Choudhure Kanbi (5), and to my mind the character of a particular bargain as a whole stands on a very similar level. I hold then that I cannot interfere with the finding of the lower appellate Court that the bargain is not unconscionable and further agree with that Court in its conclusion on the matter. The third contention advanced for the appellant relates to the increase in the amount decreed by the trial Judge, as the result of the re-trial ordered by the lower appellate Court. It is said that the Judge was incompetent to allow more than the first decree gave. Some increase, however, was inevitable, inasmuch as the dates fixed for payment by the two decrees are separated by 2½ years and the earlier decree allowed interest to the date which it fixed. Apart from this source of difference due to the action of the appellant himself, there is the fact that the second decision allowed higher money values for the grain than the first and in my judgment in Second Appeal No. 152 of 1914 I held that it was no longer open to the appellant to object to this result. This contention therefore must fail.

Lastly it is urged that the lower appellate Court should have treated the stipulation for compound interest at derhi on linseed and sawai on other grain as a penal one. The trial Judge disallowed a contention to this effect and his decision was not questioned at the hearing of the first appeal therefrom. Moreover, the case relied on here for the appellant, Dinanath Bihari Lal v. Dharmola (6), is no authority for interference, inasmuch as there the debtor was precluded from repaying till ten years had elapsed from the date of the loan. As already remarked, the question whether a particular stipulation constitutes a penalty or not is one of fact rather than one of law; it cannot therefore be raised here if not pressed in the lower appellate Court. The appellant has no intention of redeeming, so it is unnecessary to alter the date fixed for payment. The appeal is dismissed with costs. In the lower Courts costs will be paid as already ordered.

Second Appeal No. 246 of 1917, Decided on 16th August 1918, from decision of Dist. Judge, Chhindwara, in Civil Suit No. 156 of 1914.

(a) C. P. Tenancy Act (11 of 1898), S. 94—Ejectment under authority of landlord—S. 94 applies.

An occupancy tenant is not entitled to sell his rights in his holding or any portion thereof. The intervention of landlord is essential to the creation of rights in favour of purchasers. The transaction is a surrender to the landlord followed by a lease to the purchasers. [P 85 C 1]

When a tenant surrendered his part of holding in favour of landlord but through mistake excess of land was delivered to landlord who leased out

(b) Adverse Possession—Possession under mistake — Intentional possession, though innocent, is nevertheless adverse.

P. S. Kotwal—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The plaintiffs were occupancy tenants of field Nos. 386 area 48.69 acres and 387 area 3.18 acres. The rent of two fields which form a single holding was Rs. 37. On 29th April 1902 they surrendered part of the holding to the malguzar who on the same day executed a lease in favour of the defendants of the surrendered portion. In the surrender deed (Ex. P-5) and the lease (Ex. P-6) the area surrendered is described as 26 acres and the rent Rs. 18.8.0. As this area was approximately half of the total area and the rent was half, it was held in Second Appeal No. 364 of 1915 that the intention of the parties was to effect a surrender of half the holding. It has now been found that the plaintiffs are in possession of 20.93 acres and the defendants of 30.84 acres. The plaintiffs have been given a decree for possession of 5.07 acres.

The plaintiff alleged a subsequent encroachment by the defendants but this statement was modified in the course of the pleadings. There is a dhura running east to west and dividing the field into two portions. The plaintiffs admit that the possession of the plot lying north of the dhura was given up, as the plaintiffs were told by the patwari that the area of the plot was 26 acres. The mistake is said to have been discovered five years before the date of the suit. The suit itself was instituted just before the expiry of 12 years from the date of surrender. It is contended in appeal that the suit is barred by S. 94, Tenancy Act. That section runs as follows:

"The period of limitation for a suit instituted by a tenant other than an absolute occupancy tenant to recover possession of land from which he has been ejected shall be two years from the date on which he is ejected."

It has been held in Sonsa Chamar v. Puran Singh Rajput (1) and Dinaban-

dhu v. Dukhu Mirdha (2) that the special period of limitation applies where the dispossession is by the landlord or by some one acting under his authority. It is contended that the transaction between the plaintiffs and defendants was one of sale made through the instrumentality of the landlord, and therefore S. 94 does not apply. But an occupancy tenant is not entitled to sell his right in his holding or in any portion thereof. He can however surrender, subject to certain claims by his heirs within two years made before a revenue officer. No doubt, the consideration for the transaction was paid by the defendants, but S. 46, Tenancy Act prohibits the registration of documents transferring occupancy rights. There could be therefore no sale by the defendants. The intervention of the landlord was essential to the creation of rights in favour of the defendants. We must therefore regard the transaction as a surrender to the landlord followed by a lease to the defendants, and this was the form in which the transaction was embodied. If there was an ejectment within the meaning of S. 94, then I think it is clear that the ejectment was under the authority of the landlord within the meaning of the rulings I have already cited.

The plaintiffs respondents rely upon Ganpat v. Trimbak (3) and argue that the use of force is essential to constitute an ejectment. What was actually decided in the case was that a voluntary surrender was not an ejectment by the landlord. In the present case the plaintiffs intended to surrender 26 acres of land, but by mistake put the landlord in possession of a plot which has now been found to be about 30 acres: Ganpat v. Trimbak (3) is therefore no authority for holding that there was no dispossession, in the eye of the law as regards the excess land put in the possession of the landlord: Ganpat v. Trimbak (3) was considered in Mt. Amba v. Sheoram (4) where Batten, A.J.C., says:

"Ejectment in S. 94 means a dispossession, that is to say, a loss of possession through some act of the defendant which was a taking of possession with the intention of excluding the plaintiff."

The landlord and the defendants when they took possession of the plot lying to the north of the dhura certainly intended to exclude the plaintiffs from that land, though possession was delivered of part of the land through a mistake as regards the area of the plot. The plaintiffs must be deemed to have been dispossessed from the five acres which they are now claiming, from the date of surrender, as the landlord and the defendants intended to exclude the plaintiffs from the whole of that plot. It is urged that as the defendant's entry was with the consent of the plaintiffs, the former's possession is not adverse. The following passage from the judgment of Jenkins, C. J., in Dwarkanath Choudhury v. Shastri Kinkar Banerjee (5) (at p. 602), furnishes a complete answer to this argument:

"The test is whether the person, who sets up adverse possession, is able to show that he held for himself and if he did so, the mere fact that there was acquiescence or consent on the part of the other person concerned can, in circumstances like the present, make no difference."

I am indebted to Mr. Rustomji's valuable book on the law of limitation for an extract from an American Report. In Pearce v. French (Wood, Edn. 1, p. 513) Hosmer, C. J., is reported to have said:

"The intention of the possessor to claim adversely is no doubt an essential ingredient. But the person who enters on land believing and claiming it to be his own, does thus enter and possess. The very nature of the act is an assertion of his own title and the denial of the title of all others. It matters not that the possessor was mistaken, and had he been better informed, would not have entered on the land. In the case Ross v. Gould it is said: A disseisin (i. e., dispossession) cannot be committed by mistake because the intention of the possessor to claim adversely is an essential ingredient in disseisin. I do not admit the principle. It is as certain that a disseisin may be committed by mistake as that a man may by mistake take possession of land, claiming title, and believing it to be his own. The possession is not the less adverse because the person possessed intentionally, though innocently. Adopt the rule that an entry and possession under or right, if through mistake, does not constitute an adverse possession, and a new principle is whether visible possession with the intent to possess, under a claim of right, and to use and enjoy as one's own, is a disseisin; but from this plain and easy standard of proof we are to depart, and the invisible motives of the mind are to be explored; and the inquiry is to be had whether the possessor of land acted in conformity with his best knowledge and belief."

To the same effect is the judgment of Lord Romilly, M. B., in Williams v. Pott (6). I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs' suit is barred by S. 94, Tenancy Act. The result is that the decree of the lower appellate Court dated 6th March 1917 is set aside and in lieu thereof the previous decree of that Court dated 4th February 1915 dismissing the plaintiff's suit is restored. Judgment.—The plaintiff as assignee of one Kashi claims Rs. 180 (one hundred and eighty) as rent for two fields leased by Kashi to the defendants. After entering into possession the defendants were dispossessed towards the end of July by one Malang who is the lessee of Kashi's step-mother Ahelai. It is conceded that the mother was a preferential heir to the daughter. Therefore Malang had a right to possession of the field and lawfully dispossessed the defendants. Under these circumstances it is somewhat impudent on the part of the plaintiff to come and claim rent for the same year plaintiff's assignor having no title to the land. I am inclined to think that upon a true construction of the lease there is a covenant against the very disturbance that had taken place. The mother and the daughter were fighting and the disturbance spoken of clearly refers to a disturbance by persons acting on behalf of the mother. On this ground the suit may be dismissed.

The case of Gopabund Jha v. Lalla Gobind Pershad (1), is authority for the view and, if a lessee is evicted by a title paramount, he is not liable to pay the rent. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

(a) C. P. Tenancy Act (11 of 1898), S. 35 (4)—Implied surrender—Knowledge of landlord is necessary.

There can be no implied surrender under S. 35 (4) without the knowledge and intervention of the landlord. [P 86 C 2]

(b) Evidence Act (1872), S. 114—Joint tenants—Payment of rent by one raises no presumption of sole tenancy.

Where a holding is in the name of an uncle and his minor nephews, there is no presumption that the rent paid by the uncle is paid on his sole behalf and not on account of his nephews also, especially where the nephews continue as the recorded tenants. [P 87 C 1]

W. R. Puranik—for Appellants.J. C. Ghosh—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The Additional District Judge remanded the case for fuller pleadings on the subject of implied surrender. The pleadings of the defendant on that point do not really raise a case of implied surrender. There can be no implied surrender under S. 35 (4), Tenancy Act, without the knowledge and intervention of the landlord. In this case there is no plea and no evidence that the landlord accepted the defendant Munni as his sole tenant in place of the original tenants who were Munni and his nephews, the plaintiffs, through their mother. This case is to be distinguished from Second Appeal No. 56 of 1910 relied on by the Additional District Judge, for in that case Suka had never been recorded as a tenant whereas in the present case first their mother Mt. Amriti and after her death the plaintiffs have always been recorded as joint tenants, with the defendant, of the holding. There is no evidence that the landlord ever recognized Munni as the sole tenant and the presumption is to the contrary, since the plaintiffs have all along up to the date of the suit been recorded as joint tenants. The Additional District Judge has held that the plaintiffs' mother did not abandon the holding when she left it to go to a neighbouring village and that apart from the special provisions of S. 35 (4) the defendant had failed to prove that he held the land adversely to the plaintiffs. To prove that he was paying the rent entirely for himself and not on behalf of himself and his nephews would require the same evidence with reference to S. 35(4) as it would if it were a question of non-tenancy land. The Additional District Judge himself has held that it is not proved that Mt. Amriti abandoned the holding when she left the village.

This being so, and the presumption being that the plaintiffs are still the tenants since they are recorded tenants, it lay on the defendant to plead and prove circumstances under which an implied surrender can be presumed. He has neither pleaded nor proved any such circumstances. When a holding is in the name of an uncle and two minor nephews, there is certainly no presumption that the rent paid by the uncle is paid on his own sole behalf and not on account of his nephews also, specially when, as here, the nephews are still the recorded tenants. The Additional District Judge has decided the case on an erroneous view of the law and on his own findings on the facts he has decided the case wrongly. I set aside the judgment and decree of the lower appellate Court and restore the judgment and decree of the first Court, dated 9th September 1911, with this modification that the defendant do also pay the plaintiffs' costs in all Courts.

G. S. Khaparde, S. K. Barlingay and G. V. Deshmukh—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The two plaintiffs and defendant 3 are the sons of the deceased Balaji. The contesting defendants 1 and 2 are Balaji's cousins. The main point in controversy between the parties was whether at a partition in 1890 the fields in dispute fell to the share of Balaji or to the share of defendants 1 and 2. This question has been decided by the Courts below against the defendant-appellant, and it is conceded that this has now become a finding of fact which can no longer be impeached in second appeal. Two points are argued before me: neither of them seems to have been raised in the Courts below. In 1912 there was a partition amongst the sons of Balaji. The fields in dispute were not divided at the time as they were in the possession of defendants 1 and 2, and in para. 7 of the plaint it is stated that these fields still form the joint coparcenary property of the plaintiffs and defendant 3. As defendant 3 declined to be joined as plaintiff he was made a defendant. The case went ex parte against defendant 3. The only reply to para. 7 of the plaint made by the other defendants is to be found in paras. 16 and 17 of their written statement dated 29th September 1916.

The written statement points out that the partition deed is silent as regards these fields and calls upon the plaintiffs to show how they claim these fields to be their property. There was no specific issue framed upon this allegation. It is however argued now that the plaintiffs must show their title to the land. This is perfectly correct. The plaintiffs prove their title by showing that it fell to their father's share in 1890. They also prove constructive possession through the Collector's lessee up to 1907. The other point urged before me is that the plaintiffs are entitled only to a two-thirds share of the fields on the ground that defendant 3, when examined as a witness, stated his belief that the fields did not belong to Balaji, and that his branch of the family has not been in possession to his knowledge. The latter statement is correct, for it was leased by the Collector in execution of a decree against the father. The first is a question of opinion, and this defendant was only eleven years old at the time of the partition of 1890. I cannot regard this as a disclaimer of title.

Moreover the question cannot be dealt with as an abstract proposition of law. Facts will have to be investigated before it can be decided whether the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree for the whole of the fields or only to a two-thirds share therein. The point not having been raised in the Courts below and the appellant not being entitled to a remand, the plea is overruled. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—In this case the allegations of the plaintiff are that the registration of the document (deed of gift) was obtained by false recitals therein, to the effect that the donees were persons entitled to inherit the occupancy holding. The learned District Judge has held, relying on the head-note in Ganesh Das v. Shankar (1), that the civil Courts have no jurisdiction. The case before the learned A. J. C., was one in which registration was effected by inadvertence, after the Tenancy Act, 1898, came into force. The learned District Judge has overlooked the remarks of Stanyon, A. J. C., in the body of the ruling that he agrees with the head-note in Baji Vithal v. Moreswar Venkatesh (2), that if owing to fraud, that is to say, owing to false recitals in a document tendered for registration under S. 46 (5), Tenancy Act, the Registering Officer has been deceived into registering a document which under that sub-section he is not empowered to register, the document must be regarded as not registered and is not effective for the purposes for which it is created. False recitals in a deed undoubtedly amount to fraud. If the recitals in the deed of gift, which induced the Sub-Registrar to register it, are false, the jurisdiction of the civil Courts is not barred. The appeal is remanded for further trial with reference to the above remarks. Costs will be costs in the suit. There will be a refund certificate.

*G. L. Subhedar—*for Appellant.*M. R. Dixit—*for Respondent.

Judgment.—This judgment disposes of Miscellaneous Appeals Nos. 3 and 4 of 1917. Seth Nannalal is the appellant in the first case and Gowrishanker in the second. Both cases arise out of an insolvency case No. 4 of 1913, in which Seth Hiralal has been adjudicated an insolvent. The application for insolvency was presented on 17th March 1913 and the adjudication actually made on 21st June 1913. Under S. 16, Cl. (2)(vii), the order of adjudication relates back and takes effect from the date of presentation of the petition on which it is made. The debts were held proved and entered in the schedule. Then on 24th June 1916 a petition was filed by the insolvent which was disposed of by the order under appeal. It is to the effect that all debts except one due to the friends' mission were time barred. It is argued that this is not the case, the lower Court having taken the days of the decree passed by the first Court in all three instances and failed to see that time should count from the last appellate decree. Seth Nanhelal's decree in the case No. 34 is dated 23rd January 1901. From the Civil Court Register Creditor's Ex. 46, it appears that the first appeal to the Court of the District Judge was decided on 24th June 1901 and then a second appeal was filed. The date of its disposal is not given; but it must have been subsequent to 24th June 1901. The date of the adjudication must be held to be 17th March 1913. It is clearly within 12 years and not time barred. Seth Nanhelal's second case No. 35 was disposed of in the original Court on 28th January 1901 and the appeal to the Divisional Judge was disposed of on 24th June 1901 and the second appeal in this Court on 23rd September 1901. This is within 12 years of the date of adjudication.

Gourishanker's case, No. 39 of 1899, see (Ex. 45), was disposed of by the first Court on 26th December 1900. The appeal to the Divisional Judge was disposed of on 15th May 1901 and a second appeal was apparently filed to this Court but its date of disposal has not been given. In any case 15th May 1901 is within 12 years of 17th March 1913 and therefore this decree was not time barred for the purpose of the insolvency suit. The correctness of these dates is not denied by the respondent and their learned counsel frankly admits that the order of the District Judge appealed from cannot be sustained. A further argument is that the District Judge had no power under S. 26, Provincial Insolvency Act, to entertain solvency petition. The question is only of an academic interest, as it is clear that the order is wrong on the facts. But I think the argument is sound as a debtor can apply only when there is a composition or scheme. In the present case there is neither. In this case a receiver was appointed and in fact two dividends were paid to the appellants. I set aside the order expunging the three debts from the schedule and direct that they be restored thereto. These two appeals are decreed with costs. I fix pleader's fee in each case at Rs. 15.

Second Appeal No. 458-B of 1916, Decided on 7th September 1917, against judgment and decree of Dist. Judge, Akola, D. 3rd August 1916.

Mesne profits—Profits which can be claimed are those that wrongful holder might have obtained with due diligence.

Where the person dispossessed by a trespasser is himself ordinarily a cultivator of the land in dispute, the profits to which he is entitled are those that the wrongful holder might have obtained by actual cultivation with due diligence. It is not open to a trespasser to dispossess an actual cultivator, and then to sub-let the land trespassed upon to some third person, and claim to compensate the rightful occupant only to the extent of what he may have obtained by the sub-letting. [P 89 C 1]

Judgment.—I do not see any reason for interference in this case. I think the judgment of the lower appellate Court has not been properly understood. The learned District Judge does not hold any point in this case to be res judicata by reason of the judgment in the former suit by his predecessor. He has applied a perfectly correct principle in calculating mesne profits, namely, that where the person dispossessed by a trespasser is himself, ordinarily, a cultivator of the land in dispute, the profits to which he is entitled are those that the wrongful holder might have obtained by actual cultivation with due diligence. It is not open to a trespasser to dispossess an actual cultivator, and then to sub-let the land trespassed upon to some third person, and claim to compensate the rightful occupant only to the extent of what he may have obtained by the sub-letting. In this case the plaintiffs are admittedly owners of an occupancy right in unalien-

nated land, and by caste they are Kunbis, and therefore cultivation is their hereditary occupation. It has not been seriously disputed in the Courts below, and there is plenty of evidence for holding, that they are actual cultivators of the land whereof the defendant had wrongfully dispossessed them. Under these circumstances the mode of assessing damages adopted by the lower appellate Court is correct. The quantum of damages has been arrived at in a somewhat summary way but there is the evidence of P. W. 2 to sustain it. The land measures 32 acres and it has not been disputed that 32 acres are equivalent to 8 tiffans. P. W. 2 deposed that one tiffan produces 3 or 4 khandis of cotton. The Court has taken the figure as 3 khandis. The same witness deposed, and he stands uncontradicted, that during the year for which profits are claimed, cotton sold at Rs. 81 per khandi. In that way the Judge finds the value of the produce to be Rs. 1,944. He has made a reasonable allowance towards the cost of cultivation and deducted the Government assessment. In that way he arrived at Rs. 1,178 as the plaintiffs' share. Of this the plaintiffs had claimed only Rs. 400 in appeal and the Judge gave them a decree for that sum only over and above the decree of the first Court. Under these circumstances the judgment of the lower appellate Court is properly valid and I dismiss this appeal with costs.

Judgment.—One Nandram died leaving a widow Mt. Rukhma and two daughters Lungi and Mungi. Rukhma died in 1903. Lungi in 1908 and Mungi in 1914.

The plaintiff is the husband of Lungi and claims possession of half share of the property left by Nandram. The defendants relied upon a gift and will which have been held not proved. The lower appellate Court in view of certain statements made upon the death of Rukhma in the mutation proceedings framed an issue, whether Mungi, the younger daughter, was unmarried at Rukhma's death. The parties were asked whether they wished to give any further evidence, and they declined. The lower appellate Court found that Mungi was unmarried at the time of Rukhma's death, and therefore she excluded Lungi who was married. In support of this view the learned Additional District Judge relies upon Jamnabai v. Khimji Vullubdas (1). The plaintiff's suit has been dismissed upon this view. In second appeal it is contended that the lower Court was not justified in making out a new case in appeal. I am unable to agree with this. The lower appellate Court had the power to do so, and the plaintiff cannot be said to have been prejudiced as he was given a chance of giving further evidence upon the issue framed by the appellate Court.

Next it is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that Mungi was unmarried at the death of Rukhma. The evidence of the plaintiff examined as a witness clearly proves this fact, and it is also in accordance with the inference to be drawn from a statement made by the deceased Lungi in 1903 before the Revenue Officer. I must therefore accept the findings arrived by the lower appellate Court. Upon the question of law the learned counsel for the appellant says as Mungi was married at the plaintiff's expense, she cannot exclude her elder sister, the plaintiff's wife, from succession. The argument has no force whatever. The view taken by the Additional District Judge is supported by the ruling cited, and I have been shown no case in which a contrary view has been taken. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Second Appeal No. 408-B of 1916, Decided on 17th March 1917, from decree of Dist. Judge, Amraoti, D/- 31st August 1915.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 11—Appeal does not lie merely on ground that unfavourable observations are made against person in whose favour decree is passed—Opinion of Court in such appeal cannot operate as res judicata.

No appeal lies from a decree merely on the ground that certain observations made in the judgment of the Court below are unfavourable to the person in whose favour the decree is passed. An opinion of the appellate Court in the course of a judgment in such an appeal cannot operate as res judicata when in point of law, no appeal lay and the Court had no power to adjudicate on the rights of the parties on an appeal from such a decree. [P 91 C 2, P 92 B 1]

(b) Berar Land Revenue Code (1896), Ss. 78 and 79—Notice under S. 78 not acted upon for one year—Fresh notice under S. 79 is not necessary.

If a notice has been duly served under S. 78, then in the absence of waiver the person served is not entitled to a fresh notice under S. 79 merely because more than one year has elapsed since the time when in accordance with the notice the tenant should have vacated the land. [P 92 C 1]

(c) Berar Land Revenue Code (1896), S. 78—Enhancement can be decreed only if Court deems it reasonable.

Section 78, sub-Ss. (4) and (5), are not restricted to the tenancies mentioned in sub-S. (2) of that section, but the enhancement contemplated therein can be decreed only if in the judgment of the Court it be just and reasonable: 2 I. C. 990 and S. A. No. 22; D. of 1919, Foll. [P 92 C 2]

(d) Berar Land Revenue Code (1896), Ss. 78 and 79—Notice to quit under S. 79 unconditionally determines tenancy—Non-compliance with notice under S. 78 (8) does not have that effect.

A notice to quit under S. 79 unconditionally determines the tenancy, but a notice under S. 78 (8), if not complied with is not intended to have that effect inasmuch as the tenant has a right to appeal to the Court for a decision as to whether in its opinion the enhancement is just and reasonable. (e) Berar Land Revenue Code (1896), Ss. 78 and 79—Eviction of tenant for not paying enhanced rent.

G. P. Dick—for Appellant.

S. B. Tambe—for Respondents.

Judgment.—This is a suit by the inam certificate holder of a Jagir for ejection of certain tenants, on the ground that notwithstanding a notice issued under S. 78, Berar Land Revenue Code, they have refused to agree to pay the enhanced rent or to vacate the fields. One Tanba was the original tenant of these fields. In this second appeal we are however concerned with one of the fields, field No. 18. It appears from the plaint that Tanba held this field from the year 1869. The rent for this field according to the plaintiff was Rs. 39 and it was sought to have it enhanced to Rs. 50. Defendant 1, who is the appellant before me, purchased from the original tenant this field on 10th January 1910, the notice under S. 78 of the Land Revenue Code having been served on the original tenant on 25th September 1909. Various pleas were raised in the case and so far as they are material, they will be apparent from my judgment when I deal with each of the grounds of this second appeal. It is urged that Tanba was an ante Jagir tenant of field No. 18 and some reference is made to a previous judgment in which an opinion to that effect was expressed by Mr. Obbard, the Civil Judge and Sessions Judge, H. A. D., an opinion which seems to have been confirmed by the then Judicial Commissioner. The plaintiff had fixed a definite time, namely, 1869, as the commencement of Tanba's tenancy. The defendants never pleaded that they were ante Jagir tenants. All that they said was that the field had been in their possession for 40 or 50 years.

The utmost that can be said on that plea is that their possession commenced from 1862, but we find that the Inam investigating officers were making inquiries about the same period and found that the Jagir was in the Jagirdar's family for three generations at least. Under the circumstances, it will be useless allowing the appellant leave to advance a fresh plea of a character inconsistent with the pleas raised in the first Court. I ought to notice that although Mr. Obbard expressed an opinion that this particular field was ante-Jagir yet the decree was entirely in favour of the Jagirdar, for he apparently allowed the entire rent claimed. The Jagirdar had filed a second appeal, though in point of law, no such appeal lay from the decree merely on the ground that certain observations made in the judgment of the Court below were unfavourable to the person in whose favour the decree was passed. The appeal was however entertained and the opinion of the lower Court upheld, but I cannot regard the opinion in such a case as operating by way of res judicata when in point of law no appeal lay and the Court had no power to adjudicate on the rights of the parties on an appeal from such a decree.

I have already mentioned that the appellant purchased the field a few months after the notice was given to his predecessor under S. 78. It is contended before me that the appellant, although bound by the notice under S. 78, was entitled to a further notice under S. 79 of the same Code. It is urged that the Jagirdar having waited for more than one year must be deemed to have allowed the tenants to hold on. I see however no force in this argument. There was no waiver of the notice inasmuch as no rent was accepted, nor was the possession of the transferee in any manner recognized by the Jagirdar. If notice has been duly served under S. 78, the person so served or his transferee is not entitled to a fresh notice under S. 79 merely because more than a year had elapsed since the time when in accordance with the notice, the tenants should have vacated the land. It is next contended that the plaintiff Jagirdar alone cannot sue inasmuch as there are some members of the family who are opposed to the ejectment and the enhancement of rent. All the defendants who are hostile to the Jagirdar are however bound by a deed executed by themselves or by their predecessor-in title in the year 1887, under which the plaintiff was to have the sole management of the Jagir and the other cosharers are only to receive their share of the profits from the plaintiff. Having entered into a solemn agreement as regards the management of the village, it is not open to any cosharers arbitrarily to dispute the plaintiff's authority until they can again come to a fresh arrangement for the management of the village. I hold therefore that the plaintiff is entitled to maintain the suit.

There remains for me to consider whether the appellant is entitled to be relieved against forfeiture for non-payment of rent. The way in which the appellant has put his case before me is unsound. S. 114, T. P. Act., which now applies to Berar, refers to forfeiture for non-payment of rent, that is to say, it refers to forfeiture already incurred under the terms of a lease. In the present case there is no such lease providing for forfeiture for non-payment of rent. Moreover, the rent for non-payment of which the forfeiture takes place is a rent already fixed and agreed upon between the parties. Although S. 114, T. P. Act, therefore does not apply to the present case, yet I have to consider whether the Courts below are justified in passing an unconditional decree for ejectment against the defendant. The plaintiff issued a notice under sub-S. 8, S. 78, Berar Land Revenue Code. In Maruti v. Jagannath (1) and Ramya v. Krishna (2), the view taken was that S. 78, sub-Cls. 8 and 4, are not restricted to tenancies mentioned in sub-Cl. 2 of the said section. This view commends itself to me. Sub-Cl. 4 says:

"Nothing contained in this section shall affect the right of the landlord to enhance the rent etc."

If it were intended to limit sub-S. 4 to cases contemplated by sub-S. 2, the wording would have been "nothing contained in sub-S. 3 shall affect the right of the landlord to enhance the rent." It is therefore unnecessary to say whether the appellants' predecessor was a tenant of antiquity within the meaning of sub-S. (2). Now the plaintiffs' own case is that he was entitled to enhancement of the rent apparently by virtue of usage, and for that purpose he was entitled to issue a notice through a Revenue Officer under sub-S. 8. The enhancement however can only be decreed if in the judgment of the Court it be just and reasonable [see sub-S. (4)]. The Berar Land Revenue Code, sub-S. (1), seems to recognize a customary right to just and reasonable enhancement of rent and lays down a procedure for its enforcement. The first Court has found that it is just and reasonable that the former rent of Rs. 39 should be enhanced to Rs. 50. Then comes the question what should have been the nature of the plaintiff's suit and the form of the decree? It cannot be said that the rent was duly enhanced the moment the notice was served through the Tahsildar. It was determined to be just and reasonable only by the decision of the Court. To my mind the decree contemplated by sub-S. 4 is a decree directing the defendant to pay the rent and in default of payment to give up possession.

(1) [1909] 5 N. L. R. 10 = 2 I. C. 995.

(2) S. A. No. 229-B of 19

A notice to quit under S. 79 unconditionally determined the tenancy. But the Code does not say that a notice under S. 78 (8), if not complied with has any such effect. Appx. 17 to the rules framed by the Local Government gives a form of notice under S. 78 (8). It no doubt asks the tenant to vacate the land in the event of his not consenting to pay the enhanced rent. But the tenant has a right to appeal to the Court as to whether in its judgment the enhancement claimed is just and reasonable. Could it have been the intention of the legislature to determine the tenancy on non-compliance with the notice subject to a future adjudication as to whether the enhancement is just and reasonable? Such a conditional determination of the tenancy is unknown to the ordinary law. In the absence of express words to that effect, I would hesitate to adopt such a construction which leads to manifest injustice for the tenant is punished for an error of judgment as to what is just and reasonable enhancement. The tenant's silence is consistent with an agreement to pay the enhanced rent, if determined to be just and reasonable by the Court. The conclusion to which I come is that the tenant is to be evicted for not paying the enhanced rent after it has been determined to be just and reasonable by the Court. I now pass the decree which the lower Court should have passed. The decrees of the Courts below are set aside so far as the defendant-appellant is concerned and in lieu thereof the defendant is directed to pay Rs. 50 as the rent for the year in suit within three months or in default to deliver possession of field S. No. 18 to the plaintiff. The ejection of the defendant will not prevent the plaintiff from recovering Rs. 50 from the defendant. The defendant will also pay the plaintiff's costs in all Courts.

G. V. Deshmukh—for Opposite Party.

Order.—The facts are correctly given in the application for revision and. I have no doubt that the order of the lower Court discloses material irregularity of the kind contemplated by S. 115, Civil P. C., 1908, and must be set aside. The plaintiff sues for a plot of land which he described in his plaint by reference to its area and boundaries. The suit was filed on 13th February 1914. The trial proceeded for a year and after nine hearings the plaint was returned for amendment on 25th February 1915. It was re-presented after amendment on 15th April 1915. Two more hearings followed and then on 23rd July 1915 a further amendment of the plaint was allowed. Such was the procedure that issues were not framed until 1st October 1915 or over 19 months after the institution of the suit. Documentary evidence was filed and 7th January 1916 was fixed for oral evidence. Thereafter six more hearings took place and all the evidence tendered by both parties having been taken both sides closed their cases on 20th November 1916 and 23rd of that month was fixed for delivery of judgment. But on that date the plaintiff presented an application asking for permission under O. 23, R. 1, to withdraw the suit with permission to institute a fresh suit upon the same cause of action. The material part of that application has been translated thus:

"A mistake has been made in prosecuting this suit. There is an error in the description of the site and in the map also. Therefore permission may be given to withdraw this suit and bring a fresh suit."

The Sub-Judge wrote thus in his order-sheet:

"Plaintiff has filed an application for withdrawing the suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit on the ground that the plaint was not properly drafted and there are formal defects. Mr. (illegible) opposes the application.

"I have gone through the plaint pleadings and evidence and I am satisfied that plaintiff is likely to fail on account of a good many formal defects in drafting the plaint. Under the above circumstances I allow his application. He will pay the defendant's costs."

The Sub Judge also wrote a separate order in these words:

"The plaintiff has been allowed to withdraw the suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit on the same cause of action as owing to bad drafting of the plaint and several formal defects in its frame he is likely to fail. Plaintiff shall pay the defendant's costs."

There were no less than 15 defendants in the plaint as amended and Pandu or Pundalik the son of Narayan was the 15th of them. He has applied to revise the order. It is quite impossible to maintain that order; prima facie a most unwarrantable use of the power to allow withdrawal with leave to bring a fresh suit seems to have been made. The learned Judge having studied the plaint, pleadings and evidence found that the plaintiff was likely to fail. That looks like an opinion based on the merits of the case. It offered no ground for any order under O. 23, R. 1. A mere use of the terms contained in that enactment is not sufficient. Neither the application to withdraw nor the orders of the Judge thereon specify the "formal defects" referred to. I asked the learned counsel for the non-applicant before me to point them out and he could not or at any rate did not do so. A plaintiff who has misunderstood his case is not entitled on that ground to be allowed to harass the opposite party again. If he wishes to obtain an order under O. 23, R. 1, he must specify the formal defect or other ground on which his application is based and the Court must show by its order the facts which make the provision as to withdrawal applicable. A mere general statement that there are formal defects is not sufficient. Here the case went on for nearly three years there were two amendments of the plaint and the case was tried out to a finish. Then the plaintiff discovered that he had fought his case badly and was likely to lose. He therefore applied to withdraw with leave to begin the whole fight all over again and the Court having formed an opinion on the merits adverse to the plaintiff allowed a withdrawal without any specification of the facts which went to constitute the alleged formal defects. This was an artificial disposal of a fully tried out case and an arbitrary and capricious exercise of discretion.

The order for withdrawal of the suit is set aside and the Court concerned is directed to dispose of the suit according to law. The Court will still have power to allow withdrawal on proper grounds but those grounds must be stated in detail by the applicant and found by the Court which must show in what way they bring the case within O. 23, R. 1. The non-applicant must pay costs here. I allow one sovereign pleader's fee.

A mere deposit of process fees will not suffice to give a fresh start for the computation of limitation. Judgment.—The lower Courts have concurred in holding that the respondent's application for execution filed on 13th November 1913 is not time barred and the judgment-debtors have appealed. The decree of which execution is sought was passed on 26th September 1910. Certain property had been attached before judgement and on 8th October 1910 sale of certain moveables was ordered. Some delay occurred because one of the articles to be sold was a locked safe which the Court desired to have opened in the presence of the judgment-debtors. On the 14th November following, the safe was broken open in Court, the judgment-debtors having failed to attend in response to notices. The following order was then recorded:

"Proclamation for sale of the property including the open safe be issued. Sale on 6-12-10. Report on 10-12-10."

The next day the decree-holders put in what is known as a talhana parcha the material part of which has been translated as follows:

"Process fee in the shape of Court-labels worth Re. 1 is herewith paid for auction sale of the moveable property of the defendants mentioned above on behalf of the plaintiff."

On the 18th November the Court passed on this parcha an order which has been translated thus: "Let proclamation be issued." In the executing Court it was urged on behalf of the judgment-debtors on the strength of Sheo Prasad v. Indar Bahadur Singh (1) that the parcha is a mere memorandum of the deposit of the process fee and as such cannot amount to a step in aid of execution for the purposes of Cl. (5) in Art. 182, of the Limitation Schedule. Both the Courts below however have followed the decision of Banerjee and Rampini, JJ., in Norendra Nath v. Bhupendra Narain (2) which the lower appellate Court seems to have regarded as laying down that mere payment of process fee for service of the sale proclamation necessarily includes an application to take some step-in-aid of execution. In this Court it is urged that the parcha of 15th November 1910 represents no more than a mere deposit of process-fee, the order to issue proclamation of sale having been passed the previous day. It is also urged that R. 66 (3), O. 21, Sec. 1, Civil P.C., requires an application for an order for sale to be accompanied by a statement signed and verified in a certain manner and giving certain particulars, whereas no such statement can be found in the proceedings of 1910. It seems to be clear on the authorities that a mere deposit of process fee will not suffice to give a fresh start for the computation of limitation. Any fresh start is taken from the date of some application and the real question in each case where no written application is forthcoming appears to be whether the making of an application may fairly be presumed: see Trimbak v. Kashinath (3). In Sheo Prasad v. Indar Bahadur Singh (1) above cited nothing appears to have been done after the process fee for proclamation of sale was paid. In Norendra v. Bhupendra (2) there was not only payment of the process fee but also a petition by the decree-holder for issue of sale proclamation and in Indra Pershad Singh v. Surdhar Lal (4) on which the later decision was rested the decree-holder did in fact apply for issue of a proclamation. In the present case it seems to me clear that an application must be taken to have been made. The order to issue such a process made on 11th November 1910 was either absolute or conditional on payment of process-fee. If absolute it must have been preceded by an oral application of the decree-holders, for otherwise the Court would presumably not have made it at all. If on the other hand that order be regarded as conditional, then the condition was fulfilled on 15th November 1910 and the talhana parcha should be taken as in effect an application for a final order: that it was so regarded appears from the order actually passed by the executing Court on the 18th November. I may refer in this connexion to R. 4 of the notification issued under S. 20 (1), Court-fees Act, which is reproduced in this Court's Civil Circular 4-3 and runs as follows:

"No process shall be drawn up for service or execution until the fee chargeable under that rule has been paid. The fee shall be paid in 'court-fee-stamps, which shall be affixed either to the application by which the Court is moved to issue the process, or if no such application be filed to the order by which the Court directs the issue or service of the process'."

As remarked in Vijayaraghavalu v. Srinivasulu (5) the mere fact that issue of proclamation had been previously ordered does not affect the character of the talhana parcha, for proclamation would not have been issued if the parcha had not been put in. Looking to all the circumstances I think it impossible to avoid the conclusion that an application for issue of proclamation was made either on 14th or 15th November 1910 and in either case the application under consideration is not time barred. The contention rested upon R. 66 (3), O. 21, Sch. 1, Civil P. C., is not one which can be raised at this stage. The sale proclaimed was actually held and its proceeds paid to the decree-holders on 10th December 1910 and the judgment-debtors took no steps of any kind to set aside those proceedings.

On the 17th current certain additional grounds of appeal were tendered to this Court but were not seen by the respondents' learned counsel till yesterday, the day before being Sunday. In the first two it is alleged that two out of three judgment-debtors have recently been adjudged insolvent and their property vested in the receiver, the decree now under execution being included in the schedule of debts. Neither an affidavit nor a copy of the order of adjudication has been filed and the respondents' counsel is not in a position to admit the allegation which I must therefore decline to consider. It is also conceded that the application for execution out of which the correct proceedings arise is out of order, inasmuch as it does not give the date of the previous application as required by sub-R. (2) (f), R. 11, O. 21, Sch. 1, Civil P. C. This belated objection cannot be entertained now. It might have been advanced no less than four years ago and there is no suggestion that the judgment-debtors have been in any way prejudiced by the omission in question: they have in fact been aware all along of the actual fact as is apparent from the pleadings and the issues recorded in August 1914.

The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs. In the lower Courts costs will be paid as already ordered. I allow Rs. 15/ as hearing fee in this Court.

Second Appeal No. 14-B of 1917, Decided on 24th September 1917, against appellate decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Amraoti, D/- 12th September 1916.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 11 — Subsequent suit for different property on different causes of action is not barred.

Plaintiff brought a suit for possession of certain property basing his claim on a gift of the property by his grandmother to his mother. The suit was dismissed. He then brought a suit for possession of certain other property as heir of his maternal grandfather through his mother.

Held: that the suit was not barred as res judicata. [P 97 C 1]

(b) Possessory suit — Defendant wrongly dispossessing defendant— Defendant cannot plead that plaintiff is not sole owner.

A person who has been wrongfully dispossessed from property is entitled to sue for its possession, and it is no defence to the suit to say that the plaintiff is not the sole owner of the property. [P 97 C 1]

J. C. Ghosh—for Appellant.

M. V. Joshi—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The facts of this case are stated in the judgment of the lower appellate Court. The first point argued before me is that the present suit is barred by res judicata by reason of the decision in Suit No. 467 of 1917. The present suit is a suit for the possession of a field on the allegation that it belonged to the plaintiff's maternal grandfather Laxman, after his death to his widow, and after her to the plaintiff's mother to whom the plaintiff has succeeded. In the former suit which related to the possession of a house, the title set up by the plaintiff was a gift made to his mother by the maternal grandmother. This plaintiff's claim to the house was dismissed by the lower appellate Court on the sole ground that the title set up by the plaintiff was not a valid title. There was no issue in that suit which can have the remotest bearing on any of the issues in the present case. It is however argued that under Expl. 4, S. 11, Civil P. C., the plaintiff's title by inheritance must be deemed to have been substantially in issue in the former suit. This would have been perfectly correct, if the present suit was an attempt to obtain possession of the same house, but this is not the case. It does not follow from the fact that the plaintiff has lost all title to the house, whether he set it up expressly or whether he omitted to do so, that his title to other property is in the least affected by Expl. 4, S. 11.

There is no force in this argument. It is argued that as appellant's predecessor-in-title obstructed the plaintiff when he was seeking to obtain possession in pursuance of a decree against one Akbarali and this obstruction was the subject-matter of an inquiry which terminated in an order in favour of the defendant-appellant's predecessor, the suit is barred by limitation under Art. 11 (a), Lim. Act. This argument overlooks the fact that the plaintiff is still a minor. The contention of the defendant-appellant that the plaintiff has failed to prove the possession within 12 years of the suit, is negatived by the finding arrived at by the lower Appellate Court that the plaintiff was in possession till 1908. The defendant-appellant pleaded that plaintiff's mother had a sister still alive who was a necessary party and on whom title to half the property has devolved. This appears to be correct, but the lower Appellate Court has decreed the claim in full on the ground that the plaintiff was previously in possession and the defendants have without any title dispossessed the plaintiff. In other words, the plaintiff's prior possession entitles him to a decree for the entire field, though his title to half the property may be disputed by his co-sharer if she likes. The appeal, therefore fails and is dismissed with costs.

Miss. Civil Appeal No. 10-B of 1917, Decided on 21st August 1917, from order of Addl. Dist. Judge, Buldhana, Df. 17th January 1917.

Provincial Insolvency Act (1907), Ss. 16, 18, 20 and 23—Petition for adjudication—Court cannot call upon debtor of insolvent to pay money into Court without adjudication.

Where a debtor presents a petition for adjudication as an insolvent, the Court has no power, without making an order for adjudication or appointing a receiver, to order a debtor of the insolvent to pay into Court any money which he owes to the insolvent. [P 97 C 2]

Judgment.—This is an appeal from an order made under the Provincial Insolvency Act. That order was ultra vires of the lower Court and must be set aside. One Krishnaji applied to be declared an insolvent on the ground that his debts amounted to Rs. 1,808 and his assets to

Rs. 6-8-0. The petition was opposed by five of his creditors, who alleged inter alia that the petitioner, was the owner of a field which he had pretended to sell to his uncle one Ganpat for Rs. 900. The petitioner replied that he had in truth sold the field for the said amount and used the money in satisfying some of his creditors. The contesting creditors gave no evidence whatever in support of their allegations as to the legality and force of a deed executed one year before those proceedings began, but the lower Court, having accepted evidence tendered by the petitioner for the purpose of proving that the sale was a real transaction, held: (1) that the sale was in fact a real transaction; and (2) that Ganpat had paid Rs. 450 out of the price of Rs. 900 to the petitioner.

Thereupon, the lower Court, without making any order of adjudication under S. 16, Insolvency Act 1907, or for the appointment of a receiver under S. 18 of that enactment, directed that Ganpat should pay Rs. 450 into Court for the benefit of the general body of the petitioner's creditors. The learned Judge does not enlighten us as to the section of the Insolvency Act under which he passed this order upon Ganpat and I have been unable to find any such section. Ganpat has appealed from the order, and there is no doubt that the appeal must succeed. The question, whether or not Ganpat owes any money to the petitioner for insolvency is not a question to be decided in these proceedings, to which Ganpat is no party. If the lower Court is satisfied that the petitioner has fraudulently concealed the existence of assets belonging to him, that may be good ground for dismissing the petition. But if the Court decides to proceed with the administration of the petitioner's affairs, it must first make an order of adjudication under S. 16. Thereafter, unless it elects to carry on the administration itself under the powers given to it by S. 23 of the Act, it should appoint a receiver under S. 18 of the Act. Then under S. 20 of the Act, steps can be taken according to law to release the property of the debtor. The learned Judge will avoid such errors as he has made in this case if he proceeds with the Insolvency Act 1907, open before him, and follows the procedure laid down for him in proper order by section after section.

The appeal is allowed, the order of the lower Court directing Ganpat to pay Rs. 450 into Court is set aside and that Court is directed to proceed with the case according to law. I make no order as to costs of this appeal. Costs in Courts below will be disposed of as that Court may think proper.

Civil Revn. No. 5/B of 1918, Decided on 15th August 1918.

Civil P. C. (1908), S. 145 and O. 21, R. 43—Supratdar entrusted with cattle attached on executing bond—Another decree-holder applying for rateable distribution—Attaching creditor compromising—Compromise certified—Return of cattle to judgment-debtor by supratdar—Liability of supratdar cannot be enforced by executing Court, but must form subject-matter of regular suit.

A supratdar was entrusted with livestock on executing a security bond to the extent of the value of property attached for its production in good condition when required after an attachment of the cattle at the instance of a decree-holder. Another decree-holder applied for rateable distribution. The attaching creditor having compromised, cattle were returned to the judgment-debtor and the compromise was certified. On the latter decree-holder's applying for the enforcement of the liability of supratdar:

Held: the matter could not be inquired into by the executing Court, but must form the subject-matter of a regular suit. [1918 C 2]

W. H. Dhabe—for Applicant.

Atmaram Bhagwant—for Non-Applicant.

Judgment.—The question raised in this petition of revision is whether the liability, if any, of non-applicant 1 can be enforced by an order of the executing Court. The non-applicant was a supratdar or depositary of cattle attached under O. 21, R. 43, and entrusted to him in accordance with Circular 1-31 on his executing a security bond to the extent of the value of the said livestock for its production in good condition when required. The applicant who had applied for a rateable distribution, after an attachment of the cattle at the instance of another decree-holder, complains that the cattle had been returned without the order of the Court to the judgment-debtor who had compromised with the attaching creditor, and whose compromise was certified to the Court. The Munsif has held that the matter cannot be inquired into by the executing Court but must form the subject of a regular suit. For the applicant reliance is placed upon Nathoo Ram v. Kamal Rama (1) where Obbord, J. C., held that the Court has an inherent power to enforce a security bond given under similar circumstances. This case however was dissented from by Ismay J. C., in Joshi Powar v. Jiwaraj Hazarimal (2). Both these cases were decided under the Code of 1882. The applicant's pleader relies upon S. 151 of the present Civil P. C., (5 of 1908), as supporting the view taken by Obbord, J. C., S. 151 runs thus:

"Nothing in this Code shall be deemed to limit or otherwise affect the inherent power of the Court to make such orders as may be necessary for the ends of justice or to prevent abuse of the process of the Court."

The terms of this section are very wide, and if an order can be passed under this section to enforce the depositary's liability, that order will not obviously be a decree, and will not be open to appeal. S. 145, Civil P. C., deals with the liability of a surety. It is clear that the supratdar was not a surety for the judgment-debtor. It may however be noted that S. 145, declared that the surety shall, for the purposes of appeal, be deemed a party within the meaning of S. 47. O. 40, R. 4, enables the Court to enforce the duties of a receiver by directing his property to be attached and sold. It is clear that the supratdar in this case was not appointed a receiver. An appeal lies under O. 43, R. 1 (s), from such an order. In both these instances where proceedings may be taken for the enforcement of the liability of a person other than the parties to the suit, an appeal has been given by law. In Nathoo Ram v. Kamal Rama (1) the Court declined to say whether the order was appealable or not, and whether if unjust it could be impeached by a separate suit. The mode in which the liability of the depositary is to be enforced has also not been considered in that case. There being no decree, the depositary's property cannot be attached and sold in the absence of a statutory power as now contained in O. 40, R. 4. It has also been pointed out by Ismay, J. C., that the refusal of the depositary to deliver up to the attached property can be summarily dealt with in the mofussil as a contempt of Court.

For these reasons I agree with the later ruling in Joshi Powar v. Hazarimal (2) and dismiss this application for revision with costs. I fix Rs. 10 as pleader's fee in this Court.

v.

Second Appeal No. 51 of 1916, Decided on 24th February 1917, from decree of Divl. Judge, Nagpur, D/- 15th October 1915.

Evidence Act (1872), S. 115—Prior mortgage—Agreement between subsequent co-mortgagees to pay off prior mortgage—Failure by one co-mortgagee to inform other of his charge on prior mortgage amounts to such omission as is contemplated by S. 115.

One S. executed a mortgage in favour of A and B. Some payments were made by S. towards the satisfaction of the mortgage debt which were admittedly taken by B. alone. Subsequently S. executed another mortgage in favour of B and C in order to pay off the prior mortgage. B and C foreclosed the property. B sold his half share in the foreclosed property to the plaintiff and he also sold his right under the prior mortgage, alleging that it had not been fully satisfied. Plaintiff sued to foreclose C's share of the property on the basis of the first mortgage, alleging that it had not been completely satisfied.

Held, that in view of the implied terms of the contract between B and C, that contract being that they embarked upon a joint adventure for the purpose of extinguishing the prior mortgage and taking a first charge on the property, it was the legal duty of B to inform his co-mortgagee within a reasonable time that he had still an outstanding claim under the prior mortgage and that B's omission to give the information amounted to such an omission as is contemplated by S. 115 and operated as an estoppel against A under that section.

K. K. Gandhe—for Respondent.

Judgment.—One Sitaram executed a mortgage for Rs. 2,000 on 16th September 1886 in favour of Naik and Pingle. Two payments aggregating Rs. 850 were made to Naik and it is admitted that Pingle had received his half share of this amount. On 11th March 1891 he executed a fresh mortgage for Rs. 2,000 of the same property in favour of Pingle and one Nandurkar in order to pay off the prior mortgage. Pingle credited Rs. 999 towards the former mortgage and Rs. 1,000 was paid by Nandurkar to the mortgagor for satisfaction of the prior mortgage. Out of this Rs. 745 was paid to Naik. Naik admits that his share of the mortgage debt has been fully satisfied. On 11th June 1904 Pingle and Nandurkar foreclosed the mortgaged property. On 13th April 1908 Pingle sold his half share in the foreclosed village to the plaintiff and he also sold his rights under the prior mortgage, alleging that it had not been fully satisfied. The plaintiff now sues to foreclose Nandurkar's share of the village on the basis of the first mortgage. Both the Courts below have dismissed the suit on the ground that the first mortgage has been satisfied. According to a calculation made by the first Court, Rs. 1,978-8-0 was due on the date when the joint mortgage in favour of Pingle and Nandurkar was executed; it is clear from the recitals in that document that the intention of the parties was to extinguish the prior mortgage and each of the co-mortgagees advanced his share of the mortgage money. The plaintiff's case is that his vendor did not receive his share of Rs. 625 paid to Naik. He therefore claims half that amount with interest thereon. The suit was filed on the last day of the period of grace given by S. 31, Act 9 of 1908. The lower appellate Court has presumed satisfaction from a long delay in enforcing the claim under the mortgage of 1886. It is contended that the burden of proof as regards satisfaction was wrongly placed upon the plaintiff and in support of this an unreported ruling of the learned Judicial Commissioner in Second Appeal No. 245 of 1915 has been cited.

There is a finding by the Courts below, which I think enables me to dispose of the case on the ground of estoppel. The finding is to the effect that Pingle never asserted a claim till 1908 for the short payment said to have been made to him under the first mortgage. The view taken by the first Court is that the estoppel so far as it is based upon the recitals in the document, is correct as far as it goes. The lower appellate Court has not discussed the question of estoppel at all. But there is an aspect of the case not considered by the Court below, though Pingle's silence for many years has been pleaded as a ground for holding that he is estopped. Let us now look at the facts. Pingle and Nandurkar found that about Rs. 2,000 was due on the prior mortgage. Their intention, as would appear from the recitals in their mortgage, was to extinguish the prior mortgage and to obtain a first charge upon the property. They agreed to advance half the sum each. It is not suggested that Nandurkar acted improperly in paying over his share to Sitaram. Pingle had no doubt a right to an account from Naik. Pingle may have equally a claim against Sitaram, the mortgagor, for not paying the amount due to Pingle. The intention of the two mortgagees was to extinguish the title, and in the absence of a complaint made by Pingle, Nandurkar was justified in assuming that it had been duly satisfied so far any claim on the part of his co-mortgagee was concerned. It is however urged that Nandurkar represents the mortgagor after the foreclosure decree, and is therefore bound to the same extent as the mortgagor. This is so far correct.

The question arises whether there was not a duty cast upon Pingle to inform within a reasonable time that he had still an outstanding claim under the prior mortgage, which was meant to be extinguished by this joint adventure. That there was a moral duty on his part to so inform Nandurkar does not admit of any doubt. I think also that there was a legal duty in view of the implied terms of the contract, that contract being that they have embarked upon a joint adventure for the purpose of extinguishing the prior mortgage and taking a first charge on the property. If it was a legal duty, then Pingle's omission to inform him was such an omission as is contemplated by S. 115, Evidence Act. Nandurkar was lulled into a belief that the property had ceased to be encumbered. Any claim upon that mortgage ought to have been made long ago. The joint mortgage was, in consequence of this belief, not enforced by Nandurkar till the debt reached near the full value of the property, for it is obvious that it was foreclosed because it reached that value. If Nandurkar had been so informed within a reasonable time, he would have enforced his mortgage at a time when the alleged outstanding claims on the prior mortgage and the mortgage money due under the joint mortgage had not reached the full value of the property. His position therefore has been altered for the worse by reason of the unreasonable delay in asserting the claim. Pingle and his representative, the plaintiff, are therefore estopped from saying that the claim under the prior mortgage has not been fully satisfied. On the whole, the suit has been rightly dismissed and I dismiss the appeal with costs.

Mt. Kalva—Plaintiff—Appellant.

Bhawar Singh and another—Defendants—Respondents.

Second Appeal No. 477 of 1916, Decided on 24th September 1917, from decree of Dist. Judge, Raipur, D/- 29th July 1916, in Appeal No. 178 of 1916.

(a) C. P. Tenancy Act (1898), S. 46—Suit for possession of occupancy tenancy by heir—Civil Court has jurisdiction to entertain suit—Gift by Hindu widow in absence of necessity is invalid—Hindu law, Alienation.

In a suit for possession of an occupancy holding in the civil Court on the ground that it devolved on the plaintiff after the death of the former holder, her mother, the defendant resisted the claim on the ground that as the land was gifted to him by a registered deed by the plaintiff's mother the suit was barred by the Central Provinces Tenancy Act.

Held: (1) that as the suit was one for possession of an occupancy tenancy and not a suit to set aside an alienation made by the former tenant in contravention of the provisions of the Tenancy Act, the civil Court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit; (2) that irrespective of the provisions of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act the deed of gift regarded as an attempt to alienate anything more than the life-interest of a Hindu widow was invalid. In the absence of legal necessity a Hindu widow cannot alienate more than her life-interest merely because to do so would be to give effect to some wish, indicated but not carried into effect, by her husband during his lifetime. [P 101 C 2]

(b) C. P. Tenancy Act (1898), S. 46—Testamentary direction for disposal of occupancy tenancy cannot be given by tenant.

An occupancy tenant in the Central Provinces cannot leave any testamentary direction for the disposal of his tenant right by his widow after his death. [P 102 C 1]

(c) C. P. Tenancy Act (1898), S. 46—Devolution of occupancy tenancy—One of several tenants can take up entire holding.

On the death of an occupancy tenant the occupancy right devolves by operation of law on all the heirs as co-tenants and any one of them willing to do so can take up the whole tenancy in the event of the other heirs being unwilling to do so. (P 102 C 1)

D. T. Mangalmurti—for Appellant.

J. C. Ghosh—for Respondents.

Judgment.—It is necessary to state the facts of this case. One Badri Lodhi was a tenant of an occupancy holding. He died some three years before the suit, leaving him surviving a widow Durpat, three daughters (1) Kalwa, (2) Kelhi and (3) Mathura, and a nephew Bhawarsingh, the son of his younger brother Gopy Lodhi. During his lifetime Badri executed a document purporting to gift some of his holding to his nephew, but the document was never registered or acted on. After Badri's death the tenancy devolved on his widow Durpat. On 21st December 1912, Durpat executed a deed of gift in favour of Bhawarsingh in respect of 12 of the occupancy fields and a house. This deed (Ex. D-1) does not purport to transfer anything except Durpat's right, title and interest in the gifted property. Durpat died in or about October 1914. On 28th July 1915, Mt. Kalwa, one of the daughters of Badri, sued Bhawarsingh for possession of the property included in Durpat's gift. Her two sisters being unwilling to join in the suit as plaintiffs were impleaded as defendants. Mt. Mathura, died soon after and as her legal representatives in the estate of Badri were her two sisters her name was expunged from the record without any other person being substituted. Kelhi stated that she had no objection to the disposition made by her father.

The suit therefore resolved itself into a contest between the plaintiff and Bhawarsingh. The defendant Bhawarsingh pleaded that he had become re-united with his uncle and was entitled to the fields gifted to him by survivorship. He also relied upon the unregistered document executed by Badri and the registered deed of gift executed by Durpat. The first Court found for the plaintiff and gave her a decree. The lower appellate Court has reversed that decree and dismissed the plaintiff's suit with costs. The plaintiff has therefore made this second appeal. I have no doubt whatever that the decision of the lower appellate Court is wrong. It was urged before the Judge that this suit was barred by the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, as being a suit to set aside an alienation made by Durpat in contravention of the provisions of S. 46, Tenancy Act, and the case of Ganeshtas v. Shankar (1) was cited in support of that contention. The lower appellate Court rightly found on the pleadings that the ruling cited had no application. No doubt Durpat made an alienation of her own interest in the occupancy holding in contravention of S. 46, Tenancy Act, and if the plaintiff, as one of the persons upon whom the tenancy would devolve on the death of Durpat, had sought to set aside Durpat's alienation of her own tenant right, the ruling would have been applicable and the civil Court would have had no jurisdiction. But the suit is not one to set aside the alienation by Durpat. It is a suit for the possession of an occupancy right which, according to the Tenancy Act, devolved upon the plaintiff and her sisters on the death of Durpat. It is the defendant who sets up Durpat's gift and the plaintiff's reply is that the gift has been exhausted by the determination of the subject-matter of it, viz. the life-interest of Durpat.

Regarded as an attempt to alienate anything more than that life interest the deed of gift is invalid irrespective of the provisions of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, and therefore that enactment is not called into operation. But after having gone right up to this point, the lower appellate Court went completely off the rails and expounded the so called law which is without foundation or authority. It held the deed of gift of an occupancy holding made by the widow to be binding upon the person on whom the holding would devolve under the Tenancy Act, because the gift was made by Durpat, (in the Judge's own words) "in order to complete the wish of her husband." This decision is unsustainable from every point of view. In the first place it was never pleaded that the widow executed the gift under the authority, or in furtherance of any wish, of her husband; nor does the deed itself contain any recital of such an authority or purpose. Therefore the decision of the learned District Judge is of a case neither pleaded nor put in issue nor proved. The mere fact that during his lifetime Badri made an abortive attempt to gift certain property to his nephew raises no presumption that he left authority behind to his widow to complete his intention. Next, it is manifest that an occupancy tenant cannot leave any testamentary direction for disposal of his tenant right in the Central Provinces by his widow after his death. Finally, it is an entirely novel proposition that, in the absence of legal necessity, a Hindu widow can alienate more than her life-interest merely because to do so would give effect to some wish indicated, but not carried into effect, by her husband during his lifetime. In this second appeal the learned Advocate for the respondent has felt the difficulty of supporting the obviously unsound view of the law adopted by the lower appellate Court, and he attempted to sustain the verdict in favour of his client by putting forward a number of pleas which were neither pleaded nor put in issue; such as that the gift was for legal necessity or for the securing of religious benefit to Badri, or was part of a family arrangement made by Badri. I give no consideration to these irrelevant pleas. An attempt was also made, for the first time before me, to set up a jus tertii, viz. that of the plaintiff's sister Mt. Keldi; but I am clear that the defendant Bhawarsingh cannot resist the suit on that ground. On the death of Mt. Durpat the occupancy tenant right devolved by operation of law upon the three daughters as co-tenants. Any one of those three daughters willing to do so can take up the whole tenancy in the event of her sisters being unwilling to do so. The decree of the first Court was perfectly correct, and the lower appellate Court was not justified in interfering with it. I therefore allow this appeal. I reverse the decree of the lower appellate Court and restore the decree of the first Court. The defendant Bhawarsingh must pay the costs of the plaintiff-appellant in both the appellate Courts.

Second Appeal No. 558 of 1916, Decided on 5th December 1917, from decree of Dist. Judge, Nagpur.

Defendant, a decree-holder, purchased certain immovable property belonging to his judgment-debtor in execution of a money-decree. The sale was confirmed, but the defendant afterwards agreed to accept the decretal amount and to reconvey the property to the judgment-debtor. No document was however executed and the judgment-debtor sold the property to the plaintiff. The latter then sued for possession of the property:

Held: (1) that the defendant having on confirmation of the sale become absolute owner of the property under O. 21, R. 92 a re-transfer of the property to the judgment-debtor could only be effected by a registered deed;

(2) that the plaintiff having purchased the property from the judgment-debtor during the pendency of the execution proceedings the purchase was void;

(3) that the plaintiff being the representative of the judgment-debtor, a separate suit for possession was barred by S. 47.

Judgment—The facts of the present case are that the decree-holder was allowed to bid at an auction held on a simple money-decree and purchased the 1/3rd share in the land of his judgment-debtor Gosavi. The sale was confirmed and therefore under R. 92, O. 21, the decree-holder, the present defendant's father, became the absolute owner of the 1/3rd share. After this had happened, he apparently accepted the decretal amount from the judgment-debtor and promised to give back the land to him, but no document of transfer was effected, though a legal transfer for the consideration of the decretal debt required a registered deed. After the decree-holder's death his son, the present defendant, applied for possession of the property purchased. The plaintiff has brought this suit asking for a declaration that the defendant has no right in the property. The plaintiff claims to be a purchaser from the judgment-debtor after the decree-holder had told the judgment-debtor that he would give him back the property. The First Court dismissed the suit; the lower appellate Court has decreed the plaintiff's claim, apparently on the ground that the defendant is estopped from denying the plaintiff's claim because the defendant's father informed the plaintiff before he purchased the property that he had given up his claims to it. As a matter of fact the execution proceedings had not closed at the date of the plaintiff's purchase. They are still before the Collector and the Collector has not yet put the auction-purchaser in possession.

It is accepted law in this Court that a decree-holder who is an auction-purchaser remains a party to the suit. As between the defendant and judgment-debtor therefore the matter now in dispute would be one to be decided under S. 47, both being parties to the suit. Supposing the sale by the judgment-debtor to the plaintiff to be a valid one, the plaintiff cannot possibly be in a better position than the judgment-debtor and the present claim is one which would fall under S. 47. But the plaintiff has no valid title at all on two grounds: the first is that the execution proceedings still being in the hands of the Collector when he purchased from the judgment-debtor his purchase is void, the second is that his vendor had no title to convey to him.

Under R. 92, O. 21, the defendant's father became the absolute owner of the property on the confirmation of the sale. He could only transfer that property back to the judgment-debtor by a registered deed. There might have been an alternative course, namely, for the Collector to refuse in the circumstances to put the auction-purchaser decree-holder in possession. This course would not give the present plaintiff any title. Thus there was no legal transfer from the judgment-debtor to the plaintiff, nor had the judgment-debtor any subsisting title to convey to the plaintiff. I am unable to understand what the learned District Judge means when he says the relinquishment by the purchaser was perfectly valid and did not require registration. There is no such thing as title by estoppel. If there were such a thing, the whole of the Transfer of Property Act and Registration Act would become waste paper. If the plaintiff has any status at all in this case it is because he is the representative of the judgment-debtor. If he is such a representative a separate suit would not lie as action has to be taken under S. 47. As a matter of fact however the plaintiff has no legal status on which he can either sue or make an application.

I may note that the Court in which the suit was brought was not the Court which was executing the decree or by which the decree had been passed, so it could not treat the suit as an application under S. 47. Combined with the claim as stated above is a second claim which is of a totally different nature, asking for a declaration that the defendant cannot get separate possession of the 1/3rd share but only joint possession. There is nothing on the record to show that defendant has applied for joint possession and the lower Courts have held that there is no cause of action for this part of the claim. This decision is undoubtedly correct. If at any time the defendant gets possession of anything more than he is entitled to, the plaintiff can take such action as he is advised. For the above reasons I reverse the decree of the lower appellate Court and dismiss the suit with costs in all Courts. I may add that the plaintiff has failed because he has not taken the pains to get his title perfected. This is lucky for the defendant, whose action cannot be said to be that of an honest man.

Auction-sale whether in presence of a sale decree or a money decree is binding on parties to the decree only. Judgment.—The facts are as stated by the lower Courts. There are two questions for decision. The first is whether both the lower Courts were right or wrong in holding that the plaintiff's suit for possession against defendant 1 Beharilal, and defendants 2 and 3 Sheocharan and Panna Lal is maintainable. The second is whether or not the Divisional Judge was right in holding contrary to the view taken by the Subordinate Judge, that defendant 4 Ganeshdas is liable to repay to the plaintiff the money he received out of the purchase money at the auction-sale. The first question will be discussed first. The learned Advocate for the appellant-plaintiff concedes that it is of no consequence whether the auction sale was in pursuance of sale decrees or a money decree, since if the first three defendants who were not parties to the suit ought to have been made parties, then the decree was not binding on them, and if these need not have been made parties the sale would not affect their rights. The learned Advocate attacks the decree solely on the ground that they had not acquired the status of tenants. As regards defendant 1 Beharilal, in satisfaction of a money decree he purchased in 1909, 32.81 acres of the holding in dispute from the absolute occupaney tenant Ganpat and his son Mohanlal. At that time Beharilal had a 4 annas proprietary title, the remaining 12 annas share belonging to Ganeshdas defendant 4, who was lambardar. It is not pleaded that the purchase was with the consent of Ganeshdas, and therefore it is argued, Beharilal did not acquire tenancy rights.

The lambardar therefore was bound to sue the original tenants for rent, and this he did in the interests of the proprietary body and he therefore by means of the sale evicted the original tenants in the interest of the proprietary body and the plaintiff-purchaser at the sale became the tenant of the proprietary body, who had acted through the lambardar. The learned counsel for defendants 1, 2 and 3 says that as Beharilal a cosharer was himself the transferee and as in the course of the suit of 1910 against the original tenants it was brought to Ganeshdas's notice that Beharilal had purchased portions of the holding, Ganeshdas knew that there was a transfer and that it was assented to by one of the cosharers within the meaning of Ramji v. Syed (1). Ganeshdas nevertheless refused to make Beharilal a party to the suit. When he was aware that a cosharer had assented to the transfer he was not acting on behalf of the proprietary body in proceeding with the suit as though the transferee was a trespasser. Unless and until a transfer is avoided the transferee is not a trespasser, Raghoba v. Ragho (2).

The claim of the plaintiff is that defendant 1 is a trespasser. I am of opinion that the appeal as against Beharilal must fail unless and until the transfer is avoided by the lambardar acting on behalf of the proprietary body, a condition of affairs that cannot be reached in this case, since one of the proprietary body the transferee cannot be ejected. If, as he was here the transferee, be a cosharer, another cosharer has the remedy indicated in Ramdayal v. Gulabi (3) but the transferee cannot be ejected. Without an avoidance of the transfer, the claims of the transferee cannot be ignored as Ganeshdas deliberately elected to do in this suit for rent. The case in respect of defendants 2 and 3 is somewhat different but in my opinion the same principle is applicable. They were usufructuary mortgagees with the consent of the lambardar. In place of the mortgage a sale of part of the property took place by means of a conciliation award which however had not the assent of the new lambardar. But one of the cosharers Beharilal did assent to the award for he signed it. It is argued for defendants 2 and 3 that it must be presumed that the lambardar in consenting to a mortgage consented to any possible results there of including a conciliation award. This proposition I cannot assent to.

(3) [1908] 4 N. L. R. 120.

But the defendants in the rent suit brought to Ganeshdas' notice the fact that defendants 2 and 3 had purchased part of the occupancy holding. It was therefore incumbent on Ganeshdas, if he wished to proceed against the original tenants alone to avoid the transfer by joining the transferees as parties. If he had done so this would have pleaded that a cosharer had assented to the award which Ganeshdas therefore could not avoid as lambardar and agent of the proprietary body. The then plaintiff deliberately refused to take the only steps which he could take in the circumstances to avoid the transfer and the transfer has not been avoided. The plaintiff in this suit claims that by Ganeshdas selling the holding as that of the original tenants, the plaintiff has acquired tenancy rights irrespective of the fact that the original tenants had parted with portion of the holding. But the transfer was one that had to be avoided, it could not be ignored. In this view of the case the claim for possession fails. The second question is whether by a suit the plaintiff can recover from Ganeshdas the purchase money that he has received. The case has been argued on the assumption that the judgment debtors had no interest at all in the property sold. This assumption is correct, for through the judgment debtors in part of the holding they had no interest at all in that part of it which had previously been transferred to defendants 1, 2 and 3; more over in his appeal to the Court of the Divisional Judge Ganeshdas never contended that the judgment debtors had any interest in the property sold. The learned Divisional Judge in holding that a separate suit will not lie has relied on the remarks of Napier, J., in Mohammuddin v. Mahmud (4) and I have also been referred to some obiter dicta in Parathi v. Govind Swami (5).

But there is very strong authority for the view taken by the Sub-Judge. I would cite Muhammad Vajibullah v. Jainarain (6) when the sale was under the Code of 1908 Ram Kumar v. Ram Gour (7) and the recent case of Rustamji v. Vinayak (8) a case under the Code of 1908. I would therefore restore the decreet of the first Court against defendant 4 Ganeshdas. The result is that the suit is dismissed with costs in all Courts as against the first three defendants (the present respondents 1 to 3) and the plaintiff's money claim against defendant 4 (now Respondent 6) is decreed to the extent of Rs. 160 2/6 with proportionate costs in all Courts. Future interest will not be allowed.

Civil Revision, No. 47 of 1918, Decided on 25th June 1918, from decrees of Sub-Judge, Jubbulpore, D. 29th November 1917.

(a) Specific Relief Act (1877), S. 9—Constructive possession is sufficient to maintain suit.

In suits under S. 9 the ordinary rule of possession going with title should be followed in deciding whether a person has been dispossessed within six months of the date of the suit. In order to bring this section into operation it is not necessary that the possession which is lost should be the actual physical occupation of the property. Constructive possession which goes with title would suffice for the purposes of the section. Id. C. P. C. R. 151, 152. [P 166 C 1]

Order.—This is an application to revise a decree passed by the Sub-Judge, Jubbulpore, under S. 9, Specific Relief Act, directing the defendant Lachman to put the plaintiff in possession of a certain kotha in the town of Jubbulpore and ordering that the plaintiff's costs should be paid by all the four defendants. the purposes of this application the facts may thus be stated. The applicants are Lachman and another defendant, the remaining defendants having been joined as non-applicants. The kotha in question belongs to one Sakharan who let it along with two others to the plaintiff Sheodin Ram for four years by a registered lease dated 3rd May 1913. The plaintiff sublet the kotha to Behari and Nathu on 23rd May 1914 for one year. The sub-lessees held on after the expiry of the term, and Behari died of plague in January 1917. Many of the residents of Jubbulpore had left the town owing to plague. Among them were the plaintiff and Nathu, who met at Gadawara sometime in February where Nathu informed the plaintiff that Behari's property had been removed and that he himself no longer required the kotha. On 15th March 1917 the defendant Gulam took possession and let the kotha to the defendants Nanhulal and Baldeo Prasad, who thereupon put the defendant Lachhu into possession. The Sub-Judge has held that although the plaintiff admittedly did not return to Jubbulpore between the final abandonment of the kotha by Nathu and 15th March 1917, he was still in possession for the purposes of S. 9, Specific Relief Act, and had therefore a right to sue under that section.

In this Court it is urged on the authority of Dinkarsha v. Anantshe (1) that the possession which must be lost to bring that section into operation must be an actual physical occupation of the property and that the mere constructive possession which goes with title cannot suffice. The facts in the case cited are distinguishable from those now under consideration, in that there a tenant with a subsisting right of tenancy was in actual physical possession, when the ouster complained of by the landlord took place. The decision goes no further than to lay down that in such circumstances the landlord cannot sue in his own name. To accept the view contended for by the applicants would be tantamount to holding that no suit could be brought under S. 9 by anyone. The plaintiff was admittedly entitled to have physical possession of the kotha as soon as it was finally abandoned by Nathu, and in the circumstances I consider that the ordinary rule by which possession is taken to go with title should be followed.

I am further very doubtful whether an erroneous finding upon the question of what constitutes dispossession can properly be regarded as an exercise of jurisdiction with which the Judge was not vested by law. The Sub-Judge had jurisdiction to try the case and had decreed the claim in the view that the plaintiff was in possession and was dispossessed by the entry of the defendants. If the Judge was in error the error was not one of jurisdiction but of law. It is true that this Court interfered in its decision above cited, but the point whether it had the power to do so was apparently not raised. In Fadu Jhola v. Gour Mohun Jhala (2) O'Kinealy, J., held that the decision complained of was not subject to revision. There the Munsif had dismissed a suit brought for possession of a right to fish in a certain khal the soil of which did not belong to the plaintiff, holding that such a suit did not fall within the purview of S. 9. A similar view was taken by Sharfuddin and Coxe, J.J., in Shama Churn Ghosh v. Mahomed Ali (3). Authority in the opposite direction may be found in Collector of Vizagapatam v. Abdul Karim Sahib (4) and Brajabala Devi v. Gurudas Mundle (5), but in neither of those cases was any reference made to the decision of the Privy Council in Amir Hassan Khan v. Sheo Baksh Singh (6).

There is, moreover, another principle on which I consider this Court should decline to interfere. It is open to the applicants to bring a suit to establish their title, and it is not the practice of this Court to interfere in revision where another remedy is open to the approved party and where no great injustice or inconvenience would follow from the refusal to act. This principle has been acted upon by all the High Courts. See for example Ram Kishen Das v. Jai Kishen Das (7), Chidambaram Chetty v. Nagappa Chetty (8) and Kashinath Sakharan Kulkarni v. Nana (9). The same principle was applied by this Judgment.—The facts are as follows. The plaintiff sues for possession under a sale-deed executed by defendant 1 Ramji on 9th August 1914. The plaintiff had in October 1913 attached the properties, the subject of the sale-deed in execution of a money decree, and the execution proceedings were transferred to the Collector. While the proceedings were still pending, the judgment-debtor executed the sale-deed in question without the previous sanction of the Court or of the Collector. On 10th August the parties to the deed applied to the Munsif to sanction it and he re-transferred the proceedings to the Collector. On 18th August the Collector made the endorsement "permission granted" on the sale-deed, which was registered on 20th August. The learned Divisional Judge has held that the sale is void, as the Collector's sanction could not ratify a sale already made without his sanction. I am of opinion that the view taken by the learned Judge is incorrect. The sale was not complete until the deed was registered, as registration was necessary. The Collector sanctioned it before it was registered. The written permission was given while the sale was incomplete. I find nothing in Sahib v. The State (1) that a sale which creates the written sanction of the Collector after execution but before registration is void. In this view of the case I reverse the decree of the Divisional Judge and restore the decree of the Subordinate Judge dated 10th May 1915. Costs of the first Court will be paid on behalf by that Court. Defendants 2 and 3 will pay their own and plaintiff's costs in the two appellate Courts.

Criminal Appeal No. 134 of 1915, Decided on 31st August 1915, from judgment and finding of Dist. Magistrate, Narsingpur D/- 22nd June 1915.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 234—Joint trial for offences under Penal Code (1860), Ss. 379 and 380 is illegal.

It is illegal, with reference to S. 234, Criminal P. C. to charge a person in the same trial and convict him in the same trial of two offences not of the same kind, as e. g. one under S. 379 and the other under S. 380, Penal Code. (107 C 2)

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 234, 236 and 237—"Offences of same kind"—Meaning explained.

Under Cl. (2), S. 234 of the Code offences are of the same kind when they are punishable with the same amount of punishment under the same section and where this is not the case neither S. 234 nor S. 237 can be read with S. 234 of the Code. [109 C 1]

G. P. Dick—for the Crown.

Judgment.—The learned Standing Counsel has in this case been asked to argue the question whether the trial was legal with reference to the terms of S. 234, Criminal P. C. The appellant has been charged in the same trial and convicted in the same trial of two offences one being under S. 379, I. P. C. and the other being under S. 380, I. P. C. Under S. 231, Criminal P. C. two offences are of the same kind when they are punishable with the same amount of punishment under the same section of the Indian Penal Code. Offences under Ss. 379 and 380 do not come under this description; they are not punishable with the same punishment under the same section. The learned District Magistrate has adopted a definition of his own that offences are of the same kind when they are both cattle thefts of cattle stolen in the same district within the space of a month and sold at the same cattle market. This definition cannot take the place of that given in the Criminal Procedure Code. None of the cases cited by the learned Standing Counsel are relevant except the case of Bal Gangadhar Tilak, In re (1). The following remarks at p. 238 (of 33 Bom) may be quoted:

"If the exceptions are mutually exclusive the provisions of S. 236 or S. 237 could never be invoked to prevent a miscarriage of justice arising from a failure to make good all the details of a charge joined with two other charges under S. 231."

"For example, if A were charged with three thefts in buildings within the year and the evidence established that in one case the theft was committed on the roof and not in the building, the accused could not be convicted of simple theft under the powers conferred by S. 237, because the applicability of S. 256, would be negatived by the mere fact of the joint trial under S. 231. We find it difficult to believe that the Legislature intended that a joint trial of three offences under S. 231 should prevent the prosecution from establishing at the same trial the minor or alternative degrees of criminality involved in the acts complained of."

Supposing the above remarks to express a correct view of the law, they do not apply in the present case. There is here no question in regard of either offence of a conviction of a minor or alternative offence to that charged. It is not a question of two charges under S. 380, and a conviction for one offence under S. 380 and for the other under S. 379. But as regards one offence the accused has been charged under S. 380 and convicted under that section while as regards the other he has been charged and convicted under S. 379. He has not been convicted under S. 379, though charged under S. 380. And in neither case was he charged in the alternative under S. 379 or S. 380. Thus neither S. 236, Criminal P. C. nor S. 237, Criminal

P. C. can be read with S. 234, Criminal P. C. in this case.

The accused has been charged and tried in the same trial for two offences not of the same kind and I cannot distinguish this case from that in Emperor v. Bisahu Panka (2), in which it was held that the accused could not be charged with and tried at one trial for three offences respectively under Ss. 380, 454 and 457, I. P. C. and that with reference to Subrahmaniam Ayyar v. Emperor (3) the whole trial was vitiated. I have therefore no alternative but to set aside the convictions and sentences, and to order a re trial, which must be by the District Magistrate as there is no other Magistrate in the District with S. 30 powers. In retrying the case the District Magistrate may well record the evidence in somewhat greater length and detail. Also I consider the evidence as to previous conviction extremely unsatisfactory. Even if finger prints are not available some more recent evidence than that produced is surely available, and some inquiry seems desirable as to whether the accused was really convicted of rape as he says, and whether the person convicted of rape was the same person as was convicted in the other cases. The convictions are set aside and a retrial ordered.

Second Appeal No. 312 of 1917, Decided on 29th October 1917, from decree of Dist. Judge, Saugor, D/- 24th January 1917, in Appeal No. 246 of 1916.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), Sch. 2, para. 1—Order of reference describing matter in difference as entered in plaint and written statement—Award directing defendant to pay costs—Arbitrators held authorized to decide question of costs.

The parties to the present suit applied to the Court to refer their disputes to arbitrators, on which an order of reference was made describing the matter in difference as entered in the plaint and the defendants' written statement. An award was filed granting the plaintiff the injunction prayed for by him and ordering the defendants to pay the plaintiffs' costs. The defendants objected to the award on a number of grounds, in none of which exception was taken to the order regarding costs. It was urged in second appeal that the order of reference did not authorize the arbitrators to decide the question of costs and that the award was consequently ultra vires:

Heid: that as the plaint included a prayer for costs and as the arbitrators were directed to deal with all questions raised by the plaint and the written statement for the defence, the arbitrators acted within the scope of their authority in deciding the question of costs. [11 100 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), Sch. 2, para. 1—Order of reference in general terms—Arbitrators can decide question of costs.

When a reference to arbitration in a suit is a general one of the whole case the power of dealing with costs rests with the arbitrators: 31 J. R. 1888, Rel. on. [11 100 C 2]

Judgment.—The plaintiff in the suit out of which this appeal arises is malik mahbuz of a plot in mauza Etawah and the defendants are tenants of an adjoining field. The plaintiff sued for an injunction restraining the defendants from interfering with his right of way over their holding and in his plaint prayed that the defendants should be ordered to pay his costs. After issues were framed but before any evidence was recorded the parties applied to the Court under para. 1, Sch. 2, Civil P. C., to refer the dispute between them to arbitrators named in the application. The order of reference describes the matter in difference as entered in the copies annexed thereto, which are respectively copy of the plaint and copy of the defendants' written statement. An award was filed in due course, which in effect granted the plaintiff the injunction claimed and further ordered that the defendants, besides bearing their own costs of the suit, should pay the plaintiff those incurred by him. No costs were incurred in the course of the arbitration itself. The defendants objected to the award on a number of grounds, in none of which was exception taken to the order regarding costs of the suit. All the objections were overruled and the trial Judge held the award to be a valid one to which effect must be given. The defendants appealed to the District Judge, the first and third grounds entertained in the memorandum of appeal being as follows:

"(1) That the lower Court ought to have held that the award on which it has passed a decree is not a valid and legal award in law and that it was not submitted in accordance with law. (3) That the award is so vague and indefinite as to be incapable of execution and the lower Court ought to have remitted it for reconsideration of the arbitrators."

The only points pressed before the District Judge were that in the third ground of appeal and another to the effect that the arbitrators exceeded their authority in ordering the defendants to pay plaintiff's costs. We are concerned in second appeal solely with the objection as to costs. It was urged before the lower appellate Court that the petition of reference did not authorize the arbitrators to decide the question of costs.

The District Judge however held that the reference was in general terms and so gave exclusive jurisdiction to deal with the costs. In second appeal Dagdusa Tilakchand v. Bhukan Govind Shet (1), which the lower appellate Court distinguished, is again relied on and it is said that the order as to costs should be deleted from the decree, on the ground that a matter not referred to arbitration was determined by the arbitrators. In that case it was expressly held that the submission to arbitration did not extend to the matter of costs. I do not think a similar view can be taken in the present case, having regard to the facts that the plaint included a prayer for costs and that the arbitrators were directed to deal with all questions raised by the plaint and the written statement for the defence. It is also true, as pointed out by the learned District Judge, that Dagdusa Tilakchand v. Bhukan Govind Shet (1) was a case of private arbitration; moreover the objection as to costs was not taken before the trial Judge. In Har Gopal v. Sodhi Kartar Singh (2) it was held by Powell and Hogg, J.J., that when a reference to arbitration in a suit is a general one of the whole case, the power of dealing with costs rests with the arbitrators. In England under R. 55-B, O. 36, Rules of the Supreme Court:

"Where the whole of any cause or matter is referred to an official referee under an order of Court, he may, subject to any directions in the order, exercise the same discretion as to costs as the Court or a Judge could have exercised."

and this power covers the costs not only of the action but of the reference and of the award: see Paton v. West of England Iron Co. (3). Moreover when the arbitrator does not exercise his discretion as to costs under the rule last cited, his award is equivalent to the finding of a jury and costs follow the events: see Carr Brithers v. Dougherty (4). I am asked to hold that if the application for an order of reference is silent as to the costs of the suit, the parties should be deemed to have agreed that such costs should be borne as incurred. For this no authority is cited nor have I been able to trace any. Further it is important to observe that in the present case the greater part of the costs, viz., those on account of processes and witnesses, were incurred in consequence of the appellants' objections to the award and so are not covered by the award at all. The trial Judge must in fact be regarded as having passed his own order regarding those costs and seeing that all the appellants' objections to the award failed they should certainly bear at least the costs of those objections. In conclusion it seems to me clear that had any objection to the award been raised before the trial Judge with regard to the costs of the suit he would certainly not have remitted the award: see the words which found place in para. 14, Sec. 2, to the current Code of Civil Procedure though not in the corresponding provision (S. 520 (a) of the 1882 Code). He would have passed his own order, which would naturally and properly have been one requiring the appellants to pay the costs of the plaintiff and to bear their own costs. The appeal is thus without substance, whether costs prior or subsequent to the award are considered. It is therefore dismissed with costs. Costs in the lower Courts will be borne as already ordered. I allow Rs. 15 as Legal Practitioner's fee for the hearing in this Court.

Plaintiff obtained a decree for possession of a field and for mesne profits against a minor defendant. He subsequently agreed to sell the field to the minor judgment-debtor at a certain price, but the transfer was not completed:

Held: (1) that this did not amount to an adjustment of the decree but was only an agreement to adjust. [P 111 C1]

(2) that there being nothing to show that the decree-holder gave up his rights under the decree upon the mere execution of the agreement, the contract was an executory one and was not capable of being specifically enforced by the minor for want of mutuality. [P 111 C2]

V. V. Chitale—for Appellant.

M. Chuckerbutty—for Respondents.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of an application for execution of a decree obtained by the appellant for possession of a field and for mesne profits and costs. The respondent Jairam who is a minor pleaded through his guardian that the case had been compromised and in support of his plea put in a document which is described as Isarpatti. The parties admit that there was an agreement for the transfer of the field to the minor but the transfer has not yet been completed. The differ as regards the details of the consideration and other points. For the minor respondent it was urged that the terms of the compromise were fully set out in the Isarpatti. Objection was taken to the decree-holder's allegations varying the terms of that document. It was also pleaded that this document was intended to extinguish the decree unconditionally. The decree-holder on his part pointed out that sanction or leave of the Court was not obtained by the guardian before entering into the compromise; and the agreement, it was pleaded was therefore void under O. 32, R. 6 and 7. It was also urged that the judgment-debtor was barred by the provisions of Art. 174, Lim. Act. The first Court held that the agreement could not be enforced as the sanction of the Court was not obtained. It held on the authority of Vinayachandran v. Shidappa (1) that O. 32, R. 6 and 7, applied to execution proceedings. On these findings the decree-holder's application was allowed.

On appeal the District Judge correctly pointed out that under O. 32, R. 1, sub-S. 2, the agreement or compromise entered into without leave of the Court is voidable against all parties other than a minor. The case has been remanded for further inquiry into the alleged adjustment. Against this order the decree-holder has filed this appeal. It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the lower appellate Court's view that there has been an adjustment within the meaning of O. 21, R. 2, is erroneous, as, for it is argued for the respondent that the rule does not apply to a decree for possession. There is a conflict of opinion as to whether this rule applies to a decree other than a decree under which money is payable. The argument of the respondent is supported by Sankaraj Nambiar v. Kanara Kurup (2), which limits the application of the rule to decrees for money. On the other hand, the High Court of Calcutta has taken the opposite view: Habu Mohamed v. Weli (3), Laxar Chandra Dutt v. Haris Chandra Dutt (4). The Calcutta view has been followed in the Punjab, Lachar v. Nishan Lal (5). In the present case the decree was partly for money. It is unnecessary to decide in this case which view should be followed. But even upon the Calcutta view there has been in this case no adjustment of the decree, but only an agreement to adjust it: Jatindra Nath Roy v. Chandra Nath Banerjee (6). It is also clear that there has been no satisfaction of the decree within the meaning of S. 47, Civil P. C. O. 23, R. 3, which relates to compromise of a suit, is inapplicable to execution proceedings as laid down in O. 23, R. 4.

Whether the plea of the judgment-debtor is an adjustment within the meaning of O. 21, R. 2, or a satisfaction within the meaning of S. 47, is either way his plea fails as a complete answer to the application. The Paragatti filed by the defendant provides that a deed should be executed by the '00 within 20th March 1916. There is nothing in that document to suggest that the decree-holder gave up his rights under the decree upon the mere execution of the document. The decree-holder was willing to give up his rights provided he received the balance of his consideration money within the time stipulated. The contract was an executory one. It was not capable of being specifically enforced for want of mutuality. It is not within the competence of the guardian of a minor to bind the minor or his estate by a contract for the purchase of immovable property and specific performance of such a contract cannot be decreed even at the instance of the minor for want of mutuality. Mir Sarwarjan v. Fakhreddin Mohamed (7). If a deed of conveyance had been executed and registered, it could not have been impeached by the decree-holder for want of sanction under O. 32, R. 6. But where no such deed has been completed a minor for want of mutuality cannot force a decree-holder to accept or give him such a deed, since the decree-holder, in the absence of the sanction of the Court to the agreement, cannot specifically enforce it. This follows from the principle of mutuality laid down in the above case by the Privy Council. I note that the alleged tender of Rs. 525 has not been followed by a deposit in Court, as it should have been, for the District Judge's view that if the tender is proved the application for execution should be dismissed is erroneous.

There is no allegation of fraud which prevented the guardian from applying under O. 21, R. 2 (2). The guardian did not take steps within the time allowed by Art. 174. The recent Bombay case cited by the lower appellate Court Hansa Godhaji v. Bhawa Jogaji (8) even if correctly decided, is easily distinguishable. There fraud was admitted inasmuch as the money under the decree had been paid out of Court. In this case there is no allegation of payment but only of a tender. A breach of contract is all that has been pleaded. The decree holder is willing to give credit for Rs. 25 received as earnest money. I can therefore see no fraud of the kind contemplated in the Bombay judgment so as to justify the Court in not giving effect to the plain provisions of O. 21, R. 2 (3). The result is that the judgment-debtor is not entitled to enforce the contract alleged. The adjustment was not certified to the Court within time and cannot be recognized by the executing Court. Moreover, the facts alleged do not amount to an adjustment or satisfaction of the decree. The order of the Divisional Judge is set aside and that of the first Court restored. Costs in both the appellate Courts are to be paid by the respondents.

v.

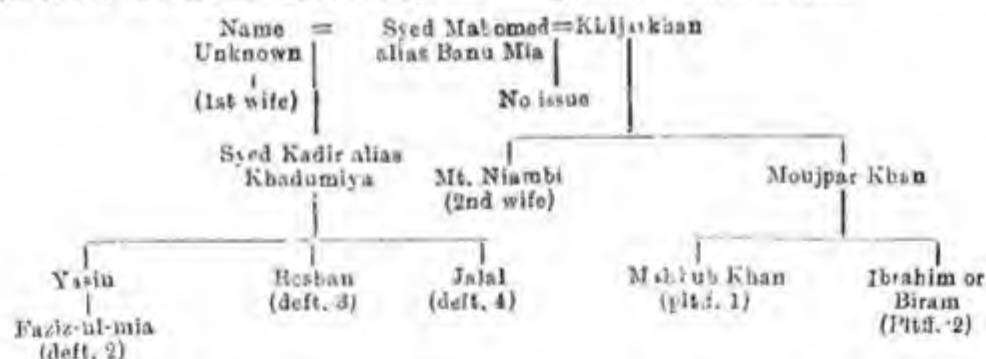

Maheboobkhan and others—Plaintiffs—Respondents.

Second Appeal No. 318 of 1910, Decided on 23rd December 1910.

Civil P. C (1908), S. 11—Representation—Right or title of legal representative decided—Subsequent suit by them on their independent rights is barred.

The right of the legal representatives of a person whose right or title to property is decided in a suit stands concluded by that suit and a subsequent suit by them on foot of their independent rights to the same property is barred by the rule of res judicata. [P 113 C 1, 2]

Judgment.—The following genealogical tree shows how the parties related to one another and should facilitate comprehension of the facts:

Defendant 1 Syed Kasam, apparently represents the head branch of this family and is a cousin, several degrees removed of Syed Mahomed. At any rate he holds and collects all the income of two jagir villages named Katora and Takli which are the property of the family. The facts antecedent to the litigation out of which this appeal has arisen are given in my judgment (as Judicial Commissioner of Berar) in Regular Appeal No. 47 of 1904, given on 30th June 1905. It is necessary to advert briefly to that case, which was the first of a series for which Syed Kasam defendant 1 also known as Gabru Mia is mainly responsible, by his failure to pay to Mt. Niambi her acknowledged of the Jagir income. That share consisted of 1/32nd inherited by Niambi from her husband and another 1/32nd allowed to her apparently in lieu of her claim for dower. Up to the year 1892 this 1/16th or one-anna share seems to have been paid to her without dispute since her husband's death over quarter of a century before, but since 1892 the share has been unobtainable from Syed Kasam except by suit, and he has denied the title of Niambi and also pleaded payment of her share to the male descendants of her husband. In 1896 Niambi filed a suit being suit No. 61 of 1896 in the Court of the Sub Judge of Amraoti, claiming her one-anna share of the income from Syed Karim for the Fasli years 1302, 1303 and 1304 at Rs. 250 a year plus Rs. 177-8-0 interest thereon, or Rs. 927-8-0 in all. Syed Kasam and Yasin, the eldest son of Syed Kadir were originally impleaded as defendants, but Roshan and Jalal were subsequently joined. That case was not decided till 9th December 1903. In the meanwhile Mt. Niambi and Yasin had both died, and the present plaintiffs had come in as the legal representatives of the former, while Farzulmia had replaced the latter. The Subordinate Judge found Niambi with a good title to a one-anna share and found the money value of that share to be Rs. 686.3.10 for the three years in dispute before him. He disallowed the claim for interest and gave the plaintiffs a decree for Rs. 686.3.10 and proportionate costs. The defendant Syed Kasam alone appealed against the decree to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Berar, and the case came before me as Regular Appeal No. 47 of 1914, already mentioned. In that appeal I held: (1) that Niambi had inherited a half-anna share out of the admitted four-annas share of her deceased husband, and that this share devolved upon her heirs; (2) that Niambi was further entitled to another half-anna share under a valid family arrangement, but only until her death in 1897 A. D., such further share not being heritable but subject to lapse; (3) that the present plaintiffs are the heirs-at-law of Niambi; (4) that Syed Kasam as manager of the jagir and sole collector of the income was bound to make direct payment to each co-sharer or branch of co-sharers entitled to receive the same; (5) that Syed Kasam could not be discharged of his liability to Niambi or her legal representatives in respect of the share due to her or them by any payment made to the other defendants.

Meanwhile, on 1st April 1899, the present plaintiffs filed suit No. 99 of 1899 in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Amraoti, claiming a one-anna share in the jagir income from the same defendant for the Fasli years 1305, 1306, 1307 and 1308, that is, for the period immediately following that covered by Niambi's above suit. This case was still undecided when the Judicial Administration of Berar came under the Local Government of the Central Provinces and suit was given a fresh number as No. 143 of 1905. Nevertheless, it was not disposed of till 21st April 1903 when the plaintiffs were found entitled to the heritable half-anna share of Niambi and given a decree for Rs. 712.10.2 out of the Rs. 1000 claimed by them and Rs. 78.8.0 out of the Rs. 130 1.0 assessed as expended by them in costs. Syed Kasam appealed against this decree to the Court of the District Judge of East Berar (First Appeal No. 31) of 1908 and that appeal having been dismissed on 14th December 1903, he has made Second Appeal No. 319 of 1910 to this Court.

What happened to the plaintiff's share of profits for the fasli years 1309, 1310 and 1311, does not appear but on 10th January 1906, plaintiffs filed civil Suit No. 28 afterwards renumbered No. 119 of 1906 in the Court of the Sub-Judge of Amraoti claiming Rs. 100 as their share of the profits of Faslis 1312, 1313 and 1314. They obtained a decree against Syed Kasam for Rs. 367.8.0 on 7th October 1908. Syed Kasam made First Appeal No. 108 of 1909 to the Court of the District Judge of East Berar and this appeal was also dismissed with costs on 11th December 1909. Syed Kasam has therefore made second Appeal No. 318 of 1910 to this Court. Once again on 31st March 1908, the plaintiffs lodged civil Suit No. 113 of 1908 in the Amraoti Subordinate Judge's Court claiming Rs. 900 for the fasli years 1315, 1316 and 1317. On 15th May 1909, they obtained a decree for Rs. 355.10.6 and proportionate costs. Syed Kasam made First Appeal No. 167 of 1909 to the Dist. Judge of East Berar and that appeal was dismissed with costs on 13th December 1909. Thereupon Syed Kasam made Second Appeal No. 322 of 1910 in this Court. The above three Second Appeals Nos. 319, 318 and 322 have been heard together and this judgment will govern the disposal of all of them. There is no dispute, nor could there legally be any in this Court as to the money value of the share claimed by the plaintiff; the three appeals raise only the questions of plaintiff's title to a share.

The Courts below have held that question to be res judicata by my decision in Regular Appeal No. 47 of 1904 in the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Berar. That dictum alone was questioned in the three appeals now before me. A technical objection based on the Berar Pensions Act was expressly abandoned at the hearing. It was argued that the decision in the Appeal No. 47 was a decision as to the title of Niambi only and though Niambi died before it was given the plaintiffs stood and succeeded as her legal representatives, and not as it were on their own feet. The suit of 1899, the earliest of the three cases now before me, was the first instituted by them in their own right and it was therefore open to appellant according to his learned counsel, to dispute their title to any share in the jagir income. In other words, it was urged that in Niambi's suit the plaintiffs merely became her representatives ad litem to allow of the suit being concluded, their own status as heirs-at-law to a share in the jagir income being left in the air. They got the decree that Niambi would have got if she had lived. This contention has no force. My former decision makes it clear that the plaintiffs were expressly found after contest to be Niambi's heirs and as such entitled to succeed her as owners of her half anna heritable share. In that suit they also received, as her heirs and legal representatives, the income already accrued due to her for her other half anna non-heritable share the right to that part of the income ceased with her death, but the finding in her favour as to the heritable half-anna share was in law a finding in favour of her and her heirs and the plaintiffs were expressly found to be such heirs. Their title has therefore rightly been treated as res judicata, and Syed Kasim is throwing away money in a hopeless struggle against that title. The three appeals now before me must all fail. For the above reasons this appeal is dismissed with costs of plaintiffs respondents on appellant. Other respondents pay their own costs.

Second Appeal No. 87.B of 1915, Decided on 20th November 1915, from decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Akola, D/- 22nd October 1914.

(a) Evidence Act (1872), S. 90 — Ancient document — Rule of presumption must be applied with exceeding caution.

The rule of presumption embodied in S. 90 must be applied with exceeding caution in India, where forgery and fraud are not of rare occurrence. The necessity for such caution makes it necessary to give a strict and narrow, and not a loose and liberal, interpretation to the provisions of the law. [P 118 C1]

(b) Evidence Act (1872), S. 90 — S. 90 limits power of Court to dispense with proof of execution to ancient documents produced—Provision cannot be enlarged.

The Legislature, by the plain language used in S. 90, has limited the power of the Court to dispense with proof of the execution of documents relied on as evidence, to ancient documents produced in Court at the trial; and the Courts in India have no power to enlarge this legislative provision so as to apply it to cases clearly outside the enactment. [P 119 C2]

* (c) Evidence Act (1872), S. 90 — Law makes production of document sine qua non for application of S. 90.

The law makes the production of the document a sine qua non for the application of S. 90. [P 120 C1]

Every ancient document for which a presumption of due execution is claimed, must be produced before the tribunal which is asked to make the presumption in its favour, so as to place it in a position to see for itself whether it bears upon the face of it such indications as convince the mind that it is genuine or "ostrays from some anachronism or other inconsistency" that it is a fabrication: Case law considered. [P 117 C2]

(d) Evidence Act (1872), S. 90 — Custody — Strict proof is necessary—Execution and registration of sale-deed in Berar — Possession of property purported to be sold kept with vendor — Custody of deed cannot be presumed to be with vendee.

It is the duty of a party, who claims that an ancient document should be presumed to have been executed, to prove by clear evidence the fact of custody, in order that the Court may determine whether or not such custody was proper. [P 120 C1, 2]

The execution and registration of a deed of sale in Berar in favour of a person who does not take possession of the property which the deed purports to sell, but leaves it with the apparent vendor, raises no presumption that the apparent vendee ever had custody of the deed for the purposes of S. 90, Evidence Act. [P 121 C1]

(e) Interpretation of Statutes—Intention of Legislature — Effect must be given to plain language though it may conflict with intention.

In interpreting Statute Law in British India the Courts must give effect to the plain language employed by the Legislature, even if it conflicts with what they conceive to be the policy or the intention of the law. [P 119 C1]

* (f) Evidence Act (1872), S. 101 — Party unable to adduce evidence — Still it is not relieved against necessity of giving legal proof.

While the law of evidence is designed to render the utmost assistance in the discovery of the truth, it does not relieve against the necessity of giving legal proof any party who may be unable to adduce evidence. [P 119 C1]

* (g) Evidence Act (1872), S. 90 — Every legislative exception must be literally and stringently construed — Interpretation of Statutes.

It is one of the canons of interpretation that every legislative exception to a general rule of law must be literally and stringently construed, and that there is no justification for extending it by analogy to include cases not reasonably within the purview of the language employed.

Judgment.—The facts of this case are given in detail in the judgment of the lower appellate Court, but a synopsis of them is necessary to appreciate the questions of law involved in this appeal. The property in dispute is a house in the Akola District of West Berar which once belonged to one Ratanchand, who has now been dead for many years. The plaintiff, who represents a sect of Gujarathi Jains, having a temple to the north of the said house, claims title under a deed of sale, dated 13th February 1895, executed by Gulab Bai, the widow of Ratanchand, the allegation being that Gulab Bai continued to occupy the house after the sale as tenant of the plaintiff till July 1900 when the defendants wrongfully ejected her. The defendants represent another sect of Gujarathi Jains, having a temple to the south of the house in dispute, which thus lies between the properties of the rival litigants. The defendants' pleadings varied at different stages of the trial, but may now be stated thus: Ratanchand sold the house to one Popatlal on 14th February 1874; Ratanchand and Gulab Bai continued to hold possession as the tenants of Popatlal, rent free, upon consideration of keeping the premises in repair; and Popatlal sold the house to the defendants on 13th April 1894. The plaintiff denied the sales; he objected to Popatlal's deed of 1894 as not duly registered; he asserted that though Popatlal may have contracted to sell to the defendants in 1894, the contract fell through owing to the failure of the defendants to pay the price within the time stipulated; and he pleaded that any title Popatlal acquired by his alleged purchase in 1874, was extinguished by the adverse possession of Ratanchand and his widow and heir, from 1874 to 1900. The suit out of which this appeal has arisen was filed on 13th August 1907. It was decided by the first Court on 6th December 1911 and by the lower appellate Court on 22nd October 1914. Both Courts concurred in dismissing the suit, and the plaintiff has made the present appeal.

In its judgment the lower appellate Court has set out the findings of the first Court in these words:

(1) "That the sale-deed, dated 13th February 1895, executed by Gulab Bai in favour of the plaintiff was proved; (2) that the defendants could give secondary evidence of the transfer in favour of Popatlal, as Popatlal was dead and his son stated that he could not find the sale-deed; (3) that the sale-deed of Popatlal being 30 years old and its copy having been produced its genuineness was presumed (4); that Ratanchand executed the sale-deed and sold the house to Popatlal on 14th February 1874; (5) that Ratanchand till his death and after him his widow Gulab Bai occupied the house as tenants of Popatlal; (6) that Gulab Bai had no title to transfer the house to the plaintiff."

In these findings the lower appellate Court concurred. It also recorded further findings as given below:

(7) That the occupation of Gulab Bai extended without interruption till the defendants ejected her in 1900; (8) that the deed of 1894 executed by Popatlal was duly registered; (9) that there was no agreement fixing a time for payment of the price by the defendants to Popatlal, and payment was duly tendered though acceptance was refused at the time of registration; (10) that non-payment of the purchase-money did not invalidate the sale.

In accordance with these findings, and certain other findings on technical objections which require no mention here the plaintiff's appeal was dismissed by the lower appellate Court.

In second appeal the objections taken may be summarised in these words:

1. That the defendant's title-deed of 1894 was not registered; 2. That their failure to pay the price vacated the contract to sell. 3. That the possession of Ratanchand and Gulab Bai should have been held adverse to Popatlal. It will thus be seen that no objection was taken to the procedure of the Courts below in applying S. 90, Evidence Act, to this case; but as it seemed to me that my decision of the appeal might be materially affected by a consideration of that matter I gave full opportunity to the parties to argue the point, and advantage having been taken of it, I am competent under O. 41, R. 2, Civil P. C. to rest my decision upon the conclusion which I may form in respect to the law connected therewith.

It will be seen that the title set up by the defendants primarily rests upon proof of the fact that on 14th February 1874 Ratanchand sold the house in dispute to Popatlal. The allegation is that the sale was effected by a deed duly registered. The original of that deed should now be in the hands of the defendants. It has not been produced, and in the pleadings the defendants made no statement as to what had become of it. It is now admitted that the deed was never delivered by Popatlal to the defendants. The defendants called Senlal (D. W. 11), the son of Popatlal, as a witness. He was adopted as a son by Popatlal's widow after Popatlal's death, which took place in 1903. He was asked to produce the sale-deed of 1874, and a rent note said to have been executed by Ratanchand. He said he could not find them. He had evidently never seen them. This has been accepted in the Courts below as sufficient to prove that the original sale-deed has been lost. Kanhayalal (P. W. 11), is one of the defendants. He was evidently called to prove that there was an agreement between Popatlal and the defendants regarding payment of the consideration of the sale of 1894. In the course of his testimony this witness made the following statements:

"The house in dispute originally belonged to Ratanchand * * * Popatlal sold the house to me 15 or 16 years ago. As Popatlal held a sale-deed of the house and other property, I took the sale of the house from him * * *. The sale in favour of Popatlal by Ratanchand was not executed in my presence. I saw the deed for the first time when Popatlal executed the sale in my favour * * *. The original sale-deed by Ratanchand in favour of Popatlal may be with the latter. The rent note referred to in that sale-deed is not with me. It was with Popatlal."

This is all the available evidence on the record relating to the original other than can be obtained from Ex. D. 2, which is a certified copy of the copy of the original retained by the registering officer. This copy was obtained from the registration office by the defendants in 1907, obviously for the purposes of this suit. The endorsement upon the copy proves that an original was presented for registration by Popatlal on 14th February 1874, that execution of the original was admitted by a person identified to be Ratanchand Hirachand, Guzrathi of Balapur in the Balapur taluk of the Akola District, and that the document was duly registered. It is also fair to presume that the original document was returned to the custody of the person who produced it, though there is no entry to that effect in the registration record now before me. It will be remembered that Ex. D-2, is not a copy of any part of the original document. It is a copy made in 1907 of a copy made from the original deed and its endorsements at the time of registration in 1874. It is to such facts that the Courts below have applied S. 90, Evidence Act, and have presumed not only that Ratanchand, the owner of the house in dispute, executed and registered an original in the terms set out in Ex. D-2, but also that he thereby actually sold everything which the document purports to transfer to Popatlal. It is very obvious that there has been some confusion between secondary evidence of a lost original admissible under S. 65, Evidence Act, and a presumption under S. 90 of that Act in favour of the lost original based upon a copy thereof, and I wish to make it clear that I am now dealing only with the question of the applicability of S. 90 of the enactment. That section is worded thus:

"Where any document, purporting or proved to be thirty years old, is produced from any custody which the Court in the particular case considers proper, the Court may presume that the signature and every other part of such document which purports to be in the handwriting of any particular person, is in that person's handwriting, and in the case of a document executed or attested, that it was duly executed and attested by the persons by whom it purports to be executed and attested."

Explanation—Documents are said to be in proper custody if they are in the place in which and under the care of the person with whom, they would naturally be; but no custody is improper if it is proved to have a legitimate origin, or if the circumstances of the particular case are such as to render such an origin probable."

This explanation applies also to S. 81. I am alive to the danger of paraphrasing an enactment, and I have no intention of doing so in the present case when I say that the section requires in the most unambiguous language the presence of three conditions to bring it into operation, namely: (1) a document which purports or is proved to be 30 years old; (2) its production before the Court; and (3) its appearance from "proper custody" as defined in the section.

This provision of the law deals with an instance of what is sometimes called "real" evidence—that of which the tribunal itself is the original percipient witness. The Judge sees for himself that the appearance of the document, its paper ink, phraseology, handwriting and other things indicative of age are consistent with the claim that it is not less than 30 years old; and he then exercises his discretion in two matters, namely (1): as to the propriety of the custody from which the document is produced, and (2) as to the genuineness of the document. It is a fundamental rule of the law of evidence that in all cases the best evidence must be given and it is a rule which the legislature and the Courts jealously safeguard. It is simply an amplification of the obvious maxim that if a man wishes to know all that he can know about any matter, his own senses are to him the highest possible authority. If a 100 witnesses of unimpeachable character were all to swear to the contents of a sealed letter, and if the person who heard them swear opened the letter and found its contents were different, he would conclude, without the intervention of any conscious process of reasoning at all, that they had sworn what was not true. It is in obedience to this fundamental rule that "hearsay" is treated as practically synonymous with "irrelevant" for the purposes of the law of evidence. Now S. 90, Evidence Act, embodies an exception to the hearsay rule which has become established by judicial decisions in England, and in no way enlarges the scope of the exception recognized and laid down by the English Courts. It is therefore expedient to give some consideration to the English law on the point. The following remarks, taken from Taylor on Evidence, Edn. 10, are instructive and sufficient for our purpose:

"Another conclusive presumption made by the law is that in favour of the due execution of ancient deeds and wills. When these instruments are 30 years old, and are unblemished by any alterations, they (as it is said) prove themselves; their bare production is sufficient and the subscribing witnesses are conclusively taken to be dead * * *. But it must appear that the instrument comes from custody, which (even though it is not in point of law strictly proper) affords a reasonable presumption in favour of its genuineness; and that it is otherwise free from just ground of suspicion * * * (S. 87). The presumption in their favour, if they come from the proper custody, and purport to be 30 years old is not confined to deeds and wills but extends equally to letters, entries, receipts, settlement certificates, and indeed to all other written documents; and in such cases the signatures and handwriting need not be proved. The rule is founded on the great difficulty, nay impossibility, of proving the handwriting of the party after such a lapse of time. (S. 88). * * * A third exception to the general rule by which hearsay evidence is rejected, exists in favour of ancient documents (by which is meant documents more than 30 years old), when they are tendered in support of ancient possession. These are often the only attainable evidence of ancient possession, and therefore the law yielding to necessity allows them to be read on behalf of persons claiming under them, and against persons in no way privy to them. This species of proof demands careful scrutiny, for, first, its effect is to benefit those from whose custody they have been produced, and who are connected in interest with the original parties to the documents, and next, the documents are not proved, but are only presumed to have constituted part of the res gestæ.

Forgery and fraud are however matters comparatively speaking, of rare occurrence, and a fabricated deed generally betrays, from some anachronism or other inconsistency, internal evidence of its real character. The danger of admitting these documents is, consequently, less than might be supposed. It is more expedient to run some risk of occasional deception, than to permit injustice to be done by strict exclusion of what, in many cases, would turn out to be highly material evidence. On a balance of evils, this kind of proof has, subject to certain qualifications, for many years past been admitted. (S. 88). Before it is especially taken to ascertain the genuineness of the ancient documents produced; and then may in general be shown, prima facie, by proof that they come from the proper custody. (S. 89).

The leading case on the subject of proper custody is Bishop of Meath v. Marquess of Winchester (1), in which the character and description of custody were clearly defined by Tindal, C. J., and S. 90, Evidence Act, is obviously intended to reproduce as far as possible the principles laid down by that eminent Judge in respect of what is proper custody for the purposes of the section. It is manifest from the above quotation that the idea of making a presumption of execution in favour of ancient documents not produced or tendered in evidence is foreign to the English law, and that it is apparently assumed that every ancient document for which a presumption of due execution is claimed, must be produced before the tribunal which is asked to make the presumption in its favour, so as to place it in a position to see for itself whether it bears upon the face of it such indications as convince the mind that it is genuine, or "betrays from some anachronism or other inconsistency" that it is a fabrication. I have been unable to find any English case in which a Court was asked to make a presumption in favour of an ancient document which it does not see. It has repeatedly been held, and the soundness of the decision cannot be questioned that the rule of presumption embodied in S. 90, Evidence Act, must be applied with exceeding caution in India, where forgery and fraud cannot be said to be of rare occurrence: Phool Bibee v. Goor Surun Doss (2), Uggrakant v. Hurro Chunder (3), Trailokia Nath Shurno Chingoni (4), Raikunt Nath v. Lukhun Majhi (5), Timangavda v. Rangangavda (6), reported at p. 94 as a Note appended to Hari Chintaman v. Moro Lakshman (7). The relevant passage is at p. 98. It may be said that such decisions merely lay down a rule of caution and do not affect the scope of the enactment. It seems to me however that the necessity for such caution makes it necessary to give a strict and narrow, and not a loose and liberal, interpretation to the provisions of the law. Moreover, it is one of the canons of interpretation that every legislative exception to a general rule of the law must be literally and stringently construed, and that there is no justification for extending it by analogy to include cases not reasonable within the purview of the language employed. It seems to me that S. 90, Evidence Act, can apply only to documents produced before the tribunal invited to make the presumption which is allowed by the section in favour of them, and that it has been wholly misapplied in the present case. There is however authority against this view, and it is necessary to examine it. The first case is Khetter Chunder Mookerjee v. Khetter Paul Sreeterutno (8), which was decided by a single Judge. In that case a will was allegedly executed more than 30 years before the suit and was proved to have been lost.

A copy was tendered in evidence. Wilson, J., held that under S. 65, Evidence Act, the copy was admissible to prove the contents of the will: and that under S. 90 of the same enactment execution of the will could be presumed. The learned Judge's reasons for this extraordinary extension of the latter section are given in these words:

"Under the section the execution of a document produced from proper custody, and more than thirty years old, need not be proved, if the document 'is produced.' I do not think the use of these words limits the operation of the section to cases in which the document is actually produced in Court. I think that as the document has been shown to have been last in proper custody, and to have been lost, and is more than thirty years old, secondary evidence may be admitted without proof of the execution of the original."

The concluding passage seems to confuse the grounds for admitting secondary evidence with the grounds for presuming execution of the original. The dictum seems with due respect to be wholly irreconcilable with the plain meaning of the words of S. 90 and it is unsupported by any authority, English or Indian, dealing with presumptions relating to ancient documents. It cannot be claimed that a document which is lost is produced: nor can it be said in reason that a document which is proved to have existed is produced. Therefore the decision treats the words "is produced" as superfluous. It makes no pretence of giving them an extended meaning. In Ishri Prasad Singh v. Lalli Jas Kunwar (9) the document in question was a petition made to a Collector on 28th September 1831. This was held to have perished with the records of the Collectorate destroyed during the Mutiny of 1857. A certified copy granted on 20th October 1831, or less than a month after the original was filed, was produced in Court in proof of the original. It was held that the copy was admissible as secondary evidence, which cannot be questioned. It is also manifest that S. 90 applied to the copy itself since it was more than 30 years old that is, it could be presumed to be what it purported to be—a copy duly certified of an original document retained in a public record. There remained the question of a presumption under S. 90 in favour of the unproduced original. The learned Judge wrote:

"Under S. 90 we may presume that the document was duly executed. . . . To this it was objected that S. 90 does not apply so as to warrant the presumption in question where the original document is not produced in Court, and in support of this argument great stress is laid upon the word 'produced' in the section."

The dictum of Wilson, J., in the Calcutta case above examined was then referred to and the judgment proceeds:

"Although the matter is not free from doubt, we think that we should follow this ruling."

Here again we have no analysis of the subject. In a particularly strong case, upon the production of a certified copy, itself more than 30 years old, of an original forming part of a public record, the learned Judges yielded to the temptation of brushing aside what was the law in favour of what they considered ought to be the law for the purpose of doing justice in that particular case and they could give no better reason for that course than that another Judge had previously strained the law in the same way. No attempt was made to adjust the view taken to the language of the section. In a case of admitted doubt the Judges elected to follow the course which seem to them to be most consistent with truth and justice in the particular case before them. The ruling cannot be accepted as an authority upon an interpretation of the section. The fact that the original in this case was in fact filed in a Court would not satisfy the requirements of the section. The law demands the production of the document after it has become an ancient document. The above decisions were quoted with approval in Sawan Singh v. Karam Lal (11), where the learned Judge reproduced the concluding passage in the judgment of Wilson, J., already quoted above with a similar contention of secondary evidence and presumption under S. 90. The learned Judge wrote:

"To rule otherwise would, in my opinion, be to misunderstand the policy of the Legislature. The obvious intention of S. 90, Evidence Act, is not to make it too difficult for persons relying upon ancient documents to utilize these documents in proving their cases and if the section is not to be applied in cases where the original is lost that policy is not fully carried out for when the original is lost it is doubly difficult for the party concerned to prove the execution and handwriting and so on."

With due respect I would urge first that in interpreting statute law in British India the Courts must give effect to the plain language employed by the legislature even if it conflicts with what they conceive to be the policy or the intention of the law and next that while the law of the evidence is designed to render the utmost assistance in the discovery of the truth it does not relieve against the necessity of giving legal proof any party who may be unable to adduce evidence. If the argument of the learned Judge were carried to its logical conclusion it would amount to this that where a party is unable to prove his claim ipso facto it must be presumed to have been proved. I am unable to assent to any such proposition and I again point out that no attempt is made to find support for the view taken by the Punjab Court from any words appearing in the section itself. In Anpithara Pollar v. Gopal Panikhar (11) the Madras High Court refrained from extending any aid to the point but in Ponnambalal Parapattan v. Santaran Nair (12) a Division Bench following the Ceylon and Allahabad cases held that the presumption as to the genuineness of an ancient document under S. 90, Evidence Act, can be applied even where the original is not produced but only a copy is produced. The judgment in the latter case on the question under discussion is in these terms:

"Whether the Court should presume the genuineness of the document is a matter that depends on the special circumstances of each case and is not governed by the circumstances proved in regard to the missing document." It is thus the learned Judge was right in adhering to the principle laid in presuming that the document is genuine."

The document was filed in a public record and destroyed when the record was eliminated and a certified copy was produced in proof. So the case somewhat resembled the Allahabad case. But here as in the other cases the learned Judges lay down a rule for which they make no attempt to find any support in the language of the enactment. In all the above cases the Judges were a law to themselves. They did not interpret but legislated and with due respect I am unable to follow them. It seems to me indisputable that the legislature by the plain language used in S. 90, Evidence Act, has limited the power of the Court to dispense with proof of the execution of documents relied on as evidence to ancient documents produced in Court at the trial and that the Courts in India have no power to enlarge this legislative provision so as to apply it to cases clearly outside the enactment. Moreover even if such a course were permissible, it seems to me a most unwise and unsafe precedent to lay down that upon a production of a copy the Court may presume that some document it has never seen was in fact an ancient document was executed and attested by the persons whose names appear in the copy and was in proper custody when lost. Such a precedent would strike at the very root of the rule of caution above laid down. It would be easy to say that presumptions based on copies in the absence of originals would be confined to special cases such as that before the Allahabad Court in the ruling above quoted and that the Courts must be trusted to act with due discretion. I cannot take that view. Once the precedent were laid down it would be followed in all manner of cases and become a substantial aid to fraud and forgery. It is however not necessary to labour the point as I am clear that the law makes the production of the ancient document at the trial a sine qua non for the application of S. 90.

For the above reasons I hold that the Courts below erred in applying S. 90, Evidence Act, in this case and as their judgments were influenced by presumptions which in law they were not competent to make they are open to reversal by this Court: Grant v. Byjnath (13).

But even if S. 90, Evidence Act, had been applicable upon the production of a copy, what evidence is there that the original deed of 1874 was in the custody of Popatlal at any time, even suppose we believe every word stated in regard to it by the defendant Kanhayalal (P. W. 11)? He says that Popatlal "held a sale-deed of the house." This may be merely a statement of what Popatlal told him. He also says that he "saw the deed for the first time when Popatlal executed the sale-deed" in his favour, but this does not show where and with whom the deed was at the time. It may be said that the evidence is vague because it was badly recorded and that the witness may reasonably be taken to have intended to convey that he saw the deed in the possession of Popatlal and satisfied himself that Popatlal had a title to pass at the time when the purchase of 1894 was made from him. But is it justifiable to presume not only that an ancient document is genuine but also that its custody must have been proper though the evidence relating to such custody is uncertain? It is the duty of a party who claims that an ancient document should be presumed to have been executed to prove by clear evidence the fact of custody in order that the Court may determine whether or not such custody was proper. In the present case custody should have been with the defendants. The lower appellate Court gets over that by stating that "it is not always that the purchaser takes the title-deed from his vendor in these parts of the country."

a statement for which there is no support to be found in any part of the evidence on record and which is not the rule where the vendor has at hand and produces his title deed at the time he makes his sale, as Popatlal is said to have done in this case. But suppose that the custody of Popatlal after 1894 was a proper custody for the purposes of S. 90 aforesaid. I am clear that the evidence on record is legally insufficient to prove the fact of such custody. It was said that ordinarily a title deed presumably delivered by the registering officer to the person who presented it for registration may further be presumed to have remained in that custody subsequently. I should not be prepared to make that presumption in regard to any such document in Berar. It is a matter of common knowledge, of which I am entitled to take notice that the people of Berar habitually execute and cause to be registered the most formal instruments which either represent no real transaction at all or give a wholly false colouring to the real agreement between the parties. As against the executors of such deeds it is no doubt the policy of the law to hold them bound by the writing, but for a collateral purpose, such as a presumption that the custody of a deed of sale must have been with the vendee the execution, registration and delivery of the deed by the Registering Officer afford no safe basis especially where as here there are circumstances which are contra-indicative of any delivery of the deed. Ex. D 2 may be taken as good secondary evidence of the contents of the original deed, and the registration endorsement may be taken as some evidence of the execution thereof: Gangamoyi Debi v. Trailuckhya Nath (14)—though I do not understand that case to rule that the endorsement is sufficient by itself to prove execution. But one of the most common forms of fictitious transactions in Berar is that by which an owner of property by the simultaneous execution of an apparent deed of sale and an apparent rent note or lease counterpart—no lease being executed—transforms himself into the apparent tenant of another.

Exhibit D-2 proves that the original purported to sell the dwelling house of Ratanchand and some unspecified movable property valued at Rs. 5 for Rs. 500 to Popatlal. It then recites that the vendor continues to occupy the house as the tenant of the vendee in accordance with the terms of a separately executed rent note. This rent note is also not forthcoming. There is not a shred of evidence beyond the recital that it was ever executed. Such recitals, like those as to delivery of possession, are habitually false or representative of a promise or intention never carried out. It is an admitted fact that Popatlal was a near relation of Ratanchand. It is also admitted, or at any rate well proved, that Popatlal never had physical possession of the house for a single day, that Ratanchand continued to use and occupy it as before, and that after his death, more than 12 years before the suit, his widow, Gulab Bai, succeeded to such possession and occupancy exactly as if by inheritance. Neither ever paid a rupee as rent to Popatlal or to the defendants. These being the circumstances, no Court would be justified in law in presuming that in 1894, when he executed the deed of sale in favour of the defendants, Popatlal had custody of the original deed executed in his favour twenty years before, even if it could be safely assumed that the Registering Officer returned the deed to him after registration.

My decision, therefore, amounts to this: (1) That no presumption can be made under S. 90, Evidence Act, 1872, as applied to Berar, in favour of any document unless such document is itself produced before the Court invited to make the presumption; (2) the execution and registration of a deed of sale in Berar in favour of a person who does not take possession of the property which the deed purports to sell but leaves it with the apparent vendor, raises no presumption that the apparent vendee ever had custody of the deed for the purposes of the above section. It follows from this that the foundation of the title relied on by the defendants fails, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed. Two other points were pressed on behalf of the appellant, and I will merely state them. It is an admitted fact that the defendants have never paid the price of the house to Popatlal or to his representatives, and that they have not filed the same in Court or made any deposit of it. The deed of sale was executed by Popatlal on 13th April 1894; it was presented for registration by the defendants on 13th August 1894 before a Sub-Registrar whose original power to register expired on that day. Popatlal's attendance was subsequently secured by the issue of process. He appeared on 12th October 1894 and repudiated the deed on the ground that the agreement was that the price of the house was to be paid within one week of the execution of the deed, and as this was not performed, the sale had fallen through. The vendees offered to pay the price before the Sub-Registrar but Popatlal refused to receive it. The Sub-Registrar then registered the document. There is no evidence whatever to show that he obtained the sanction of the Registrar to do so after expiry of the four months to which his own jurisdiction extended. On these facts the conclusions for the appellant are:

(1) That the deed of 1894 is in law unregistered; (2) that the alleged sale to defendants remains a disputed agreement. It is not necessary to decide these points. The appeal is allowed. The decrees of the Courts below are reversed and the plaintiff will be given a decree for possession of the house in dispute. The defendants must pay and bear all costs throughout.

(b) C. P. Municipal Act (1903), S. 66 (1) and (3)—Delay by the Committee in passing order on notice under S. 66 (1) indicates sanction to construct.

Under S. 66 (3), C. P. Municipal Act, delay in passing orders on a valid notice given under S. 66 (1) of the Act may, if followed by a failure to reply to a written reminder, lead to a conclusion that the proposed building has been absolutely sanctioned. [P 122 C 1]

Order.—The applicant has been fined Rs. 5 for failing to remove an upper storey added to his house in the town of Nagpur without the sanction of the Municipal Committee. The notice to remove allowed only one day for removal, which on the face of it is an unreasonably short period. But apart from this the applicant pleaded before the trying Magistrate that he applied to the Municipal Committee for permission to build. In the face of this plea the trying Magistrate should have inquired and placed on record details of the application relied on. Under S. 66 (3), C. P. Municipal Act 1903, delay in passing orders on a valid notice given under S. 66 (1), ibid., may, if followed by failure to reply to a written reminder, lead to a conclusion that the proposed building has been absolutely sanctioned. As pointed by the learned District Magistrate, it is impossible from the trying Magistrate's meagre record to ascertain exactly what the defence set up was, much less to determine whether it is valid or not. Moreover the trying Magistrate is wrong in thinking that it suffices by way of giving reasons for conviction as required by S. 263, Criminal P. C., to state the bald fact that a notice to remove was disobeyed. That fact being found, it remains to add, as required by Cl. (h) of the last cited section, "a brief statement of the reasons therefor."

The sentence passed is also illegal. It requires the applicant to pay Rs. 1 per diem "until he removes the unsanctioned building," besides mulcting him in the fixed sum of Rs. 5. There is nothing in S. 139, Municipal Act, to justify such an order. That section lays down that in the case of a continuing breach a fine may be imposed for every day after the first during which the breach is proved to have persisted in. It is clear therefore that the daily fine which may be imposed must relate to a period anterior to the Magistrate's order of conviction. There cannot be punishment under the section for a breach still in futuro. The decision in Empress v. Gangaram (1), though based on S. 97, C. P. Municipal Act 1889, is in point and should have been followed by the trying Magistrate. The conviction and sentence are set aside and there must be a fresh trial at which the accused person's defence will be set out in such details as to enable this Court, if again moved in revision, to understand the nature of that defence and to decide whether in spite of it the accused is liable to punishment for not removing the upper storey objected to by the Municipal Committee. The trying Magistrate's attention is directed in this connexion to Emperor v. Bhikia (2). His omission to examine the complainant has already been brought to his notice.

Criminal Revn. No. 230 of 1914 Decided on 7th November 1914 against judgment and finding of Mag. First Class, Nagpur, in Criminal Case No. 33 of 1914 D/- 29th August 1914.

C. P. Municipal Act (1903), S. 152—Service of notice—Attestation of report by unofficial person is not necessary.

The law of service of notices contained in S. 152 does not require the report of service of notice to be attested by any unofficial person.

Order.—The applicant has been fined Rs. 20 under S. 139, C. P. Municipal Act 1903, for disobeying a direction given him by the Committee to alter and repair his privy. His defence was simply that he received no notice. The prosecution examined two witnesses, viz., the Sanitary Inspector and a havildar employed by the Committee, who deposed that the applicant refused to receive the notice which was consequently affixed in his presence to his house. It is now objected that independent persons, of whom the havildar deposed that some were present, should have been examined and that the Magistrate was wrong in disbelieving the defence witnesses called to show that the havildar about two months before the date (27th April last) of the alleged service tried to extort bangles worth Rs. 4 from the applicant without payment and failing joined in getting up this case. The Magistrate was mistaken in thinking both witnesses for the defence to be the servants of the applicant, but even if it be conceded that the havildar bore him a grudge, there seems to be no sort of ground for disbelieving the Sanitary Inspector against whom nothing specific is alleged. The law regarding service of such notices is contained in S. 152, Municipal Act and does not require the report of service to be attested by any unofficial person.

The fine is complained of as excessive, but it is well within the maximum limit imposed by S. 139 of the Act and the size and the style of the applicant's latrine indicate him to be a person of some standing. I decline to interfere. The application is rejected. The Magistrate's attention is directed to the ruling of this Court in Hamulnaray v. Chhindwara Municipality (1). His record should have shown that the notice served on the accused was issued under proper authority.

Gulzarsha Fakir — Accused — Appellant.

v.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Criminal Appeal No. 115 of 1915. Decided on 13th July 1915, from judgment of Addl. Sess. Judge, Wardha, D/- 21st May 1915.

Criminal Trial—Conviction—Moral conviction of guilt is not sufficient.

A finding based on a theory not merely unsupported by, but opposed to, the direct evidence available is bad in law. Similarly a moral conviction of guilt is no sufficient foundation for a verdict of guilt, unless it is based on substantial facts which lead to another reasonable conclusion than that the person charged is guilty: 5 W. R. 23 Cr. Appr. [P. 121 C. 1]

Judgment.—The appellant Gulzar Shah, a Mahomedan aged about 40, along with Godria Kunbi, aged about 20, was tried by the Additional Sessions Judge, Wardha, on a charge of raping Kisni Loharin, aged 25 years. Both were acquitted of that charge, but the appellant alone was convicted of having indecently assaulted Kisni with intent to outrage her modesty and sentenced under S. 354, I. P. C., to rigorous imprisonment for six months.

In an exhaustive judgment the learned Judge has given convincing reasons for holding that Kisni's story is untrue. Both the assessors held the same view, and further gave it as their opinion that no indecent assault was committed. In convicting the appellant under S. 354 the Additional Sessions Judge has been greatly influenced by the difficulty of explaining, in the defence set up, how an entirely false story came to be told by Kisni to the constable at her village the same night and again to the Sub-Inspector next day at noon.

There can be no doubt that Kisni started from Almur on the evening of Saturday the 20th March last. She sat with the appellant in his cart while Godria drove. Her account of how she came to do this has been rightly disbelieved. As to Gulzar there is perfectly credible evidence to support his story that his own object was to bring kuter from Eranwari, a village two miles from Almur. Eranwari contains a shrine of the goddess Boli and Gulzar says that Kisni took a lift in his cart to go there. No evidence whatever is forthcoming to show that Kisni reached Eranwari that evening. On the other hand, Walla Khatik and Aba Simpi (P. Ws. 3 and 2) support Kisni in her story that she returned to Almur with them from a spot only 1 1/4 miles from that village. Aba went to that spot on hearing a woman's cry for help, but saw no act amounting to an offence being committed: both Kisni and Gulzar were arranging their clothes and the former alleged that Gulzar had dishonoured her majhi izzat ghetli; whereupon he scolded Gulzar, who without speaking got into his cart and drove on with Godria towards Eranwari. Walla professes to have seen Gulzar on Kisni, but on this point he is undoubtedly lying: according to him Aba on coming up said nothing to anyone and Gulzar drove off at once towards Eranwari. Neither man lends any support to Kisni's allegation that Godria held her hand while Gulzar had connexion with her.

The Additional Sessions Judge has believed Aba's evidence in the main. Nevertheless he has come to a conclusion as to what happened in the cart, which is not supported by Aba's account of how Kisni described the incident immediately after its occurrence. According to that account Gulzar dragged Kisni out of the cart. The learned Judge's finding is :

"Gulzar began taking liberties with Kisni. She resented it, not because her morals were all correct or because she was unaccustomed to such treatment, but because there was another man in the cart. Even depraved woman have the ideas of decency. Gulzar, knowing her past history, did not expect an opposition from her and counted too much upon her loose character. Kisni, not liking the liberties which Gulzar was taking, got down. He too got down after her and began to lay his hands on her. She raised a cry and Walia and Aba arrived. Gulzar does not appear to have done anything more than this or gone beyond an ordinary indecent assault."

Now even Kisni herself did not suggest at the trial that any liberty was taken with her in the cart beyond preventing her from getting out. She deposed that she jumped out and was followed by Gulzar. That any violence was used or impropriety attempted in the cart seems to me most improbable, in view of the fact found by the Judge that Gofria was there and that by mere accident, not by design connected with any evil intention of Gulzar towards Kisni. If a finding not supported by positive evidence is to be adopted, it may very plausibly be urged that Walia, in his search for his lost sheep, came suddenly on Kisni and Gulzar in a compromising position and that Kisni invented her story to excuse herself. That Walia and Kisni are anything but strangers to each other is shown by Aba and believed by the Additional Sessions Judge.

Having given all the evidence my careful consideration, I conclude that it would be unsafe to uphold the conviction under S. 354, I. P. C., based as it is on a theory not merely unsupported by, but opposed to, the direct evidence available. The Additional Sessions Judge seems to have acted upon moral conviction that the appellant must have done something improper and thus to have been led into punishing him for a definite offence without being really able to indicate a definite act established by satisfactory evidence and constituting that offence. As remarked by Macpherson and Glover, JJ., in Queen v. Sorob Roy (1), a moral conviction of guilt is no sufficient foundation for a verdict of guilty, unless it is based on substantial facts which lead to no other reasonable conclusion than that the person charged is guilty. The appellant is accordingly acquitted and will forthwith be set at liberty.

Civil Revn. No. 286 of 1914, Decided on 7th November 1914, from decree of Small Cause Court, Judge, Wardha, D/- 23rd July 1914.

(a) Interpretation of Statutes—Statute providing special remedy—Common law remedy not expressly excluded—Person suing is entitled to elect to pursue either remedy.

In cases where a statute provides a special remedy for a right or liability already existing, unless the statute contains words which either expressly or by necessary implication exclude the common law remedy, the person suing has his election to pursue either that or the statutory remedy. [P 125 C 1]

(b) Cattle Trespass Act (1871), S. 22—Suit for damages for illegal seizure of cattle is not barred—Onus lies on defendant to show that seizure was justifiable.

In a suit for damages for illegal seizure of cattle the onus lies on the defendant to prove that the seizure was justifiable in law. [P 125 C 1]

Such a suit is not barred by reason of Ch. 5, Cattle Trespass Act, 1871, R. 279; 16 Cal. 159, Foll. 2 C. L. R. 314, not Foll. [P 125 C 1]

M. R. Bobde—for Applicant.

Judgment.—This application arises out of a suit brought on the Small Causes side of the Sub-Judge's Court at Wardha to recover damages for the illegal impounding of the non-applicant's cattle. The learned Judge threw on the defendant the burden of justifying the admitted seizure and confinement of the cattle and disbelieving the evidence adduced to prove that the animals when seized were eating hay belonging to the defendant's employer decreed the claim. This Court is asked to interfere on three grounds, which may be briefly stated thus:

(1) The burden lay on the plaintiff to prove the illegality he alleged. (2) The suit is barred by reason of Ch. 5, Cattle Trespass Act, 1871. (3) The defendant's witnesses should have been believed. The first contention is rested on S. 101, Evidence Act, which runs as follows:

"Whoever desires any Court to give judgment as to any legal right or liability dependent on its existence of facts which he asserts, must prove that those facts exist."

Now it is true that the plaintiff has included in his plaint a statement that the seizure of his cattle was illegal. His story is that when taken they were lying under a tree in the village jungle. Prima facie to deprive a man of his property by disturbing his possession is to do him a legal wrong and so to give him a cause of action in tort. To use the words of the Privy Council in Rogers v. Rajendro Dutt (1), such an act "prejudicially affected the plaintiff in some legal right." The defendant sought to justify the seizure in the manner already stated, and had no evidence been given on either side, the defendant, who in substance stated the affirmative, would have failed, S. 102, Evidence Act being applicable. I hold therefore that the case was correctly laid by the lower Court.

Upon the second point the authorities are opposed to the applicant's contention. I refer to Nomaz Mollah v. Lall Mohun Tegadger (2) and Shuttrughen Das Coomar v. Hokena Showtal (3). In the former the provision of law considered was S. 14, Act 3 of 1857 (an Act relating to trespasses by cattle), but the terms of that section correspond closely with those of Ch. 5, Cattle Trespass Act, 1871. Aslem v. Kalla Burzi (4), the only case which favours the applicant, was not apparently argued before the High Court, a consideration which weighed with the Judges who decided the later Calcutta case above cited. The applicant relies on Jagannath v. Khuba (5), where however the Statute to be considered creates a liability not existing at common law and gives also a particular remedy for enforcing it. The present case belongs to an entirely different class, which consists of cases where a special remedy is provided for a right or liability already existing. In the latter class, unless the statute contains words which expressly or by necessary implication exclude the common law remedy, the party suing has his election to pursue either that or the statutory remedy. This general rule finds expression in S. 91, Civil P. C., which lays down that Courts shall have jurisdiction to try all suits of a civil nature excepting suits of which the cognizance is either expressly or impliedly barred. It was applied in Krishna v. Reade (6), where it was held that the summary remedy provided by Act 9 of 1861 does not bar a suit by a Hindu father to recover possession of his minor son alleged to be illegally detained by the defendant, a view which was also taken by Broughton, J., in the earlier case of In the matter of the petition of Kashi Chander Sen (7). I would also refer to the comparatively recent decision of a Full Bench of the Madras High Court in Zamindar of Ettappapuram v. Sankarappa Reddiar (8), which affirms the correctness of the following general principle laid down in an earlier Full Bench decision:

"When a statute is confirmatory of a pre-existing right the new remedy is presumed as cumulative or alternative unless an intention to the contrary appears from some other part of the statute."

With regard to the difficulty noticed in Aslem v. Kalla Burzi (1), namely that Ch. 7, Cattle Trespass Act, 1871, reserves the right of filing a civil suit only in the case specified, I think the Legislature clearly intended to make the special remedy afforded by the Act in that case cumulative, while leaving the remedy under Ch. 5 as merely an alternative one. There remains the merits of the applicant's defence. As to these I have to observe that the person who took the animals to the pound, viz., the defendant, himself did not enter the witness-box, while his witnesses admittedly did nothing to prevent the trespass by the plaintiff's cattle though working close by. The lower Court had the great advantage of noticing the demeanour of those witnesses and I am not prepared to upset his decision that they had been tutored. The application fails on all points and is dismissed without notice to the opposite party.

Court-fees Act (1870), S. 19, Cl. (17)—Petition of appeal by prisoner presented by pleader is exempted.

A petition of appeal presented by a prisoner not personally but through his pleader is exempted from court-fees under Cl. (17), S. 19.

[P 126 C 1]

Judgment—This is a reference by the Sessions Judge under S. 438, Criminal P. C., questioning the propriety of an order by the District Magistrate returning to the prisoner's counsel an appeal presented on behalf of a prisoner in jail on the ground that the appeal petition was not stamped with a court-fee stamp. The District Magistrate was called upon to show cause why his order should not be set aside and why he should not be directed to dispose of the appeal according to law with reference to Cl. 17, S. 19, Court-fees Act. The section and clause read together provide that "nothing contained in this Act shall render chargeable with any fee a petition by a prisoner or other person in durance or under restraint of any Court or of its officers."

The District Magistrate supports his order as follows:

"Interpreting the clause strictly I am of opinion that a petition by a counsel on behalf of such a person is not a petition by him but one on his behalf."

It is the practice of this Court to accept petitions, whether appeals or other applications, presented by counsel on behalf of a prisoner without any court fees stamp, on the authority of Cl. 17, S. 19, Court-fees Act. In Kali Prasad Banerji v. Gisborne and Co. (1), it was held that the clause applied to a petition presented by a prisoner not personally but by his vakil. This supports the practice of this Court, and the order of the District Magistrate was in my view erroneous. The order of the District Magistrate is set aside. He will admit the petition of appeal and dispose of it according to law.

v.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Criminal Revn. No. 51 of 1918, Decided on 23rd April 1918, from order of First Class Magistrate, Khandwa, D/- 22nd February 1918.

Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 403 (1)—First trial void ab initio owing to absence of complaint—Fresh trial is not barred under S. 403 (1).

The phrase "has once been tried by a Court of competent jurisdiction" in S. 403, sub-S. (1), Criminal P. C., is not one which limits the application of the provision to reasons affecting the nature or ordinary powers of the Tribunal. It is wide enough to cover a case where the first trial was ab initio void owing to the absence of a complaint. [P 128 C 1]

In such a case therefore S. 403 (1) is no bar to a fresh trial of the accused: 26 Mad 308, Diss. from; 29 All 293, Foll. [P 128 C 2]

Gupta—for Applicant.

G. P. Dick—for the Crown.

Order—The applicant Nanakram Agarwala applies for revision of the order, dated 22nd February 1918, of Mr. Gokul Parshad, First Class Magistrate, Khandwa, allowing a complaint of the Subordinate Judge to proceed against the applicant under S. 209 read with S. 109, I. P. C. It will be convenient to trace the earlier history of the present case. In Civil Suit No. 71 of 1915 the Subordinate Judge found that Nanakram had committed offences under Ss. 193 and 463, I. P. C. The Subordinate Judge accordingly took proceedings under S. 476, Criminal P. Code: the trying Magistrate found that an offence under S. 209 read with S. 109, I. P. C., had been committed and convicted the applicant accordingly. Thereafter an application on the revisional side was made to this Court and Prideaux, A. J. C., held that as no sanction for the prosecution of the applicant under S. 209 had been obtained and as the matter reached the Magistrate in the form of a complaint and not as a sanction, S. 195 (5) Criminal P. C., was not applicable and the trial was bad. It was further pointed out that, where there has been no complaint under S. 195, Criminal P. C., as regards the offence of which the applicant has been guilty, the absence of a complaint is not a mere curable irregularity but the trial is bad ab initio. Prideaux, A. J. C., accordingly set aside the conviction and the sentence. Thereafter the Subordinate Judge, Khandwa, filed a complaint under Ss. 209 and 109, I. P. C., and the applicant was again put on his trial as a result of the order of the First Class Magistrate, dated 22nd February 1918, which is the subject of the present revision application.

This application, as presented, disclosed two main grounds for revision but the second one was not pressed and I am concerned only with the first which is to the effect that S. 403, Criminal P. C., was a bar to a fresh trial. It may, first of all, be pointed out that Prideaux, A. J. C., did not in terms acquit the applicant; all he did was to set aside the conviction and sentence. I do not think however that there is here involved anything more than a question of mere terminology. There could have been no discharge of the accused, a charge having been framed, and although the actual term was not used, the order of Prideaux, A. J. C., is, for all purposes, equivalent to an acquittal of the applicant. That this is so, is also clear from another point of view. The High Court acting under S. 439, Criminal P. C., may exercise the powers conferred on a Court of appeal under S. 423, and the latter provision contemplates in an appeal from a conviction the reversing of the finding and sentence and the acquittal or discharge of the accused. There is, in short, no infernaliste power conferred by which the Court of appeal may set aside a finding and sentence and yet not acquit the accused, thus leaving closed to him the benefit which S. 403, Criminal P. C., accordingly confers.

I pass from this preliminary matter to the far more important question involved in this case. Assuming that the order of Prideaux, A. J. C., was an acquittal or some thing equivalent thereto, does S. 403, Criminal P. C., bar the fresh trial? The learned counsel for applicant has urged in this connexion that the various decisions which are quoted in the Magistrate's order as authority for his proceeding with the trial were for the most part inapplicable, and it has been urged in particular that the words "who has once been tried by a Court of competent jurisdiction" in S. 403, sub S. (1), must have reference to the character and status of the Court and not to any extrinsic circumstance which may render the first trial bad, as in this case the absence of a complaint did. Considerable stress has been laid in this connexion on the decision of Sundara Aiyar and Ayling, JJ., in Ganapathi Bhatta v. Emperor (1). In this case the accused had been convicted under S. 211, I P. C., but the conviction had been quashed by the High Court on the ground that an offence under S. 182 and not under S. 211 had been committed and no sanction in respect of the former offence had been obtained. After a fresh sanction had been obtained, a fresh prosecution was initiated but the above Justices held that it was barred under S. 403 (1), Criminal P. C. The learned standing counsel, on behalf of the Crown, has pointed out correctly enough that the Madras case is distinguishable from the present one, in that the question involved in the Madras decision was one of want of sanction while in the present case there was the fundamental and fatal flaw of the absence of a complaint on which the whole subsequent proceedings should have been based. The absence of a sanction under S. 195, Criminal P. C., is curable under S. 537, ibem, but the absence of complaint is a fatal flaw and vitiates the trial ab initio. All the same the language of the two Justices at page 314 (of 26 Mad) of the report suggests that even in the present case they would have been prepared to hold that S. 403, sub-S. (1), is a bar to the fresh trial for the ratio decidendi of the judgment is to be found in the opinion that the question of competent jurisdiction referred to in sub-Ss. (1) and (4), has reference only to the character and status of the tribunal and not to the absence of any condition essential and precedent to the institution of proceedings before the tribunal. That the absence of a complaint would come under the latter category is clear enough. If however I am correct in supposing that the Madras decision referred to goes as far as I think it does I am with all deference unable to accept the opinion of the learned Justices concerned as one to be followed implicitly. While the question of competency of jurisdiction referred to in sub-Ss. (1) and (4), S. 403, will in the great majority of cases have reference only to the character and status of the tribunal, yet in my opinion the language of the provision is wide enough to apply and to be intended to apply, to cases like the present where there has been a fatal fault ab initio in the trial and where in consequence, the trial has been radically bad. This view has been taken by Knox, J., in Hasain Khan v. Emperor (2) in which case he held that as there had been no permission of a Registering Officer under S. 83, Registration Act, 1908, for the initiation of a prosecution that prosecution was bad or in other words the Court had no competent jurisdiction and a fresh trial lay in spite of the provisions of S. 403, Criminal P. C. Unfortunately the learned Justice has not in the decision quoted discussed in detail the question of law involved.

It may be of interest to look very briefly at the matter from a more fundamental point of view. What is the underlying principle of S. 403, Criminal P. C. This provision is undoubtedly an attempt to give statutory expression to the principle of autrefois convict and autrefois acquit. The Legislature has attempted to secure that a man who has once been tried and acquitted for an offence shall not be again put on trial for the same offence if he was "in jeopardy" at the first trial. Now for an accused so to have been "in jeopardy" there are other essential and precedent conditions besides the mere status and character of the tribunal. Two obvious ones are that the complaint or indictment must have been a good one and the trial must have been on the merits. If the language of the learned Justices in the Madras decision referred to above were to be interpreted strictly, it would probably be impossible to put on his trial again under that interpretation of the law a man who had once been acquitted although clear proof was forthcoming that the tribunal had been bribed by him to acquit him and that there had been no trial on the merits. Now looking to the language of S. 403, sub-S. (1), it seems to me that the phrase "has once been tried by a Court of competent jurisdiction" which occurs therein is not one which limits the application of the provision to reasons affecting the nature or ordinary powers of the tribunal. The phrase is in my opinion, wide enough to cover also a case like the present where the first trial was ab initio void owing to the absence of a complaint. If the contrary were the case I should have expected to find that the language of the provision would have been more limited and specific.

Now in the present case what is the position? This Court has found it necessary to set aside the original trial as a fundamentally bad one. The Magistrate had had in reality no jurisdiction to try the man at all because of the fundamental defect in the case, the want of complaint. The applicant, in short so long as he was detained in custody or on bail under the first conviction was in this position under what was in reality a faulty authority, for there had been no real and good trial and a fortiori there was no good conviction the Magistrate in the first Court not having been seized of the case at all. In the present case therefore I am of opinion for the reasons, given above that S. 403, Criminal P. C., is no bar to the retrial of the applicant, for the simple reason that the first Court was not a Court of competent jurisdiction to try him. The application for revision is accordingly dismissed and the criminal proceedings in the Magistrate's Court may go on.

Civil Revn. No. 114 of 1915, Decided on 21st June 1916, against judgment and decree of Small C. C. J., Drug, D/- 30th January 1915, in Suit No. 546 of 1914.

Tort — Malicious Proceedings — Illegal seizure — Onus is on defendant to show that seizure was legal.

In a suit for damages for wrongful seizure of cattle the burden is on the defendant to prove that the seizure was legal. [P 129 C 1]

M. R. Bobde—for Applicant.

G. P. Dick—for Non-Applicant.

Judgment.—The plaintiff sues for damages for wrongful impounding of his cattle by the defendant. The latter admits the seizure, but pleads that he was justified in law as he found the cattle grazing in his jungle. The lower Court has found that there is no satisfactory evidence to show that the cattle were grazing in the defendant's jungle. It also found that the plaintiff has failed to prove that the seizure took place when the cattle were grazing in the plaintiff's jungle and therefore dismissed the suit. The defendant's costs were disallowed as he failed to prove his allegation. The sole question is whether the burden of proof lies on the plaintiffs to prove that the seizure was illegal or whether it is for the defendant to justify his seizure. The applicant for revision relies on an unreported ruling of this Court: Bala v. Vitlu, Civil Revision No. 286 of 1914 (1), which supports the view that it was for the defendant to justify the seizure. I entirely agree with the view taken by Sir Henry Drake Brockman in the latter case. I may point out that this is not a case of tort based on absence of legal process where an improper order has been procured from a competent authority. In such a case the burden lies heavily on the plaintiff to establish his case. This is an instance of self help in abatement of nuisance which the law allows. But the party taking the law into his own hands must justify his act, just as under the Penal Code the burden of proof lies on the party relying on the right of private defence. To hold otherwise would be contrary to principle. On the finding of the lower Court, the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for Rs. 19,12-0. The decree of the lower Court is set aside and a decree for Rs. 19,12-0 with costs in both Courts will be passed. I allow Rs. 16 as pleader's fee.

Second Appeal No. 80.B of 1914, Decided on 27th October 1914, against decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Akola, in C. A. No. 111 of 1913, D/- 11th November 1913.

* (a) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 96 (3), and O. 23, R. 3—Every decree incorporating compromise under O. 23, R. 3 is not ipso facto consent decree—it may deal with only part of subject matter of suit.

Every decree which has incorporated an agreement compromise or satisfaction ordered to be recorded under O. 23, R. 3, Civil P. C., is not ipso facto "a decree passed by the Court with the consent of parties" within the meaning of S. 96 (3) of the Code. It may deal only with a part of the subject-matter of the suit or it may be a contested agreement, compromise or satisfaction which has been the subject of an issue, trial and decision by the Court. [P 130 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 96—Sub-S. (3) is limited to cases where parties invite Court to pass particular decree and Court acts accordingly.

The right of appeal generally given against all decrees by S. 96, sub-ss. 1 and 2, Civil P. C., is only withheld by sub-S. (3) in the case of decrees passed with the consent of parties. Sub S. (3) is limited to cases where the parties invite the Court to pass a particular decree and the Court acts accordingly. [P 130 C 2]

(c) Civil P. C. (1908), S. 96 (3)—Decree based on finding against consent of one party is not consent decree.

A decree based on a finding arrived at by the Court against the consent of one party, to the effect that the matter in dispute has been compromised, is not a decree passed with the consent of parties and S. 96 (3) has therefore no application to it. [P 131 C 11]

(d) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 23, R. 3—Alleged compromise acted on by defendant pleaded as bar to suit—Dismissal of suit Decree is not under O. 23, R. 3.

Where an alleged compromise said to have been fully acted on by the defendant is pleaded in bar of a suit, and the Court holding that the plea is established dismisses the suit, the decree pronounced is not a decree under O. 23, R. 3. [P 131 C 11]

Judgment—It is necessary to state the facts of this case. Defendant 1 Onkar was also the defendant in a previous suit brought by the plaintiffs Mt. Renuka, Mt. Surji and Mt. Radhi. That suit reached this Court in the form of Second Appeal No. 121 B of 1912, which was filed by Defendant Onkar on 29th April 1912. On 17th August 1911 the plaintiffs filed the present suit against Onkar and Hanwadi and Praxman was subsequently added as a defendant 3. On 19th July 1912, after the manner of litigation in Berar the suit was still in a preliminary stage, no issues having been framed when the pleader for Onkar made the following statement before the Munsif:

"The matter in controversy between the parties has been compromised out of Court between plaintiff and defendant 1 between 17th June 1912 and 6th July 1912. There was an appeal pending between the present plaintiffs and defendant 1. It was agreed that defendant 1 should withdraw the appeal and the plaintiffs should withdraw this suit. Acting on this compromise defendant 1 withdrew his appeal about one month back. The suit can not therefore proceed."

To this the plaintiffs' pleader replied:

"There was no compromise like the one alleged by defendant 1."

The Munsif framed the following issue:

"Whether the suit has been compromised out of Court, as alleged by defendant 1."

Four witnesses were examined for the defendants, but Onkar himself did not venture into the box. One of the witnesses was the husband of the plaintiff Renuka. He denied that there had been any compromise of the suit. The other three witnesses supported the story of the defendant. The plaintiffs Radhi and

Sarji gave evidence that no compromise had taken place, though Radhi admitted that a proposal had been made to and refused by her. The Munsif held—as I shall hereafter show upon a material misapprehension of evidence—that the case had been compromised, and he dismissed the suit on 25th November 1912. He passed no decree in terms of the compromise as pleaded, but held that as a result of the agreement out of Court the suit could not proceed and he therefore dismissed it. Against this decree the plaintiffs appealed to the District Court, the appeal being filed on 16th April 1913. Meanwhile Second Appeal No. 121-B of 1912 in this Court had been pressed to a conclusion. No application was ever made to withdraw it. Onkar had engaged counsel who appeared on 28th January 1913 and argued it, the plaintiffs also appearing by counsel in response to it. The appeal was dismissed with costs on the same day, and a copy of this Court's judgment with the records was returned to the District Court in February 1913. It so happened that the Judge of first appeal in that case was Mr. Dighe, who also tried the first appeal in the present case. It was pointed out to him in vain that the whole foundation of the alleged compromise, namely that the defendant Onkar should first withdraw Second Appeal No. 121-B of 1912 and that he had done so was a falsehood. Mr. Dighe wrote:

"Whether the defendants have before the Judicial Commissioner's Court acted according to their part of the contract or not is not the gist of the point for our determination."

He concurred with the Munsif's findings in his usual superficial style—overlooking the patent errors to which I shall presently draw attention—and dismissed the appeal. The plaintiffs have now made this second appeal. A very intelligent and plausible argument was advanced on behalf of the respondents that no second appeal lies in this case. It was urged that every decree under O. 23, R. 3 is a "consent decree" within the meaning of that term under S. 96, sub-S. (3), Civil P. C., 1908. It was pointed out that O. 43, R. 1 (m), provides for an appeal against an order recording an agreement of compromise, and contended that this would be superfluous if an appeal was intended to be allowed against the decree based on such a compromise. It was further suggested that sub-S. 3 of S. 96 aforesaid was a substitute for that part of S. 375 of 1882 Code which enacted that a decree based on a compromise should be final. From this position it was argued that the appeal to the District Court must be taken to have been an appeal under O. 43, R. 1 (m), against the order recording the compromise, and no second appeal lies against the decree in that appeal. I am of opinion that this argument though specious is unsound. In the first place, every decree which has incorporated an agreement, compromise or satisfaction ordered to be recorded under O. 23, R. 3, is not ipso facto "a decree passed by the Court with the consent of parties." It may deal only with a part of the subject-matter of the suit or it may be a contested agreement, compromise or satisfaction which has been the subject of an issue, trial and decision by the Court.

If the legislature had intended that every decree made in pursuance of O. 43, R. 3, should be final, it would have repeated the provisions of S. 375 of the 1882 Code to that effect. Under that section there was a conflict of opinion as to whether compromises made out of Court, but afterwards repudiated could be made use of as the basis of a final decree under that section. The Allahabad High Court held that they could not be so used. The other High Courts held that they could, but introduced a rule of practice allowing appeals against findings in disputed cases: see Bandhu Bhagat v. Shah Muhammad Taqi (1), Brojodurlab Sinha v. Ramnath Ghose (2), Sridharan v. Pura-mathan (3) and Samibai v. Premji (4). The legislature has now decided to allow suits to be disposed of on all agreements, compromises and satisfactions proved, whether disputed or admitted, but it has removed the provision that all decrees based thereon shall be final. The right of appeal generally given against all decrees under S. 96, sub-Ss. (1) and (2), is only withheld by sub-S. (3) in the case of decrees passed with the consent of parties. The words are clear. It is the decree that must have the consent of the parties.

1. (1892) 14 All 350.
2. (1897) 24 Cal 903.
3. (1900) 23 Mad 101.
4. (1896) 20 Bom 304.

A restrictive provision like this must be strictly construed. It is limited to the case where the parties invite the Court to pass a particular decree, and the Court acts accordingly. That may be—it generally is—a case under O. 23, R. 3. But this enactment has now been extended to cases where the decree may be one based on a finding arrived at by the Court very much against the consent of one party. That could not be described as a decree passed with the consent of the parties. If the present case can be regarded as one falling under O. 23, R. 3, it is of that kind and S. 95 (3) has no application to it.

But it seems to me that the case is not one under O. 23, R. 3. The Court was not asked to record and make an order to record the terms of any agreement, nor was any decree made to the effect that if defendant 1 withdraw his second appeal the suit should stand dismissed. An alleged compromise, said to have been fully acted on by the defendant Onkar, was pleaded in bar of the suit. The plea was held established and the suit was dismissed. Such a decree cannot properly be described as one made under O. 23, R. 3. For all these reasons, I have no doubt that this appeal lies, and I proceed to dispose of it. The judgments of the Courts below cannot be sustained. They are as obviously erroneous as they are patently unjust. The finding of fact by the first Court that the withdrawal of Second Appeal No. 121-B of 1912 was a fact admitted was a total misapprehension. There is no such admission anywhere. It was expressly denied in the pleadings and by two of the plaintiffs in the witness-box. The statement of Ramka's husband (D. W. 3) to the effect that "only the appeal pending in the Nagpur Court was compromised" is not an admission at all, as the witness is not an agent of the plaintiffs, and it does not amount to a statement that the appeal had been withdrawn. We know as a fact now beyond dispute that the Munsif, who correctly appreciated the alleged compromise to mean that the withdrawal of this suit depended on the previous withdrawal of the appeal, was deceived by the false statement that the appeal had in fact been withdrawn about a month before defendant 1 sought specific performance of the plaintiffs' alleged part of the agreement, namely the withdrawal of the suit.

The agreement pleaded was that defendant 1 should withdraw the appeal and the plaintiffs should withdraw the suit, and this suggests the order in which the reciprocal promises were to be performed. Any doubt on the point is cleared up by Parashram (D. W. 2), who says that the arrangement was that the Nagpur appeal should first be compromised and then this suit.

The Munsif also held the exception of a raziinama in this suit to be proved by the evidence of Tripathi (D. W. 1), who admitted on reference to his register that the raziinama he wrote on 17th June 1912 was in connexion with another suit altogether, his evidence being thus totally irrelevant. The Munsif's decision is thus wholly vitiated by his misapprehension of facts and his use of irrelevant evidence. He was misled; but the decision of the lower appellate Court is much worse. Its finding that the withdrawal of the second appeal was immaterial indicates a total misapprehension of the terms of the compromise pleaded and oblivion as to S. 33, 31 and 34, Contract Act 1872, and S. 21 (b), Specific Relief Act, 1877, as respectively applied to Benar. The appeal is affirmed; the decree of the lower appellate Court is reversed and the case is remanded to that Court with directions to allow the first appeal and reverse the decree of the Munsif as wrongly made, and remand the suit to the first Court under O. 41, R. 23, for a decision on the merits. The lower appellate Court will also grant the appellants the usual refund of court-fees. A similar refund will be granted to them in this Court. Defendant 1, Onkar, will pay and bear all the other costs in the two appellate Courts. The costs of the suit will follow the event.

Criminal Appeal No. 64 of 1915, Decided on 11th May 1915, from judgment of Sess. Judge, Nagpur, D/- 23rd April 1915.

Criminal Trial—Confession is ordinarily evidence for as well as against prisoner and is to be taken together—Evidence incompatible with part may be relied on in preference to that part.

The ordinary rule is that a confession is evidence for the prisoner as well as against him and must be taken altogether. But it is only where no other evidence is forthcoming that this can be pressed to the extent of requiring that no part can be accepted as true without accepting the whole: 25 W. R. 15 Cr. and 25 W. R. 23 Cr. Foll.

If other evidence incompatible with a part of the confession is on record, it may be relied on in preference to that part.

Judgment.—The appellant Hasnu Musalman, aged 25 years, has been convicted and sentenced to death for the murder of Karnia Dhangar, both the assessors considering his guilt established. Karnia belonged to mouza Aundha and on the afternoon of Sunday 20th December last was grazing his goats in the adjoining village of Tironja. He was undoubtedly beaten to death that afternoon though his body was not found till the next morning. The first information (Ex. P 1) was laid by the kotwar of Aundha (P. W. 11) at Warora, 20 miles distant, on the evening of 21st December. The Circle Inspector (P. W. 19) and the Sub-Inspector (P. W. 18) started at once for the spot, which they reached before dawn on 22nd December. That evening they received information from Arkia Gond (P. W. 6) which led to Hasnu being arrested just two days later at Ratnapur, where he was found to have Rs. 17 odd on his person. At the same time Arkia was arrested at Tironja, he was sent next day to Warora for remand, but no order seems to have been passed regarding him till 31st December when the Tahsildar, a Magistrate of the Second Class, by warrant addressed to the local Sub-Inspector, ordered his detention in custody till 4th January when he was to be produced before the Subdivisional Magistrate, Warora. Meanwhile on, 28th December Hasnu had been produced before the last mentioned Magistrate at Nimdala, 19 miles from Warora, where he made a confession (Ex. P. 7). In a note recorded on the back of his memorandum in English of the confession, the Subdivisional Magistrate traced the movements of the police with Hasnu from arrest to production before him. It seems that Hasnu had been brought via Chanda and Warora and at the latter place had been remanded by the Tahsildar, but sent on to have his confession recorded. The Tahsildar acted so far in accordance with the standing order in para. 1, part 2, of Criminal Circular 17, but the police who had taken part in the investigation were improperly allowed to form part of the escort which conducted Hasnu from Warora to Nimdala, and we must here express a hope that the District Magistrate will take steps to prevent recurrence of such an irregularity. The Magistrate who recorded Hasnu's confession began the commitment inquiry on 4th January and concluded it on 10th February. He discharged Arkia for reasons which he stated as follows:

"None of the deceased's property was found on him and the axe he had in his hand all that day is free of blood. He no doubt was with Hasnu the whole day, because they are both servants of Paishambar. There is no evidence he was with Hasnu when the murder was committed. He says he stayed behind for a call of nature and reached the scene of murder as soon as he could after hearing the dying man's cry as did Gania. This is just possible."

Now Hasnu in his confession of 28th December, which when read again to him on 8th February he had admitted to be true, stated that Arkia committed the murder, while Gania Govari had deposed before the committing Magistrate that he ran up on hearing a cry for help and found Karnia dying with both Hasnu and Arkia beside him. In such circumstances the Magistrate would, in our opinion, have done better to commit both the accused.

Examined in the Sessions Court Hasnu reported the story of the murder and the disposal of the dead man's property which he told on 28th December and 8th February. In his grounds of appeal to this Court however he denies all knowledge of the murder and alleges that the gold earrings which he got converted into a ring and then sold at Warora on 23rd and 24th December, as related by Shamsher Khan, Srihari and Ragho (P. Ws. 12-14), were handed over to him by Arkia and Gania (P. Ws. 6 and 5). He describes Arkia and Gania as his servants, but they are not really so. Arkia is a field-servant employed by Paighambar Khan with whom Hasnu his son-in-law lives. Gania is a grazier who looks after the goats of the patel and others. The appellant does not explain why Arkia and Gania together made over the earrings to him, or why if they did so he took the unusual course of first converting them into a ring and then selling the ring.

Both the assessors as well as the Sessions Judge believed Gania (P. W. 5), and it is noteworthy that both Hasnu and Arkia have all along described him as coming last to the scene of the murder, while there is no suggestion that Gania had an axe with him, though each of the others admittedly carried such a weapon. This witness, moreover, told his story to the police the day after their arrival, i.e., before Hasnu was arrested and the murdered man's earrings traced. In the Sessions Court he improved on his deposition before the Committing Magistrate by stating that he saw a blow struck as he ran up; this addition may be untrue, and his evidence must also be discounted on account of his failure to report to the village authorities at once; nevertheless we agree with the Sessions Judge and the assessors in accepting his story as in the main trustworthy. There seems to be no adequate reason for this man to be made a party to the murder, especially when so little was to be got by it, though Hasnu and Arkia were sufficiently connected to make a conspiracy between them alone intelligible. That Karnia was with Hasnu and Arkia on the afternoon of the murder is shown by independent and uncoloured evidence, namely, that of Tania, Kanba and Goma (P. Ws. 2-4.)

It is clear then that both Hasnu and Arkia, each with an axe in his hand, were besides the murdered man immediately after the fatal blows were struck and while he was still alive. One of these axes (at in evidence II) is reported by the Imperial Serologist to be stained with human blood. The report is defective in that it does not state where the stains were detected, but from the evidence of the mukaddam (P. W. 17) we gather that one was on the blade and two on the handle of II on 23rd December. The appellant is wavering as to whether II is the axe he carried on 20th December, but looking to all the evidence including Arkia's, we think it must have been. The mukaddam shows that Arkia gave up the other axe (K) as his first and that II was found later. The Circle Inspector (P. W. 19) also deposed that the axe first given up was claimed by Arkia and that the one afterwards discovered was stained. The Sessions Judge thought the axe H might have been stained after the murder and before its recovery by the police, or that the stains referred to by the Imperial Serologist may not be those noticed by the mukaddam and the Circle Inspector: he also suggests in his judgment that the stains might have been caused in the mortuary where Karnia's corpse was examined by the Sub-Assistant Surgeon, whose evidence unfortunately could not be obtained at the trial. There is certainly some improbability in the theory that Hasnu left his axe unwashed, if he used it on Karnia, for the prosecution put forward a witness Mt. Maini (P. W. 7) to show that he washed himself soon after the murder in a tank never used by bathers. On the whole we consider it safer to ignore the blood-stains for the purpose of deciding whether the appellant is innocent or guilty.

Turning to the appellant's confession, we have no doubt of its truth in so far as it admits disposal by him of the murdered man's ornaments. The question we next have to consider is whether we should nonetheless reject, as the Sessions Judge has done, that part which makes out that Arkia did the killing without the connivance or assistance of the appellant and handed over the proceeds to him as soon as he came up. The ordinary rule is that a confession is evidence for the prisoner as well as against him and must be taken altogether. But it is only where no other evidence is forthcoming that this can be pressed to the extent of requiring that no part can be accepted astray without accepting the whole: see Goloke Chander Choudhary v. Magistrate of Chittagong (1) and Queen v. Sonabollah (2). If other evidence incompatible with part of a confession is on record, it may be relied on in preference to that part: see Reg. v. Amrita Gopianda (3). Now in the present case we know that although Gania ran to the spot on hearing the victim's cry, he found both Hasnu and Arkia already there. It is therefore most unlikely that Hasnu had been following Arkia and only came up after the crime had been committed; also that the earrings had already been made over to Hasnu when Gania arrived. Nor can we believe that Arkia with his master's son-in-law close behind him would have fallen upon Karnia unless he knew for certain that his act was approved. In this connexion it has to be remembered that Karnia too had an axe and was not more than 40 years old also, that the medical evidence (Ex. P-10) shows a great number of blows to have been struck and so favours the hypothesis that the deceased had two assailants, not one only. Some weight, too, must be attached to the possession by the appellant of all three earrings, though possibly Arkia may have thought such articles would be more safely disposed of by his employer's son-in-law than by himself. The appellant and Arkia had spent the afternoon together cutting down a tree, and so are not likely to have been appreciably apart when both followed Karnia. Each adopts the obvious line of declaring that he lagged behind the other. But, we think that the facts all taken together are incompatible with the appellant's story that he had no concern with the murder. If he did not commit it single handed as alleged by Arkia, he must have joined in planning it and assisted at least by his presence in its commission. In either case we think his conduct to present no such extenuating feature as would justify refusal to confirm the capital sentence passed by the Sessions Judge.

Judgment.—I am unable to see any sign of life in this appeal. There is a clear finding of fact that prior to the issue of the second sanad in the names of both appellant and Chimnaji, a previous sanad had been granted more than a quarter of a century previously in favour of Chimnaji only, who was separate from his brother Punjaji, the father of appellant. Chimnaji mortgaged this severalty and had lost it by foreclosure absolute before the second sanad was obtained, whether owing to fraud or error, because it is manifest that where a transferable grant in perpetuity has been made in favour of one person who has transferred the same to a third person, no subsequent sanad in favour of the transferor or any other person can be legally issued so as to constitute a fresh grant, unless the transfer can be avoided. Moreover, plaintiff's case is not one of fresh but of an original joint grant and as to this the finding of fact is against him. An 1899 sanad in favour of two persons is no evidence that an 1872 sanad in favour of one person was intended for two. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Criminal Revn. No. 24 of 1915, Decided on 6th March 1915, from order of Asst. Commr. and Mag., 1st class, Nagpur, D/- 3rd November 1915, in Criminal case No. 253 of 1914.

(a) C. P. Municipal Act (1903), S. 159—Complaint is not necessary in respect of each accused tried jointly.

A complaint has to be made as required by S. 159 in order to enable to Court to take cognizance of an offence punishable under the Act. But once cognizance has been legally taken of an offence, the Magistrate is seized of the whole matter as to all other accused whose guilt may appear during the trial of the case.

(b) Master and Servant—Master is criminally responsible for acts of servant when servant acts under his authority.

A master is criminally responsible for the act of his servants if those acts are shown to have been done with his co-operation or under his authority: 8 C P L R 19 Foll. [P 135 C 1]

Order.—In this case the accredited prosecutor of the Nagpur Municipal Committee complained against one Narain for introducing within octroi limits dutiable goods without paying the tax leviable thereon. The Magistrate, on hearing Narain's statement taken at the commencement of the trial, joined the present applicant as an accused and eventually convicted and fined the latter, as Narain's employer who had caused Narain to introduce the goods. It is objected here that no complaint had been laid against the applicant as required by S. 159, C. P. Municipal Act, 1903, and that his protest against being tried jointly with Narain was improperly disregarded. With regard to the first contention I observe that a complaint has to be made as required by S. 159 of the said Act in order to enable a Court to "take cognizance of an offence punishable under the Act." This provision however does not oust the operation of the principle applied in Sarwa v. Emperor (1) that once cognizance has been legally taken of an offence the Magistrate is seized of the whole matter as to all other accused whose guilt may appear. That principle was very recently applied by a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Dedar Bux v. Syama pada Malakar (2). I hold therefore that the Magistrate must be taken to have acted on the complaint against Narain and to have been justified in so doing. The joint trial of the two men is legalised by S. 239, Criminal P. C., and in conceding that the alleged protest was lodged, I cannot think the Magistrate was bound to order separate trials. The matter is a petty one and it is difficult to conceive a case in which joint trial would be proper if this is not one.

On the merits I see no reason to interfere. The application does not impeach the Magistrate's finding that the applicant is Narain's employer and there is positive evidence of that relation. That a master is criminally responsible for the acts of his servants if those acts are shown to have been done with his co-operation or under his authority was recognised in Local Government v. Lakhmi-chand (3). In the present case the applicant and Narain were in the same tonga shortly after the latter removed the bag from the station and the applicant, instead of offering to pay duty when stopped, tried to induce the octroi peon to release the goods. The Magistrate evidently disbelieved the tongawala, for he writes that the story of how the applicant entered the tonga at the Cotton Market is inherently improbable. In this connection I would observe also that the Cotton Market is only a few yards from the railway station. I decline to interfere. The application is rejected.

Order.—The applicant for revision owns a chāl in the town of Nagpur and has been convicted and fined under S. 139, C. P. Municipal Act, 1903, for disobeying a notice issued to him under S. 86 (1), ibid., which required him to erect a latrine for the tenants occupying the rooms in the said building. Certain technical objections taken in the application for revision have been shown by the learned District Magistrate in reporting on the case to be groundless. The only point which now falls to be considered is that the notice was invalid for want of particulars regarding the manner in which the Committee desired the latrine to be provided. The direction given is to apply to the Health Officer of the Municipality and to erect a latrine in accordance with such order as he may give. The power conferred on the Committee by sub-S. (1), S. 86, of the Act is thus described in that provision: to require the owner of any building to provide, in such manner as the Committee directs, any privy . . . which should, in the opinion of the Committee, be provided for the building or the land appurtenant thereto. In my opinion it is clear from the language used that the notice itself is to contain the directions of the circumstances deemed appropriate.

The law does not contemplate delegation to an individual officer of the power to give the necessary directions, though the Committee are of course at liberty to guide themselves to a decision by the advice of any expert in their employ. As pointed out in Ramdularay v. Chhindwara Municipality (1), a Municipal Committee must keep rigidly within the limits of the authority entrusted to it. In the present case, moreover, the time allowed for moving the Health Officer and erecting a latrine was only 10 days, a period which might easily prove insufficient for securing the necessary directions from that official. I hold that the Committee should have formulated and included in their notice specific directions as to the nature and position of the required latrine and that for want of these the notice issued is bad in law. The conviction and sentence in the applicant's case are accordingly set aside and the fine (if paid) will be refunded. I would add in conclusion that the trying Magistrate has entirely ignored the defence that the applicant has on his own land no site on which to erect a latrine. If this be the fact, the Committee will have to provide a site and the notice under S. 86 (1), if again issued, should show the position selected.

Criminal Revn. No. 42-B of 1916, Decided on 17th June 1916, from order of Sub-Div. Mag., Amraoti, in Misc. Case No. 150 of 1915, D/- 9th December 1915.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 145 (4) and 148—Local enquiry—Result of, becomes part of proceeding—Power of deputy to hold local enquiry cannot be delegated.

Where in a proceeding under S. 145 a local inquiry is directed to be made, the result of the local inquiry becomes a part of the proceeding and the party affected by it is entitled to be made acquainted with the result thereof and should be given an opportunity of rebutting the report. A Magistrate deputed to hold a local enquiry under the provisions of S. 148 (1), should hold the enquiry himself and should not delegate it to somebody else. [P 136 C 2; P 137 C 1]

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 145 and 439—Opportunity not given to parties to adduce evidence—Magistrate's order is without jurisdiction—High Court has power to interfere

A High Court cannot ordinarily interfere in revision under Ss. 435 and 439 with proceedings under Ch. 12 of the Code, but it has power to interfere where the subordinate Court has passed an order without giving the parties an opportunity of calling evidence, and has thus acted without jurisdiction: 34 Cal. 840, Foll.

K. K. Gandhe—for Applicant.

Order.—The procedure adopted by the Magistrate who had tried this case is contrary to the provisions of S. 145 (4), Criminal P. C. The local enquiry directed was made by the Naib Tahsildar, a Third Class Magistrate, and not by the Tahsildar, the First Class Magistrate; but on this ground alone I would not interfere. The order-sheet shows the parties put in their written statements on 30th August 1915, on which date the case was adjourned to 16th September 1915 for the Tahsildar's report. This was not returned by that date and the order passed then ran:

"No local enquiry papers have been received from the Tahsildar, Amraoti. Parties told not to attend this Court as the result of this case will be made known to them through the Tahsildar. Put up on 30th September 1915."

This order is written by some clerk and initialed by the Magistrate. There are three similar adjournment orders written by a clerk, the last being of 15th November 1915. It is: "Put up on 30th November 1915." The next order apparently passed without notice to the parties is the final order of 9th December 1915, directing that Ramrao was entitled to possession of the field No. 16 of suit. When the local enquiry had been made and the result reported, it became part of the proceedings, and the party affected by it was entitled to be acquainted with the result thereof and should have been given an opportunity of rebutting the report. In the present case it is clear that applicant has had no opportunity of calling the evidence contemplated by S. 145 (4), Criminal P. C. I know of the ruling laying down that a High Court cannot interfere in revision under Ss. 435 and 439 with proceeding under Ch. 12, Criminal P. C., but it is settled law that this Court can interfere where the subordinate Court has acted without jurisdiction, and it seems to me that in the present case I must hold following Kolha.

Koer v. Muneswar Tiwari (1), that the order passed without giving a party an opportunity of calling evidence is without jurisdiction, and as such I have power to set it aside. I do so and direct that the Magistrate will come to a fresh decision after giving the parties an opportunity of adducing evidence. I may add that in these cases a Tahsildar, deputed to hold a local enquiry under the provisions of S. 148 (1), Criminal P. C., should not pass on the enquiry to his Naib. He has not legally the power to do so. Many Naib-Tahsildars are now Third Class Magistrates and they can be employed for this purpose by the Magistrate trying the case direct. A local enquiry should not as a rule, be directed on matters which may be proved by evidence, such as actual possession. It is the business of the Magistrate to record this himself.

Criminal Revn. No. 102 of 1918, Decided on 14th May 1918.

Penal Code (1860), S. 353—Person assaulting on police constable not acting with written order is not guilty under S. 353—Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 160.

The accused, on being asked by a police constable to accompany him to the Sub-Inspector without a written order from the latter under S. 160, Criminal P. C., assaulted the constable.

Held: that the constable was not acting as a public servant engaged in the discharge of his duty, and that in view of the accused was not guilty of an offence under S. 353 of the Penal Code.

N. K. Vaidya—for Applicant.

Order.—Two grounds were urged in the revision: first, that on the evidence it should have been held that the accused did not assault the constable. The learned Magistrate has considered the evidence with some care and I see no reason for departing from the practice of this Court of not interfering in revision on questions of fact. The evidence, if believed is sufficient for a finding that the accused assaulted the constable. The second point urged is that as the constable was asking the accused Tukaram to go with him to the Sub-Inspector without a written order from the latter under S. 160, Criiminal P. C., he was not, when assaulted, acting as a public servant engaged in the discharge of his duty as a public servant and the conviction under S. 353, I. P. C., is wrong. I agree with this contention and alter the conviction to one under S. 352, but maintain the sentence which under the circumstances is not excessive. Criminal Revisions No. 103 and 104 of 1918 are argued with this application and will be governed by this finding.

Order.—This case has been reported under S. 148, Criminal P. C. by the District and Session Judge, Wardha. The accused Nurkhan was convicted by the Sub-divisional Magistrate, Wardha, of an offence under S. 380, I. P. C. viz., the theft of a silver necklace from the person of a child. He was released under S. 562, Criminal P. C. no substantive sentence being imposed. The District and Session Judge represents that the case was one in which a sentence of whipping or imprisonment should have been imposed. Notice was issued to the accused to show cause why such an order should not be passed. He has been represented by counsel who has shown such cause and the standing counsel has appeared in support of the reference. The case is very clear one. The accused entered the house where the child was asleep at noon and removed the necklace from her person; there were, it may be mentioned, no adults in the house at the time. I see no reason to doubt the soundness of the conclusions arrived at by the trying Magistrate and the Sub-divisional Magistrate on the questions of fact involved in the case, nor would it be the custom of the Court to do so in such a reference as the present.

Counsel for accused however relies on Emperor v. Ghasite (1), in support of his position that a sentence of imprisonment or whipping cannot be imposed in the present case. That decision, if accepted, no doubt concludes the present case, but the learned Government Advocate has argued that the learned Judge who was responsible for the above decision has overlooked provisions of S. 435, Criminal P. C. On the whole however I am of opinion that S. 439 pre-supposes that a sentence has been imposed: it is no doubt an unintentional omission of the legislature that no specific provision has been made in that section by a use like the present but until this omission has been supplied, I think this Court is debarred from interfering. That the accused should escape on what is after all a technicality is perhaps regrettable, for an offence of this nature committed on a defenceless child doubtless merited a substantive sentence. The learned standing counsel also urged that the offence amounted to robbery and that therefore the order under S. 562, Criminal P. C. was in any case wrong. I am unable however on the evidence to hold that the necessary constituents of the offence of robbery are present: no hurt or wrongful restraint was caused or threatened to be caused to the child. In the circumstances therefore I decline to interfere. Let the proceedings be returned accordingly.

Criminal Revn. No. 74 of 1918, Decided on 29th May 1918, from order of Subdivisional Magistrate, First Class Sansar.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 145 and 147—Inquiry under S. 147—Order without giving parties opportunity to produce evidence is without jurisdiction.

An inquiry under S. 147, has to be made in the manner provided by S. 145 of the Code and the Magistrate conducting such inquiry must receive the evidence of the parties. Failure to give an opportunity to the parties of calling evidence affects the jurisdiction of the Magistrate: A.I.R. 1918 Nag. 136 Foll. [P 138 C 2; P 139 C 1]

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 147—Order affecting persons not parties to proceeding is without jurisdiction.

Section 147, contemplates an order to be passed between parties to the proceedings only. An order affecting persons who are not parties to the proceedings is not within the purview of the section and is therefore liable to be set aside as affecting jurisdiction. [P 138 C 1]

G. P. Dick—for the Crown.

Order.—The order of the Subdivisional Magistrate under S. 147, Criminal P. C., must be set aside on two grounds affecting jurisdiction first that he failed to receive the evidence of the first party before making the order against him; second that the order is not one within the purview of S. 147 inasmuch as it is not an order between the parties to the proceeding.

As to the first ground the order sheet shows that the parties put in their written statement on 19th November 1917, and 30th November 1917 was fixed for hearing evidence. On that day two witnesses for the first party and five for the second were present but owing to the other work the case was adjourned to 1st December 1917. The day's order sheet runs thus:

"Pillaji by Mr. Mishra and the parties No. 2 in person and by Mr. Trivedi. Arguments of both parties heard and it is decided to go for spot inquiry. Their witnesses be discharged at present. Case for 5th January 1918. Put up on 3rd January 1918."

The next entry in the order sheet dated 20th December 1917, is as follows:

"The spot was inspected on my way today. Pillaji's son was present and all the accused also. Settlement papers were seen in this connexion. The case is for 5th January 1918 here. Parties were asked to be present here."

On 5th January 1918 the order sheet runs thus:

"Pillaji present in person and only Kishan and Yeshwant are present for the other party. Order passed. Police informed."

An inquiry under S. 147, has to be made in the manner provided by S. 145 and the Magistrate must receive the evidence of the parties. It is clear from the entries in the order-sheet reproduced above that the Magistrate failed to receive the oral evidence of the parties. The first party had obtained against three of the second party a decree of the civil Court which had considered the settlement entry and he might have succeeded on the same evidence in convincing the Subdivisional

Magistrate that the settlement entry was not justified or conclusive. As regards the District Magistrate's remarks that the order of the Settlement Officer was incorporated in the village administration papers which appear to have been signed on 10th May 1917, it appears from the record of this case (see leaves Nos. 18, 19 and 20) that the entry was made by the Revenue Inspector in the wajibularz on 27th or 28th September 1917. Failure to give an opportunity to the parties of calling evidence affects jurisdiction [Mt. Jaiwant v. Ramrao (1)]. As regards the second ground the Magistrate's order is as follows:

"This is a case under S. 147, Criminal P. C., started on the police report. It is alleged that a dispute over the right of way over field No. 232/1 of Pillaji exists between Pillaji on one side and Dasrya, Kishan, Jago son of Narsu and Jago and Praja sons of Nago and Bapuji on the other side. The dispute is about the right of way to the platform of Maroti during the time of pola for one day. (2) The parties filed their written statements. I went over to see the spot along with the Patwari and find according to the new settlement mist that the right of way exists in favour of the villagers during pola. In fact this application is regarding the dispute over it between Pillaji and the whole village. (3) The documentary evidence specially the settlement record clearly proves that Pillaji has no right to restrain the public or the second party as named above from proceeding to the Maroti platform on the pola day. If his crops are damaged by the bullocks that day he has his right of action for damages against individuals liable for them. (4) Accordingly I order Pillaji not to restrain any person on pola day to carry his bullocks to pay homage to the Maroti platform through his field No. 232/1, unless the same is prohibited by the civil Court in due course as it is clear that the villagers did exercise the right on the last pola day also except Dasrya, Kishan and Jago and Govinda who are restrained by the civil Court."

I cannot take this to be an order between the parties of the proceedings in view of the passages underlined (italicised) by me. S. 147 does not contemplate an order like the one passed in this case. I set aside the order of the Subdivisional Magistrate dated 5th January 1918 and direct that the Magistrate take such evidence as the party may wish to adduce and then pass a proper order. I may add that it is advisable to draw up a final order separate from the judgment or order dealing with the merits of the case on the lines of Form No. 24, Sch. 5, Criminal P. C.

Criminal Appeal No. 19 of 1918, Decided on 7th June 1918, against judgment of Sub-divisional Magistrate, Akola, in Criminal Case No. 10 of 1918, D- 10th April 1918.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 234.—Several persons tried jointly—S. 234 does not apply.

The joint trial of several accused persons for two or more separate offences is illegal. S. 234 applies only to offences committed by a single person. It is not applicable when several persons are tried jointly under S. 230 of the Code.

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898) S. 239—Distinct offences not part of same transaction—Trial of, is not permissible under S. 239.

Section 239 is the only section of the Code which refers to a trial of more persons than one jointly, but it does not authorise such trial for two or more distinct offences unless they form part of the same transaction or unless one is the actual offence and the other or others are offences of abetting or attempting that offence.

G. P. Dick—for the Crown.

Judgment.—Two separate challans were filed by the police against three persons named Chand Khan, Sayad Lal and Umar Khan charging them with offences under S. 457, I. P. C. in the houses of Govind Rao (P. W. 6) and Draupadibai (P. W. 7) respectively. The offence in Govind Rao's house is said to have been committed on some day between 12th and 19th February 1912 in Draupadibai's house between 16th and 19th of the same month. Two separate cases were registered in the Magistrate's Court, No. 10 in respect of the offence in Govind Rao's house and No. 11 in respect of that in Draupadibai's house.

The order-sheets of 8th March 1918 in the two cases are as follows:

Case No. 11

"All the accused are present. The offence of this case and the one of case No. 10 are of one and the same kind and against the same accused. The two offences will therefore be tried together under S. 234, Criminal P. C. For further orders see order sheet of case No. 10."

Case No. 10

"Accused produced. Public Prosecutor represents the Crown. Mr. Sircalkar defends Chand Khan and Mr. Pingle and Mr. Pandey defend Sayad Lal. Five witnesses for prosecution examined and discharged. It is now 5-15 p. m. The remaining witnesses will be bound in Rs. 10 each. This case and the offence mentioned in Case No. 11 are of the same kind and against the same accused alleged to have been committed within one year. The two cases will therefore be tried together under S. 234, Criminal P. C. Accused remanded to jail custody. Case for 14th March 1919. The articles in evidence be kept with Nazar. On and after this date all the proceedings are recorded in case No. 10 only."

After the prosecution case was over Chand Khan was examined and discharged and charges with two heads in respect of two offences were framed against Sayad Lal and Umar Khan. These two have been convicted. Sayad Lal has been sentenced to suffer rigorous imprisonment for five years and Umar Khan to 2½ years for each offence. The two sentences on each accused have been ordered to run concurrently. The two Accused have filed separate appeals and this judgment will govern both. It is clear that the trial of the three accused jointly for two separate offences is illegal and the convictions must be set aside. The Magistrate purports to act under S. 234, Criminal P. C., but that section applies only to offences committed by a single person. It is not applicable when several persons are tried jointly under S. 239; see Budhai Sheik v. Emperor (1) and Emperor v. Balwantsingh (2). S. 239 is the only section which refers to a trial of more than one person jointly, but it does not authorise such trial for two or more distinct offences unless they form part of the same transaction or unless one is the actual offence and the other or others are offences of abetting or attempting that offence. The two offences in the present case are not, and the learned Magistrate has rightly not treated them as committed in the same transaction. I set aside the convictions of Sayad Lal and Umar Khan. It will be open to the prosecution to take such further proceedings against the accused as they may think proper, and in this connexion I would draw attention to the remarks at pp. 77 and 78 in Emperor v. Balwant Singh (2) cited above as to the courses open to the prosecution if they wish to take further proceedings.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), Ss. 107 and 112—Security for breach of peace—Denial by accused—Absence of proof—Order demanding security is illegal though accused are willing to furnish.

A Magistrate called upon the accused under S. 112 to show cause why they should not furnish security to keep the peace under S. 107, on the ground that they were members of an unlawful assembly which passed a mosque with loud music and which intended to cause a breach of the peace by repeating the procedure. The accused denied these allegations, but expressed their willingness to execute bonds to keep the peace. Thereupon the Magistrate directed them to execute bonds for Rs. 100 to keep the peace for one year.

P. S. Kotwal and Ghate—for Non-Applicant.

Judgment.—This case has been reported under S. 438, Criminal P. C. 1898, as applied to Bihar by the Sessions Judge of West Bear. The facts are these. A Magistrate of the 1st Class at Akola made an order under S. 112 of the said Code, declaring that two Hindus namely, Rai Singh and Daolat, had allegedly been members of a procession which contrary to established usage, had passed by a Musalman mosque on 31st July 1916 accompanied by loud music and that they apparently intended to cause a breach of the peace by repeating this procedure at the coming Pola festival. The same order called upon Rai Singh and Daolat to show cause why they should not furnish security under S. 107 of the same Code. In answer to this Rule the said persons appeared before the Magistrate, who asked them to show cause. Rai Singh and Daolat denied having been members of the procession of 31st July 1916, expressed their readiness to observe the custom of stopping clamorous music while passing the mosque, denied that they had any intention of disturbing the peace on the Poladay, added that they are willing to execute a bond to convince the Magistrate of their peaceful intentions. Thereupon the Magistrate directed Rai Singh and Daulat each to execute a bond in Rs. 100 to keep the peace for a year. The learned Sessions Judge reports this order as illegal. A Rule issued to the District Magistrate, in response to which he candidly admits the irregularity of the order, but asks that it may be maintained as expedient.

I have every sympathy for the view put forward by the learned District Magistrate, and I fully appreciate the difficulties which sometimes arise from Hindu musical processions going past Musalman mosques and the advisability of doing nothing to weaken the hands of the executive by undue interference with preventive action upon technical grounds. But as pointed out by the Supreme Tribunal in Subrahmanya Ayyar v. King Emperor (1), the disregard of express provisions of law is not a more irregularity which can be condoned or remedied, but an illegality and this Court cannot maintain or overlook an illegal order upon any ground of administrative convenience. The provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code are clear enough as to the procedure which must be followed where an accused person disputes the truth of the information laid against him, but if it is necessary to supplement the eventually published judicial interpretation of it, that requirement can be satisfied by referring to Ram Chandra Haldar v. Emperor (2), Palaniappa Asory, In re (3), Prathipati Venkatasami v. Emperor (4) and Mul Chand v. Emperor (5). The accused denied every allegations upon the basis of which they were considered liable to furnish security and not a shred of evidence was taken to prove them. A Magistrate cannot enter into a compromise with an accused person for the purpose of disposing of a criminal case. Criminal liability arises out of acts and intentions which, if not admitted, must be legally proved.

That is not an abstruse proposition of law, it is an obvious rule of common sense. Suppose these two persons having been brought before the Magistrate accused of assault or theft had denied the offence, but added that they were willing to undergo conviction in token of their innocence, would the Magistrate have been justified in convicting them, even for the purpose of dealing with them as first offenders and realising them on probation of good conduct? Obviously not. Yet that is very like what he has done in this case. He has convicted them without evidence of acts and intentions which they denied. The order was absolutely illegal and cannot be sustained. For the above reasons the order directing Rai Singh and Daulat to execute security bonds is set aside and the bail or bonds executed by them are discharged.

A Rule having issued the learned District Magistrate shows cause as follows; (a) The committal of a case triable exclusively by the Court of Session does not become ipso facto illegal merely because the Magistrate is empowered under S. 30, Criminal P. C. (b) That some High Courts have even gone so far as to hold that where an accused is charged as this accused with two offences, one of which he was competent to try and the other he was not, the proper course is committal, Empress v. Ramanand (1). (c) It has also been held that a commitment should not be quashed on the ground that the Sessions Judge on perusal of the record found the case triable by a Magistrate of 1st Class, Empress v. Mallu Shah (2). (d) That in the present instance the two offences with which the accused is charged, murder and arson, were practically part of the same transaction and some of the witnesses are the same in both cases. The Committing Magistrate had therefore, some grounds for considering that the accused would be to some extent embarrassed by a trial in different Courts. In conclusion, however the District Magistrate admits that he has no practical objection to offer to the quashing of the commitment.

It goes without saying that the committal of a case triable exclusively by the Court of Session is not illegal merely because the Magistrate is empowered under S. 30, Criminal P. C., and it may be admitted that there may be cases where an accused charged with two offences, one triable by a Magistrate the other by a Judge, should properly be committed to the Sessions for the trial of both. It may be conceded that it would be improper to quash a commitment merely on the ground that the offence the accused is charged with is triable by a Magistrate, for a Sessions Court can try any offence under the Indian Penal Code (S. 28, Cr. P. C.). There can be nothing to prevent a Magistrate committing even a summons case for good reasons. It has been held that under S. 207, Criminal P. C.

"A Magistrate who is competent to commit to the Court of Session can commit to that Court both cases triable exclusively by that Court and cases which in his opinion ought to be tried by that Court."

Queen Empress v. Kayemullah Mandal (3). In a warrant case the Magistrate is bound by the provision of S. 254, that is, when he is of opinion that the accused has committed an offence triable under Ch. 21 which he is competent to try and which he can adequately punish, he shall proceed to charge the accused, but if the Magistrate considers that he cannot adequately punish the accused there is nothing to prevent him committing the case. The words "ought to be tried" of Ss. 207 and 347, Criminal P. C., it has been held, must be read with S. 254 of the Code. Thus a case which the Magistrate is not competent to try should be committed; also one in which in the Magistrate's opinion he cannot inflict adequate punishment: King-Emperor v. Pema Ranchod (4). In the case before me the accused, one Hanuman, has been committed to the Court of Session for an offence under S. 436, I. P. C., by the 1st Class Magistrate, Bilaspur, a Magistrate empowered under S. 30, Criminal P. C. It is said the accused set fire to a house and that immediately after doing so, went to another house and wounded a woman who has since died of her wounds. Accused has, in a separate case before the same Magistrate, been charged under S. 302, I. P. C., and committed for trial to the Sessions Court. The only reason given by the Magistrate for the commitment in the arson case is that the same accused has been committed in the murder case. The Magistrate does not say that the fine and sentence which he can impose will not be adequate to meet the ends of justice. The commitment made on the sole ground that the accused has been committed in another case is bad in law. I accordingly quash the commitment of the accused in this case and direct that the First Class Magistrate, Bilaspur, do proceed with the trial of the accused and complete it according to law.

P.N./R.K. Commitment quashed.

Order—Akbar Ali and Mohammad Ali applicants in Criminal Revisions Nos. 258 and 259 of 1918, have been convicted in the same trial by a 1st Class Magistrate of Wardha each for an offence under S. 323 I, P. C. and sentenced each to the payment of fine. The cases commenced on a complaint on the 22nd April 1918 in the Court of the Tahsildar and 2nd Class Magistrate, Wardha. After the examination of three witnesses for the prosecution, the case was transferred by order of the District Magistrate to the Court of the 1st Class Magistrate. He proceeded with the case on 11th June 1918, without re-examining the witnesses already examined by the 2nd Class Magistrate, and on 29th June 1918 convicted the accused. An application purporting to be under S. 350 (b), Criminal P. C., was presented to the District Magistrate and was rejected by him. The legality of the order of transfer is not questioned, but it is contended that S. 350, Criminal P. C., does not apply to the case, as that section is limited to cases, in which Magistrates succeed each other in their offices, but does not apply to a case like the present where the transfer is by the District Magistrate from one Magistrate to another. In support of this contention, and it is the only one raised in argument, I am referred to Emperor v. Kasim (1), Emperor v. Gokal (2) and Ladya v. Emperor (3). These cases unquestionably support the view relied on by the applicant's learned Counsel. With all respect to the Judges who decided those cases, I find myself unable to accept their views. In recent years there are cases of other High Courts in which the opposite view had found acceptance. I may mention Mohesh Chandra Saha v. Emperor (4), Palaniandy Gounden v. Emperor (5), Kudrutullah

v. Emperor (6) and the recent case of Ram Dass v. Emperor (7). I hold that S. 350 is applicable to a case like the present which has been transferred from the Court of one Magistrate to the Court of another and it is not restricted to cases in which Magistrates succeed each other in their offices. It is not contended that applicants have in any way been prejudiced by a portion of the evidence against them having been recorded by the Magistrate who did not finish the case. of her husband, on 27th March 1918 by administering dhatura poison. Tani lived in Mouza Dhamangaon, but as that village was infected with plague she was at the time of the alleged crime living with her husband Venkati (P. W. 6) and Mt. Jakhai in a hut outside the village. Mt. Bulki occupied an adjacent hut with her mother Poonji (P. W. 8) and her two daughters, the elder of whom is Mt. Jani, (P. W. 7) The 27th March 1918 was shimga or Holi day. About an hour after Jakhai had taken her evening meal she had an attack of giddiness and pain in her stomach which became distended, and she felt difficulty in speaking and began to scatch at her clothes and the ground on which she lay; later she became speechless and unconscious and died shortly after midnight. A short time before Jakhai died, Bulki who had taken her meal at the same time as Jakhai and had eaten some of the puranpoli which formed part of Jakhai's meal also developed similar symptoms and died a little after sunrise on 28th March 1918.

The following questions arise for consideration: What was the cause of the sudden illness and death of Jakhai and Bulki? If poison, who administered it and how? P. W. 6 and P. W. 7 describe the symptoms exhibited by the two women before they died. There can be no doubt about this part of their evidence; they could not have invented the symptoms. P. W. 5, the Sub-Assistant Surgeon, says that these symptoms are symptoms of dhatura poisoning. Chemical examination showed the existence of a substance having the properties of dhatura in the stomach viscera of Jakhai and in the stains on her choli and the taiban on which she was lying after she was taken ill. Traces of arsenic were also found in the stomach viceras of both Jakhai and Bulki. There is no reason to discredit this evidence and it must be held that the deaths of these women were due principally, at any rate, to dhatura poison. The Investigating Police Officer had from the very beginning suspected dhatura poison as the probable cause of the deaths and had worked for a clue upon that suspicion. The viscera of the two deceased women were not forwarded to the Chemical Examiner until the case came up for hearing before the Magistrate and the report of the examination reached the Sessions Court after the trial had begun on 6th May 1918. The Police had thus no information about the existence of arsenic in the viscera before their investigation was closed, otherwise they would have sought for some clue with regard to the arsenic also. It is regrettable that under the present arrangements as to chemical examinations and the rules as to transmission of articles to the Chemical Examiner, it is practically impossible for the Police to have early information as regards the results of chemical examination.

The Officiating Sessions Judge has also omitted to question the Sub-Assistant Surgeon examined as P. W. 5 in his Court, whether his post mortem examination disclosed any indication of arsenical poisoning or whether any of the symptoms described by the witness could be ascribed to such poisoning. Probably the deaths were due in a minor degree to the effect of arsenic also.

The evidence on which the prosecution rely to prove that the poison was administered by the appellant is as follows. P. W. 7, Jani's statement is to the effect that on the evening of 27th March 1918, while Mt. Jakhai was sitting in Bulki's hut, the appellant brought food for herself and Jakhai in two separate plates. Bulki also brought her food in a plate and the three sat outside Bulki's hut to take their meals. Some puranpoli formed part of the food in Jakhai's plate. Jakhai, while eating the puranpoli, remarked that it tasted bitter. The appellant explained that it was due to the puran (the sweetened dal filling) having been burnt in the making. Bulki ate some of the puranpoli from Jakhai's plate. The evidence of Poonji (P. W. 8) to the same effect may be left out of consideration as it is admittedly hearsay. P. W. 6, (Venkati), P. W. 7, (Jani) and P. W. 8 (Poonji) were questioned with a view to prove that it was the appellant who had cooked the food brought by her for Jakhai and herself. Their evidence is not of much value, as none of them states that he or she saw the appellant cooking the food. P. W. 1 (the investigating Police Officer), P. W. 4 (Laxman Patwari), P. W. 9, (Shanker) and P. W. 10 (Raghupat Patwari) state that the appellant pointed out a rubbish heap in which she had concealed some capsules of dhatura fruits and produced them from the heap in their presence.

Ganpat, P. W. 2, states that on the Sunday preceding Holi day (Wednesday) the appellant had asked him where she could get dhatura leaves for application to her throat which was paining. We think it unlikely that the appellant did not know where dhatura plants were to be found in the village, and it appears to us improbable that she questioned this witness as he deposed she did. The accused was examined by the Committing Magistrate and the Sessions Judge, and we transcribe below both her examinations in extenso:

Q. You have heard the prosecution witness against you: what have you to say?

A. I know nothing about the allegations made out against me.

Q. Was Mt. Jakhai related to you?

A. Mt. Jakhai was my mother-in-law as well as my father's sister.

Q. Was she living with your husband?

A. She was living with me and my husband since I was married.

Q. Do you know how Mt. Jakhai met with her death?

A. I don't know how Jakhai died.

Q. Who ordinarily cooks food for the inmates of your house?

A. Ordinarily I used to cook food but on festival days Mt. Jakhai used to cook the food. On the occasion of the last shingra or Holi day Mt. Jakhai had cooked the food. I had brought water from the well and supplied her fuel on the shingra day.

Q. Whether the deceased Jakhai used to quarrel with you?

A. No. She never quarrelled with me and she used to treat me properly. My husband used to quarrel with me.

Q. Do you know Mt. Bulke?

A. Yes. She was my husband's cousin sister.

Q. Where did she live?

A. She used to live with her mother in a separate hut close to mine and in the same field in which we were living.

Q. Do you know how Bulki met with her death?

A. I do not know how she met with her death.

Q. Have you got anything more to say?

A. My mother-in-law used to treat me properly. When my husband left me for two years she brought me back from my parents. I have to say nothing more except that my husband and my aunt-in-law Poonji had suggested to me to say that I mixed dhatura with the food, but in fact I did nothing and know nothing about it.

Before the Sessions Judge:

Q. Is the statement made by you in the lower Court and now read out to you correct and is it true?

A. Yes, that statement is correct and true.

Q. What have you to say about the evidence of Jani and Ganpat that the puranpoli had a somewhat bitter taste and that you had gone out for dhatura seeds? Is it true that the three took their meals together?

A. Yes, what Jani said about myself, Bulki and Jakhai having taken food together on shingra evening in front of Bulki's hut is correct. There was no talk then about puranpoli having tasted bitter.

Q. Ganpat says that he saw you going to bring dhatura leaves. Is this true?

A. No. Ganpat speaks false. He never met me nor did I speak to him that I was going to bring dhatura leaves.

Q. What have you to say about the evidence for the prosecution that you used generally to quarrel with Jakhai and that there was a quarrel on the day previous to shingra?

A. There never has been a quarrel between her and myself.

Q. Can you say how Jakhai and Bulki died?

A. I do not know. My mother-in-law died and I was seated taking hold of her. I do not know how Bulki died. I was sitting near Jakhai at that time.

Q. Have you anything more to say in this case?

A. I have nothing else to say.

In our opinion the examination of the appellant has been defective and there has been no practical compliance with the provisions of S. 342, Criminal P. C., the object of which, as explained in Emperor v. Katay Kisan (1), is to:

(1) communicate to the accused to the full extent that may be found necessary in each particular case, what is alleged against him in the evidence for the prosecution; and (2) ascertain from him what explanation or defence, in law or in fact, he wishes to put forward in respect thereof.

The most important part of the prosecution evidence is that of Jani, which is directed to proving the administration by the appellant of the food containing the poison. Jani's evidence shows that the appellant brought the food in two plates, she gave one plate to Jakhai, and Jakhai and Bulki who ate the food from that plate died. She herself ate from the other plate and nothing happened to her. These circumstances are very much against the accused. It was necessary therefore in our opinion to examine the accused and take her explanation with regard to them in detail. The appellant should have been asked the following questions or such of them as became necessary in view of her answers to previous questions: Whether she brought the food for herself and Jakhai; whether she brought it in two separate plates; whether she gave one plate to Jakhai; whether there was puranpoli in the plate; whether Jakhai and Bulki ate the puranpoli and other food from that plate; whether she herself ate from the other plate; whether there was puranpoli in that plate and whether she ate that puranpoli. She should have been told that under the circumstances stated above presumptions arose that Jakhai and Bulki must have died of eating the food in the plate brought by her for Jakhai, and that the poison must have been put into the food by her, and she should have been asked whether she had any explanation to offer in this connexion or as to why Jakhai and Bulki died under these circumstances while nothing happened to herself.

It is contended by the learned Standing Counsel for the Crown that when an accused person is asked the general question: "Have you anything more to say in this case," as the Sessions Judge in the present case, or "you have heard the prosecution witnesses against you, what have you to say," as by the Committing Magistrate, there is a sufficient compliance with the provisions of S. 342, Criminal P. C., as it is open to the accused in answer to such questions to explain all matters which appear to be against him in the evidence, even though his attention has not been drawn to them by specific questions. It is possible that under certain circumstances—as in the case of an accused person of advanced education and information—such a question may be deemed a sufficient compliance with the provisions of S. 342, but in this case, as in most cases, the accused is an ignorant person who cannot be expected to know or understand what particular parts of the evidence are, or are likely to be considered by the Court to be, against her; and it was necessary that her attention should have been directed to all the vital parts of the evidence against her. Even where an accused person is capable of understanding what circumstances appear against him, when several details of the evidence form the subject of this examination he may be led to think that other details on which he has not been examined have not been considered to be of any importance by the Court, and he may think it unnecessary to offer any explanation in respect thereof. We consider that the provisions of S. 342 are mandatory and non-compliance with them vitiates the trial: Ghulla v. Emperor (2), Emperor v. Savalya Aima Pastyia (3). We set aside the conviction and sentence and direct a re-trial. The Sub-Assistant Surgeon should now be questioned in connection with the arsenic found in the viscera of the two deceased women. In concluding this judgment we express our strong disapproval of the course followed by the investigating police officer in connection with the arrest of the accused in this case. He commenced the investigation at 3 p. m. on 28th March and closed it for the day at 12 midnight. All this time was taken up with the examination of witnesses in connection with the inquest on Jakhai's body. At the end of the record of this day's proceedings the investigating Police Officer writes:

"Suspicion which arises is that death was due to the poison caused by dhatura seeds."

The examination of the witnesses, one of whom was Mt. Tani, shows that he suspected her of having administered the poison. He then commenced the inquest on Bulki and examined Tani a second time. This inquest and the investigation were closed at 3 a. m. on 29th March 1918 with these remarks:

"As the woman's death has been caused with dhatura seeds I sent the corpse to Morshi for post mortem examination."

It is clear that the investigating officer had the fullest justification for arresting Tani at 3 a. m. on 29th March 1918. So far as he was concerned there was no doubt left that Tani had committed the offence. She was however not formally arrested till 6.30 p. m. on 31st March 1918. Why she was not arrested earlier appears from the case diary No. 2 for 29th March 1918. The investigating officer writes therein at p. 47:

2. (1918) 44 I C 184=1 P R 1918 Cr.

"I will not register the crime under S. 302, I. P. C., until I get a reply from the Sub-Assistant Surgeon; and as the remand of police custody would not be obtained consequent on the arrest of Tani, but another of jail custody would be granted, I therefore postponed her arrest on the ground that it may not impede all those necessary particulars which are to come to light in future."

It is again clear from this that the investigating officer then considered that Tani should be arrested, but he refrained from doing what he knew he should have done because, if he did so, she would be removed from his custody. If he had arrested the accused and thought it necessary to have her in his custody for a longer time than the 24 hours prescribed by S. 61, it was open to him to get an order under S. 167 from the Magistrate for further detention in police custody, he would have had to give reasons for asking for such an order. Apparently he considered that he had none. In these circumstances we consider that his deliberate failure to make a formal arrest was nothing but a circumvention of the salutary provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code with regard to the custody of accused persons by the police. We purposely use the expression "formal arrest" because it is difficult to believe that Tani was free from all restraint, or that she was not practically under arrest before 6.30 p. m. on 31st March 1918, when she is regarded to have been arrested. On 29th March 1918 the investigating police officer left Dharmangaon at 9 a. m., and went to Rohankhed to investigate into another case, and returned to Dharmangaon at 3 p. m. Had he left Tani free during that time? In view of the evidence available to him at 3 a. m. on 29th March 1918 he would have been very wrong if he had allowed her after that time to be free to go about as she pleased.

Criminal P. C. (1895), S. 224—Offences against different individuals by one person can be tried together.

The conviction of an accused person at one trial for three different offences committed against three different persons is not illegal.

Section 231, Criminal P. C., is not limited to cases where the offences have been committed against the same person. [1917 C 2]

Order.—I see no reason to interfere in revision. Grounds Nos. 2 and 4 are a repetition of grounds Nos. 1 and 3 of the memorandum of appeal before the appellate Court and have been properly dealt with by that Court. The first ground urges that the three sets of misappropriation having been committed against three different persons the conviction of the appellant at one trial for all of them is bad and Empress of India v. Marari (1) is relied on. The case has been distinguished from Mann Mina v. Empress (2) and also in Sri Bhagwan Singh v. Emperor (3). The present case is analogous to Queen-Empress v. Juala Prasad (4). S. 234, Criminal P. C., is not, in my opinion, limited to cases where the offences have been committed against the same person; see also Chitradhari Misser v. Emperor (5). There is no substance in ground No. 3. The judgment of the appellate Court gives the points for determination, its decision thereon and the reasons for its decision quite fully and clearly. I do not see any illegality or impropriety in the appellate Court's decisions. The sentences are not severe. This application is dismissed.

Second Appeal No. 102-B of 1917, Decided on 4th February 1918, from decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, East Berar, D/- 5th January 1917, in Appeal No. 304 of 1916.

Berar Land Revenue Code (1896), S. 79 (2) —Annual tenancy covers tenancy from year to year—Notice to quit in tenancy for one year is not necessary—Transfer of Property Act (1882), S. 111-A.

The expression "annual tenancy" as used in S. 79 of the Berar Land Revenue Code is meant to cover a tenancy from year to year only and not a tenancy lasting for a year only. No notice by either party to a contract of tenancy for one year is therefore necessary to determine the tenancy. [P 148 C 2]

V. D. Sathaye—for Appellant.A. C. Roy—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The plaintiff, an ijardar of a village in Berar, filed this suit on 25th April 1916 to eject the defendant from two fields, on the ground that they had been leased to him in writing for one year from 1st April 1915 to 31st March 1916, and the defendant has refused to vacate the fields on the expiry of the term. The defendant admitted that he had held on lease the above fields in 1915-1916, but he pleaded that the lease was an oral one. He further alleged that he was holding the same fields then on another lease for one year, viz., 1916-17, and the plaintiff had, therefore, no right to eject him. Both the lower Courts have found that the defendant held the fields in 1915-16 on an oral lease and that the alleged lease for 1916-17 is not proved. The first Court decreed the plaintiff's claim, but the lower appellate Court has dismissed it on the plea raised by the defendant in appeal that the plaintiff was bound to give notice to quit under S. 79 (2) of the Berar Land Revenue Code before he could be ejected. It has overruled the plaintiff's contention that the lease in suit is not an annual tenancy such as is contemplated by S. 79 of the Berar Land Revenue Code. The point, therefore, for determination is whether the expression "annual tenancy" used in that section applies to a lease for a single year. The term "annual tenancy" may have two meanings, viz., "tenancy from year to year," and if you give the word "annual" one of its dictionary meanings, viz., lasting for a year (as an annual plant or annual ticket), "a tenancy for a single year."

I think there are strong reasons against holding that the expression "annual tenancy" in S. 79 (2) was meant to cover a tenancy for one year only. Apart from the fact that it is a somewhat unusual use of legal language to speak of tenancy for one year only as an annual tenancy, the general rule of law with regard to notice to quit in connexion with tenancies is that no such notice is necessary to determine a tenancy for a fixed period as a demise for a year: see Woodfall's Law of Landlord and Tenant, Edn. 19, p. 403, and cases cited therein, and the T. P. Act, 4 of 1882, S. 111-A. If therefore, the expression "annual tenancy" is held to include a tenancy for a year, it would be attributing to the legislature an intention of derogating from the general law and of interfering with the freedom of contract, for a notice to quit cannot be taken to have been contemplated by the parties to a tenancy for a year as the contract itself virtually provides for its determination. In such a case it would be unreasonable and unjust to one of the parties to allow the other to insist upon a notice before the tenancy can be determined. Any construction which leads to such unreasonableness or injustice should be avoided: see Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, Edn. 5, p. 372. I hold that S. 79 (2) of the Berar Land Revenue Code does not apply to a tenancy for a year and no notice by either party to the contract is necessary to be given to the other before the tenancy can be determined in such a case. The appeal is allowed with costs.

Second Appeal No. 334 of 1917, Decided on 12th September 1918, against decree of Special Addl. Dist. Judge, Akola, D/- 27th April 1917.

Civil P. C. (1908), O. 6, R. 17 and O. 23 R. 1—Plaintiff cannot be allowed to amend pleadings or to withdraw from suit with liberty to bring fresh suit at stage of second appeal.

Plaintiff brought a suit for a declaration that a certain sale-deed executed by his father was a bogus transaction. At a later stage the plaintiff was amended so as to include a claim for possession of the property sold. Both the trial Court and the Court of first appeal held that consideration had passed for the sale and dismissed the suit. In second appeal it was sought to impeach the sale on the ground that it was not for antecedent debt or for legal necessity and was, therefore, not binding on the plaintiff.

Held: that at such a late stage of the proceedings the plaintiff could not be allowed either to amend his pleading or to withdraw from the suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit.

V. V. Chitale—for Appellant.

Judgment.—This second appeal arises out of a suit for a declaration that a sale-deed dated 5th December 1910 executed by the plaintiff's father Parashram in favour of the defendant's father was a bogus transaction. At a later stage the plaint was amended so as to include a claim for possession of a half share of the property sold. It may be noted that in a previous litigation between the defendant's father and the plaintiff's uncle Krishna it has been decided that Parashram had only a right to convey a half share in the field. Now both the Courts below have held that the transaction in favour of the defendant's father was not a bogus transaction and that there was consideration for the sale. The suit has therefore been dismissed. In second appeal it is contended that the sale by the father was not for an antecedent debt nor for legal necessity. This is a point which the plaintiff never raised in the Courts below. Having regard to the fact that the plaintiff originally came into Court with a relief for a declaration based upon a particular ground, it is not competent to him now to insist upon the invalidity of the sale-deed upon grounds not raised before. There is scarcely any suggestion that the property was joint ancestral property in which the plaintiff had a right by birth. After four years of litigation I cannot allow the plaintiff either to amend his pleadings or to withdraw from the suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit. It is argued that recent decisions have pointed out that a father has no power to sell ancestral family property except for legal necessity or for what is strictly an antecedent debt. The Privy Council decisions cite with approval the Full Bench ruling of the Allahabad High Court in Chandraden Singh v. Mata Prasad (1), a case which was followed in 1913 by the Judicial Commissioner in Hira Ram v. Udha Ram (2). I am therefore unable to accede to the prayer that either the pleadings should be allowed to be amended or that the plaintiff should be given liberty to bring a fresh suit. The appeal is, therefore, dismissed. There will be no order for costs, as the respondent appears in person.

Second Appeal No 363 of 1917, Decided on 16th July 1918, against the decree of Dist. Judge, Nagpur, in C. A. No. 132 of 1916, D/- 16th April 1917.

Civil P. C. (1908), S. 47, & O. 21 Rr. 58 & 63—Objection by stranger dismissed on ground that he was party to suit—Appeal does not lie—Regular suit to establish right is maintainable—Test is whether claim of objector is adverse to claims of real judgment-debtor.

Where in execution of a decree a person who claims that he was not a party to the suit prefers an objection to the attachment of certain property in the capacity of a stranger to the suit and the objection is dismissed on the ground that he was a party to the suit, no appeal lies against the order dismissing the objection, but it is open to the objector to file a regular civil suit to establish his right to the property attached.

In such case the test is whether the claim as laid by the objector is adverse to the claims of the real judgment-debtor, and an objector claiming under a paramount title is not deprived of his ordinary remedy of a regular suit merely because his objection is dismissed on the ground that he is held to be a party to the suit.

[P 150 C 2]

M. V. Joshi and V. V. Chitale—for Appellant.

B. K. Bose, V. Bose and Eraksha—for Respondent.

Judgment.—Appeal by the defendant. The facts out of which this appeal arises are briefly these. The defendant in 1907 filed a suit in the Court of Small Causes, Bombay, for the price of goods sold, the defendant in the suit being described as Mannalal Ramebandra residing in Bombay. An ex parte decree for Rupees 1,710-8-0 was passed. In execution the judgment debtor was arrested and imprisoned, and then released as his subsistence allowance was not paid. The Bombay decree was transferred for execution to the Court of the District Judge Nagpur, and the jewelry of the present plaintiff-respondent Manji son of Diparam was attached. He lodged an objection under R. 58, O. 21, Sch. 1, Civil P. C., on the ground that he was not a party to the suit and that the jewelry was his. The Additional District Judge dismissed the objection, holding that the objector was a party to the suit. The objection was dismissed as the executing Court held that the objector was a party to the suit, since the debtor in the suit was a firm of which the objector and his brother Ramchandra were the partners. The respondent has brought the present suit to recover from the decree-holder the money which he paid in satisfaction of the decree to get his jewelry released from attachment. The learned Sub Judge held that the respondent was not a party to the suit, the person against whom the decree had been passed being his brother Ramchandra in his individual capacity, and decreed the respondent's claim.

In appeal the learned District Judge upheld the decree, taking the same view as to the facts. It was also contended in first appeal that the suit was barred by the rule of res judicata, it having been decided in the execution proceedings that the respondent was a party to the suit and that the remedy of the objector was by way of appeal from that decision. The learned Divisional Judge held that the dismissal of the objection was not a decision under S. 47 Civil P. C., of question arising between parties to the suit, and that a separate suit lay under R. 63, O. 21. The first ground of appeal to this Court is that the executing Court having held that the respondent was a party to the suit, that finding, not having been appealed against is conclusive. It is argued that the executing Court was bound to determine whether or not the objector was a party to the suit, and its decision that he was such a party is a decision that the question was one between the parties to the suit within the meaning of S. 47, and not having been appealed against is a final decision. I am of opinion that the view taken by the Divisional Judge is correct. There is no reported case exactly on all fours, but in Upendra Nath Kalamuri v. Kusum Kumari Dasi (1) it was held that an objection made by a shebait of a deity, against whom a decree had been passed as shebait, that the property attached was his private property, was not an objection by a party to the suit as such within the meaning of S. 47, and an appeal did not lie against the order on the objection.

If the same individual can claim to be regarded as having two capacities in one of which he was not a party to the suit, a fortiori a person who claims that he was not a party to the suit can make an objection in the capacity of a stranger to the suit. The test is laid down at p. 450 (of 42 Cal) of the case cited, and is whether the claim laid by the objector is adverse to the claims of the real judgment-debtor. The nature of the proceedings is to be judged by the claim of the objector, and an objector claiming under a paramount title is not deprived of his ordinary remedy merely because his objection is dismissed on the ground that he is held to be a party to the suit. The second ground of appeal calls in question the concurrent finding of both the lower Courts that the decree was against Ramchandra individually. This appears to be a finding of fact, binding on this Court. It is argued by the learned advocate for the appellant that the interpretation of a decree is a question of law. In any case I am of opinion after studying the record that the decision of the lower Courts is indubitably correct. Whatever the nature of the suit that the appellant should have brought or intended to bring, the suit and decree were actually against the individual Ramchandra. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Criminal Revn. No. 133 of 1918, Decided on 18th July 1918, to revise judgment and finding of Sub-Div. Mag., First Class, Damoh, D/- 28th May 1918, in Summary Trial Case No. 53 of 1918.

Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 260 (1), Cls. (d) (i) — Summary trial for serious offences though legal is inappropriate.

A Magistrate is not authorized to split up an offence so as to give himself jurisdiction over the parts which he would not have had over the whole, thereby depriving the accused of his right to appeal. 4 Cal. 1st, Fell. [P 151 C 1]

Clause (i), S. 260 (1), Criminal P. C. must be read with Cl. (d), which only permits a summary trial for theft under S. 380, I. P. C. where the value of the property stolen does not exceed Rs. 50. [P 151 C 1]

The offence of house-breaking by night under S. 457, I. P. C. accompanied by a theft of property worth more than fifty rupees, cannot legally be tried summarily under S. 260, Criminal P. C. [P 150 C 1]

Summary procedure in cases of serious offences even though legal is inappropriate. 13 C. P. L. R. 17, Foll. [P 151 C 2]

G. L. Subhedar—for Applicant.

Order.—The applicant for revision has been summarily tried and convicted by a Sub-Divisional Magistrate of the 1st Class for an offence of house-breaking by night punishable under S. 457, I. P. C. An unappealable sentence of three months' rigorous imprisonment has been passed. The first information was laid on 7th March last, the informant giving at the same time a list of stolen property which he valued at Rs. 127-7-0. On 16th April he gave a supplementary list, including articles valued at Rs. 50-9-0. The total value of the stolen property was, therefore Rs. 178. The case was clearly one which could not legally be tried summarily. It is true that under Cl. (i), S. 260 (1), Criminal P. C. offences under S. 457, I. P. C. may be so tried, but that clause must be read along with Cl. (3), which only permits a summary trial for theft under S. 380 where the value of the property stolen does not exceed Rs. 50. The principle applicable is akin to the general one that a Magistrate is not authorised to split up an offence so as to give himself jurisdiction over the parts which he would not have had over the whole, thereby depriving the offender of his appeal: see Empress v. Abdul Karim (1).

The District Magistrate who was called upon to show cause why the conviction and sentence should not be set aside has admitted that the procedure adopted was illegal and no other point is now pressed before me. The proceedings of the Magistrate are set aside and the applicant will be re-tried in the manner laid down in Ch. 21, Criminal P. C. for the trial of warrant cases. He has already been transferred to the under-trial ward and will remain there till the re-trial is concluded. As stated in my order of 28th ultimo, I am not prepared to allow him bail. The attention of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate should be directed to this Court's Criminal Circular No. 1—20 and also to the decision in Empress v. Bhikia (2). Summary procedure in this case even if legal, would have been inappropriate, inasmuch as the offence committed was a very serious one, a house having been broken into while the owner along with most of his fellow-townsmen had evacuated the place owing to plague. The record contains no basis for a finding that the house-breaking was committed by night and that being so a conviction under S. 457, could not have been sustained.

Civil P. C. (1908), Ss. 16 and 20—Suit for recovery of joshipan income is one relating to immovable property.

A suit for the recovery of joshipan income is a suit relating to immovable property. [P 151 C 2]

G. S. Lule—for Respondent.

Judgment.—On this appeal coming on for hearing the learned counsel for the appellants has admitted that he cannot press grounds 1, 2 and 4 of the petition of appeal. As regards ground 3, however, it has been urged that the lower appellate Court as well as the first Court had no jurisdiction to pass a decree regarding the Berar villages. The learned District Judge in dealing with this question has expressed the opinion that the suit, in the form it was brought, was saved by S. 20, Civil P. C., and that S. 16 idem had no application. On this point, however, I think, the lower appellate Court was clearly wrong. A suit like the present for joshipan income is clearly a suit relating to immovable property: vide Appanna v. Nagia (1), Keshav v. Vinayak (2).

1. (1881-82) 6 Bom 512.

and Krishnaji v. Gajanan (3). The last paragraph of the head-note to the third case quoted might at first sight appear to be in favour of the respondent in this connection and not of the appellants, but reference to the judgment will show that this is not so. Moreover, it must be remembered that "property" as used in S. 16, Civil P. C., means property situated in British India, and the villages with which we are largely concerned in the present suit are situated in Berar which is not British India. To my mind the suit clearly falls under S. 16 (a), Civil P. C., and it follows that no decree could be given in the present instance so far as the Berar villages are concerned.

I may, however, point out that there is an even more fundamental consideration involved in the present instance. The present suit has been brought for the purpose of the determination of certain rights or interests in the joshpan villages named in the plaint. Several of these villages are situated in Berar and the remainder in the Wardha district of the Central Provinces. The Code of Civil Procedure as in force in Berar is a different creation entirely, although its context happens to be practically the same, from the Code of Civil Procedure in force in Central Provinces. In the latter instance this statute has effect by virtue of legislative sanction, while in the case of Berar the Code of Civil Procedure as applied to Berar only has force in the foreign jurisdiction order. The Code of Civil Procedure as in force in British India has not been modified in any respect which would permit of a suit like the present being brought in respect of immovable property partly situated in British India and partly situated outside these limits. In the circumstances the suit was undoubtedly wrongly conceived. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiff-respondent can only obtain a decree in respect of the joshpan income from the Central Provinces villages.

The next point urged has been that the interest should have been disallowed in view of the fact that the appellants were under a bona fide impression that a woman could not perform the duties of a joshi. I do not, however, think that this contention is entitled to succeed. It was the duty of the present appellants to have paid up the balance of dues which the plaintiff-respondent was entitled to receive. If the appellants desired to question the right of a female carrying out the duties of joshi, it was open to them to do so by a regular suit. The respondent had in the meantime had no use or profit from the money due and in the circumstances I think it was only reasonable to allow interest. It follows that the plaintiff-respondent will obtain a decree only in respect of the Central Provinces villages. This decree on the findings arrived at by lower Courts, which have not been questioned here except on the point of interest already dealt with, will amount to Rs. 135.10.0 and the first Court's decree will be modified. The parties will bear proportionate costs in all Courts.

Criminal Revn. No. 42 of 1918, Decided on 29th April 1918, against the order of Magistrate, 1st Class, in Criminal Case No. 176 of 1917, D/- 26th January 1918.

(a) Penal Code (1860), S. 504—Insult with intention to provoke breach of peace is cognate with offence of assault than of defamation—Barrister is not privileged if his conduct is calculated to provoke assault.

An intentional insult with intent to provoke a breach of the peace is an offence more cognate to the offence of assault than to the offence of defamation. G. P. Dick—for the Crown.

Order.—The applicant, R. B. Tikekar, a barrister at law, practising at Damoh, has been convicted under S. 504, I. P. C. and sentenced to a fine of Rs. 25 or in default to simple imprisonment for a fortnight. The sentence is not appealable and he has, therefore, applied in revision to this Court. The fine has been paid and the punishment is a light one.

but the conviction is a serious stigma on a barrister-at-law, and as a result of it steps were in contemplation against him under the Legal Practitioners Act. On the death of one Ramju Nai mutation proceedings took place before the Tahsildar of Hatta in respect of his malik makbuza plot. One of the claimants was Pammi, or Param, a nephew of the deceased, and the counter-claimants were the deceased's son's wife Mr. Rajrani and her second husband Manhgoo. On 13th September last the Tahsildar was holding a judicial inquiry into the case; Manhgoo Nai was represented by a Mukhtyar, Narbada Prasad, and Param by the applicant, his counsel. Two witnesses were examined on that date on behalf of Manhgoo, the first being the complainant Piareylal Nai and the second Bhawani Nai. Piareylal's allegation is that the barrister asked Piareylal the name of the grandfather of Manhgoo and Piareylal said that he did not know it. Thereupon the barrister said to the witness in a threatening tone:

"Why will you not give this information, you pig? If you don't give it I will give you a kick with my boot."

It is also alleged that the Tahsildar himself, the presiding officer of the Court, said to the witness: "You are not a Nai but a Chamar." The witnesses for the complainant are the complainant Piareylal himself, his mukhtyar, Narbada Prasad, the aforesaid Bhawani, one Pakco Nai (a witness for Manhgoo in the mutation case who was not examined on that day) and Manhgoo's wife Mt. Rajrani. The applicant entirely denied the truth of the allegations against him, and called in his defence Mr. Narayan Rao, the Tahsildar who was the presiding officer in the Court, a Tahsil peon, one Gangadhar Rao, (a Mulguzar who had another mutation case in the Tahsildar's Court that day), and Jawahar Singh, the Mulguzar of Barda who was present in the Tahsildar's Court in connexion with the war loan. The proceedings were being held at Hatta. All these witnesses entirely denied the truth of the complainant's story. The Magistrate, Khan Sahib Ishtiaq Ali, says that in the ordinary course he would have believed the Tahsildar, "but for his selfish motive, his personal interest in the accused and his prejudice against the complainant."

He says:

"Mr. Narayan Rao's admission of accused's fault in open Court and his failure to take notice of it, and lastly his own unbecoming dealings with Piareylal would simply reflect shameful discredit on him (Mr. Narayan Rao) and consequently for the selfishness he cannot be expected to expose himself and his friend, the accused."

Piareylal made an application to the Deputy Commissioner against the Tahsildar and the Tahsildar was told to bring witnesses in a proper manner. Piareylal also lodged a complaint of defamation against the Tahsildar and it was dismissed by Mr. Ishtiaq Ali as the complainant had not obtained sanction under S. 197, Criminal P. C. The Magistrate observes:

"Mr. Narayan Rao was fully aware of the above two cases against him, as he himself does not deny in the cross-examination before me. Under such circumstances then Mr. Narayan Rao had already become much prejudiced against Piareylal, when he on 3rd December last stood up before me to depose directly in favour of the accused. I have also remarked above about the interest of Mr. Narayan Rao in the accused. In this connexion I have to state that some time after the institution of the present criminal proceeding against the accused, Mr. Narayan Rao, accompanied by the accused Raghunath Halwant Tikedar and also a certain pleader of the Damoh Bar, repaired to Mauza Barda and saw Jawahar Singh (D. W. 4) there. The latter before me could not satisfactorily account for the joint visit to him of the trio, and the presumption therefore is that the said Mr. Narayan Rao had been trying and was anxious to get the accused out of trouble, if it could possibly be done, by getting a few mulguzars like Jawahar Singh, who would agree to speak in Court for the accused if it was necessary. For the above reasons I fail to attach any importance to the evidence of the said Mr. Narayan Rao and it is rejected in toto."

Later on the Magistrate says:

"The evidence of this witness (Jawahar Singh) is decidedly the outcome of the aforesaid visits."

The first contention of the learned counsel for the applicant is that the conduct of the accused in the prosecution of a judicial case was absolutely privileged and that he cannot be prosecuted on account of it. The whole question of absolute privilege is exhaustively discussed in para. 212 of Mayne's Criminal Law of India, Edn. 4. There is a conflict of opinion in the Indian Courts as to whether or not the English doctrine of absolute privilege applies in India and whether or not the Courts can go outside the law as laid down in S. 499, I. P. C., more specially the ninth exception thereto. The cases apply both to civil actions and to criminal prosecutions, but all the cases relate to the conduct of the counsel regarded as a defamation. I am of opinion that none of the rulings have any application to an offence under S. 504, I. P. C.

A barrister could not possibly plead privilege if he assaulted a witness, and it appears to me that an intentional insult with intent to provoke breach of the peace is an offence more cognate to the offence of assault than to the offence of defamation. A barrister cannot claim privilege in the case of an assault, nor in my opinion can he claim privilege if his conduct is calculated to provoke an assault.

The next contention for the applicant is that the conduct complained of does not amount to an offence under S. 504, I. P. C. I am unable to accept this view. Such conduct out of Court would certainly fall within the section, and I see no reason for making a distinction because the alleged insult was made by a barrister when cross-examining a witness. The law does not contemplate or take into account such conduct by a barrister as calling a witness a pig and threatening to kick him, and under S. 152, Evidence Act, the Court is bound to prevent questions put in an offensive form. The real object of the applicant is to vindicate his character on the merits of the case, and the learned standing counsel also is desirous that the case should be disposed of on its merits and not on any technical points, more especially as the conduct of the presiding officer of the Court has been called in question. The learned District Magistrate in showing cause questions the power of this Court to interfere by re-examining the evidence. There is, however, ample precedent for a High Court as a Court of revision re-examining the evidence if there are prima facie good grounds for doing so; more especially is this the case where the accused has been given a non-appealable sentence and has no means of vindicating his character except in revision. The learned standing counsel does not support the view of the learned District Magistrate on this point, and fully admits that there are prima facie grounds for examining the evidence de novo in this case.

I am of opinion that the Magistrate has not given good grounds for disbelieving the evidence of the Tahsildar regarding the conduct of the barrister-at-law, nor has he subjected the prosecution evidence to the criticism to which it is open. He has failed in his judgment to note that all the prosecution witnesses, except Narbada Prasad, are related to each other and partisans of Manhgoo, and that Narbada Prasad cannot be regarded as an unbiassed witness since he appeared as the Mukhtyar of Manhgoo for whom Piareylal was giving evidence. The District Magistrate's observation that Narbada Prasad was not Am-Mukhtyar but held a special power-of-attorney for the case does not appear to me to meet the point. The following is the passage in the cross examination of the defence witness Jawahir Singh on which the Magistrate bases his allegations of conspiracy:

"Yes,—the accused had come to my village Barda in the last week of the month of Kuar last (October 1917). He had come in connexion with Girdhari Lal's case. I was also there. The reader was not present at all there. I had met the accused at Barda where he had visited us. He was accompanied by Narayan Rao Tahsildar and one more vakil, a junior man whom I can identify."

The only deduction that I can draw from this evidence is that the Tahsildar visited the witness' village on duty in connexion with the case of Girdhari Lal and that the barrister and vakil were also there in connexion with some case. I am assured that the applicant went to Barda to conduct the prosecution of Girdhari Lal under S. 342, I. P. C., before the Tahsildar who was in camp at Barda and that the other pleader appeared with him for the defence in a forest case. However this may be, the evidence does not show that the Tahsildar and the barrister and the pleader went to Barda otherwise than in the prosecution of their respective duties, and there is no justification on the record for the allegation of conspiracy made by the Magistrate. The Magistrate's observation that Jawahar Singh could not satisfactorily account for the joint visit to him of the trio is not justified by the record, since the witness was not questioned any further on the point than is shown by his answers above set out. There is no basis on the record for the description of the accused as a friend of the Tahsildar except perhaps the Tahsildar's answer, to a doubtfully correct question put to him in cross-examination, that the accused and he are both Mahratta Brahmins. It is also to be observed that the Tahsildar has been condemned unheard on the question of conspiracy. He was not asked a single question about his visit to Barda. It is true that the Tahsildar had gone away before the witness Jawahar Singh was examined, but this would not justify the Tahsildar being condemned on a point regarding which he was not given any opportunity whatever of giving an explanation. The Magistrate is also incorrect in saying that Mr. Narayan Rao was fully aware of the two cases against him as he himself did not deny it in the cross-examination. The Tahsildar distinctly says that though he was aware of the report against him made to the Deputy Commissioner he had no knowledge of the criminal complaint of defamation, and there is no evidence and nothing on the record to show that the Tahsildar has had any such knowledge.

The Magistrate has also taken it for granted that the Tahsildar would give false evidence against a man who had made a complaint against him. On looking into the record of the mutation proceedings I find it extremely improbable that the barrister should have acted in the way he is alleged to have done. I find that at the very beginning of Piarayal's examination he stated that he did not know what was the name of Ramji's father, though he knew that Manhgo was related to Ramji. It was not in the interest of the applicant's client that Piarayal should show himself well acquainted with the relationships in the family. The less he knew the less valuable a witness was he for Manhgo, and it is difficult to believe that the barrister would wish to elicit information detrimental to his own client. I have to consider the point what object Piarayal could have in bringing a false complaint against the barrister and the Tahsildar. I find from the records that Mt. Rajrani, whose interests were the same as those of Manhgo, applied for transfer of the case from the file of the Tahsildar. It is quite probable that it was apparent to Manhgo and his friends including his Mukhtyar, Narbada Prasad, that the Tahsildar did not regard Manhgo's claim as a good one, and it is probable that the accusations made against the Tahsildar and the barrister appearing for the opposite side were made in support of the application for transfer. The mutation proceedings were as a matter of fact concluded by the Extra Assistant Commissioner Mr. Ishtiaq Ali himself, who decided the case against Manhgo. I am of opinion that the Magistrate has been too ready to accept an accusation made by interested persons against the Tahsildar and the barrister, and has rejected the evidence of the Tahsildar on wholly insufficient grounds which are not justified by the evidence on the record. The conviction cannot be sustained. The conviction and sentence are set aside and the fine, if paid, will be refunded.

Second Appeal No. 471 of 1917, Decided on 2nd February 1918, from decree of Dist. Judge, Chindwara, in C. A. No. 92 of 1917, D/- 2nd August 1917.

C. P. Tenancy Act (11 of 1898), S. 41 (7)—Sub-lease of occupancy holding—Assignment of sub-lease does not require malguza or consent.

The provisions of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act require the consent of the landlord to transfer by the tenant only, and it is nowhere laid down that a transfer of a sub-lease which is valid and binding against the landlord also requires the landlord's consent. [P 156 C 1]

(b) Transfer of Property Act (1882), S. 105 (j)—Principle underlying S. 138 (j) is applicable to agricultural tenancies.

In the absence of any contract, usage or law to the contrary, the principle of S. 108 (j) will apply, although its section itself is not applicable to agricultural tenancies. [P 156 C 1]

Every one is free to contract as he pleases for the disposal of what belongs to him.

Judgment.—The plaintiff is a malguzar and defendants 2 and 3 are his absolute occupant tenants. The latter sublet their field to Ganeshdas and Narsingdas for five years by a registered deed. Subsequently these sub-lessees assigned their sub-lease to defendant 1 by another registered deed. The plaintiff in this suit seeks to avoid the sub-lease and the assignment on the ground that they were without his consent and therefore voidable at his instance under S. 41 (7), C. P. Tenancy Act. Defendants 2 and 3 do not contest the suit. Defendant 1 has pleaded that the sub-lease in favour of Ganeshdas and Narsingdas was with the plaintiff's razamandī, which means either consent or acquiescence, and that the plaintiff knew of the sub-lease on the day after its execution, when one of the sub-lessees paid him a certain debt owed to him by defendants 2 and 3. The first Court found that although no prior consent to the sub-lease such as would be sufficient to protect it from avoidance under S. 41 (7), C. P. Tenancy Act, has been proved, yet by the transaction pleaded by defendant 1 to have taken place the day after the execution of the sub-lease, the landlord has waived his right to avoid the sub-lease and dismissed the suit.

The lower appellate Court has in upholding the first Court's findings concluded with the remark that the conduct of the plaintiff in accepting money with knowledge of the sub-lease amounts to a ratification. In second appeal it is objected by the plaintiff that there neither was nor could be any ratification by the plaintiff; but I think the word "ratification" is used by the lower appellate Court more in its popular sense as meaning "confirmation or approval and sanction" than in its strictly legal significance. It is next urged that in any case the plaintiff's claim should not have been decreed so far as the assignment in favour of defendant 1 by Ganeshdas and Narsingdas was concerned, as the assignment was without the plaintiff's consent. I do not see how the assignment can be avoided. The provisions of the Tenancy Act require the consent of the landlord to transfer by the tenants only, and it is nowhere laid down that a transfer of a sub-lease which is valid and binding against the landlord also requires the landlord's consent. No such provision is to be found in Ch. 6, Tenancy Act, which deals with sub-tenants. It is not the plaintiff's case here that he had restricted the sub-tenancy personally to Ganeshdas and Narsingdas, nor is there any usage prohibiting such transfer. In the absence of any contract, usage or law to the contrary, the principle of S. 108 (j), T. P. Act, will apply, although the section itself is not applicable to agricultural tenancies. Reference may also be made in this connexion to Raijai v. Irbhan (1), where the general principle that every one is free to contract as he pleases for the disposal of what belongs to him is referred to and accepted.

A provision requiring the consent of the landlord does not, in a case like the present, seem necessary to carry into effect the intention, which may underlie the provisions of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, of restricting in the interests of the landlords transfers of their holdings by the tenants. The appeal fails and is dismissed under O. 41, R. 21.

Second Appeal No. 319 of 1917, Decided on 17th June 1918, against decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Chanda, in C. A. No. 48 of 1914. D - 28th February 1914.

C. P. Tenancy Act (1898), Ch. 5—Bhumak is not village servant but renders service to malguzar alone—Bhumak refusing to do private work of malguzar is liable to be ejected.

A bhumak in the District of Chanda in the Central Provinces is no longer treated as a village servant but is regarded as one rendering service to the malguzar alone. His rights in the land held by him are not governed by the provisions of Ch. 5, C. P. Tenancy Act. If, therefore, he refuses to do the private work of the malguzar, he is liable to be ejected from the lands which he holds as a bhumak. [P 153 C 2]

B. K. Bose—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The plaintiff, who is the Malguzar and Lambardar of Mouza Madhari, Tehsil Warora, District Chanda, sues the defendant for possession of two fields on the ground that they were given to one Mt. Hasi for cultivation as remuneration for doing the Malguzar's private work, that defendants 1 and 2 used to do the Bhumakai as well as the Malguzar's private work on behalf of Hasi, that Hasi died on 27th October 1912, that since 19th March 1912 the defendants have altogether ceased to do the plaintiff's work and that on account of their refusing to do his private work, on condition of doing which alone they are entitled to cultivate the land, they have no right to retain possession. The defence was that Hasi's father and after him Hasi were the Bhumaks of the village and held the land as such, that the defendants were always ready to do Bhumak's work and are entitled to retain the fields as village service tenants. They said that they were unwilling to do the Malguzar's private work. The plaintiff denied that Hasi held the fields in lieu of her services as a Bhumak. There were a number of other pleas with which we are not now concerned. This case had come up once before in second appeal, and the lower appellate Court has after remand held that the land was originally held for Bhumaki and private service of the Malguzar, and that a Bhumak is not a village servant but a private servant of the Malguzar, and has decreed the plaintiff's suit. The main point now urged is that the defendant as Bhumaks are village service tenants and as such their rights are governed by the provisions of Ch. 3, C. P. Tenancy Act. If this ground fails it will be unnecessary to go into other points arising in the case, and the plaintiff's suit must necessarily succeed.

The point, therefore, to be now decided is, whether a Bhumak is a village service tenant. It is to be noted that the parties are themselves not quite certain as to the nature of a Bhumak's office. I find that in the pleadings and grounds of appeal the defendants have at different times suggested that they are village service tenants or occupancy tenants, and the plaintiff's pleader has in his statement of 11th July 1913 stated that a Bhumak is a village service tenant. S. 55, Tenancy Act, defines a village service tenant as "a tenant of a holding who is recorded in the papers of the current settlement of the area in which the holding is comprised as holding his land rent-free or on favourable terms on condition of rendering village service."

Clause 9 of the wajibularz of Mouza Madhari in which the land in dispute is situated runs as follows:

"Details of land other than service land held free or at lower rents with particulars of conditions. 'Bala does the Bhumaki work on behalf of Sita and Hasi. Two fields, No. 15, area 14.10 acres, and No. 203, area 4.49 acres, total 18.59 acres, are given musafi to Hasi by the Malguzar for doing private work."

"2. Two fields, No. 16, area 11.5 acres, and No. 202, area 3.73 acres, total 14.78 acres, are given musafi to Sita wife of Krishna Gond by the Malguzar for doing private work."

The fields in suit are Nos. 15 and 203 referred to in the above clause. It seems to me prima facie that the fields in suit are not of village service tenure from the very fact of their having been entered in Cl. 9 and not in Cl. 7 of the wajibularz. Again the fact that Bhumakai is mentioned together with private work indicates that it must have been regarded as private service rendered to the Malguzar; at the same time we find the express mention of Bhumakai in Cl. 9, and it may be argued that some distinction must have been understood to exist between Bhumakai and private service of the Malguzar. It is necessary under these circumstances to see what light is thrown upon the nature of Bhumakai by its previous history. Referring to Richard Jenkins' Report on the Territories of the Raja of Nagpur, 1827, we find the following description of a Bhumak at p. 76:

"The business of the Bhumak, who is a Gond, is to perform the customary worship of the boundary deities on the proper occasions, to attend on the servants of Sirpur when they visit the village, bring them water etc. He sometimes acts as a sort of peon and, armed with a sword and spear, accompanies marriage processions. He is also supposed to be a sort of magician, and to have the power of curing persons labouring under the influence of evil spirits, of charming tigers, etc. The perquisites of the Bhumak are a rupee or two annually from the group-thatch allowance, and a few pice, and two or three pails of grain from each bhargu."

In the settlement of the sixties of the Districts constituting the Nagpur Division we find in Lawrence's Settlement Report of the Bhandara District in para. 125 at p. 59 a reference to a Bhumak as a member of the general village establishment:

"The general village establishment consisted of a Patel, and of the Avkaree, known in the Decree as the Barra Bulloter. But the full establishment of 12 persons was in this district perhaps only found in Pownee. The Bhumuck or guardian of the village boundaries and attendant on Government officials out on their tours existed only in that Pargunnah; the Joshees and Garpugarees were pretty general; these three, with the Patel, Pandea, and Kotewar, were considered Government servants though they received their remuneration from the cultivators. Of the remaining five, who were exclusively paid by the villagers, the Waree or carpenter, the Khates or blacksmith, and the Malee or barber were often found, the Chumar and the Dhobee less frequently."

Further on we find in para. 129, at p. 62 a citation in extenso of the passage from Richard Jenkins' report given above. In Lucie Smith's Settlement Report of the Bhandara District in para. 277 at p. 120 we find the following with regard to village officials:

"Every village, however small, had a Mookud-dum or Patel, Kotwar, and Bhoomuk; and if of any size had also a Hawsildar, Mahajao, Waree (carpenter), and Khatee (blacksmith); while to each large village or cluster of villages there were a Fandia and Nanates Sonar; to whom were added during the latter part of the Gond rule a Joshee and in some few instances a Gar-pugaree;"

and with regard to a Bhumak at p. 121 it is stated:

"The Bhoomuk, who was always a Raj Gond, performed the ceremonies of the village god, arranged charms against tigers, kept in mind the village boundary marks, assisted in guarding the village, brought water for Government officials visiting the place, and supplied the house of the Patel with leaves for plates. He received yearly from each raiyat about a kora of grain, and generally had a field or some Mohwa trees revenue free."

It appears that in these early days the Bhumak was a village servant so far as some of his duties were concerned. In the Settlement Report of the Chanda District, 1910, the only reference to a Bhumak is to be found in para. 109 at p. 43 which refers to village service grants:

"The only point in which the present settlement records differ from those of settlement in the village service grants is that the Bhumak is now recorded as a "muafi khairati tenant and not "muafi khidmati;" the latter designation is reserved for the village servants whose tenure is controlled by Government appointment—the Kotwar, Mukaddam, Gomashia. The Bhumak is really the priest of the village community and held his land as part of his remuneration from the Malguzar; if the Malguzar prefers, he may contribute the fraction of the remuneration due from his pocket by cash grants, or, as occasionally happens, by giving the produce of certain trees to the Bhumak. The Bhumak is appointed by the village and the community jointly arranges for his remuneration."

The change appears to be in accordance with the instructions contained in para. 57 of Fuller's Central Provinces Settlement Code, which says:

"Land held rent free or at a low rent on condition of rendering service to the village will be entered in Col. 6 as Muafi khidmati. If the service is rendered to the Malguzar alone and not to the village, the land will not be entered as muafi khidmati but as muafi khairati. Land held rent-free or at a low rent by the favour of the Malguzar or under agreement with the Malguzar will also be entered as muafi khairati."

It appears from this that a Bhumak's position has undergone a change and he is no longer treated as a village servant, but is regarded as one rendering service to the Malguzar alone. The change may have been due to the fact that the services of a public nature such as attendance on Government officers and the guarding of village boundaries originally appertaining to the office of a Bhumak are probably not made use of in these days. It thus appears that the intention of thewajib-ul-arz was to class the Bhumak as a private servant of the Malguzar, and not as a village servant. Assuming that the defendants are themselves Bhumaks they are as such private servants only of the Malguzar, and their service is not village service, and their rights are not governed by the provisions of Ch. 5, Tenancy Act. As they are bound to do the private work of the Malguzar in addition to a Bhumak's work, and they refuse to do it, they are liable to be ejected. The plaintiff's suit is rightly decreed. This appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Order.—On 24th June 1913 one Honia, who was the owner of Survey No. 25, leased it for two years to the plaintiffs. Subsequently Honia sold to Motilal, the predecessor-in-title of the defendant applicants, a number of fields including Survey No. 25. Criminal proceedings were instituted under S. 145, Criminal P. C., in view of disputes between Honia and Motilal regarding the possession of these fields. They were ordered to be kept under attachment and the fields were leased out by the Tahsildar. On 24th March 1916 the plaintiffs instituted Suit No. 73 of 1916 against Motilal and the heirs of Honia for a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to the rent of field No. 25 alleged to have been in deposit with the criminal Court. This claim was admitted by Motilal and the other defendants and the plaintiffs were given a declaration as prayed for. The present suit has been instituted against the widows of Motilal for the recovery of the amount of rent which by the previous suit it has already been declared that the plaintiffs were entitled to. The main plea of the defendants applicants is that the suit is barred by O. 2, R. 2. The Small Cause Court has overruled this plea and has passed a decree for the amount claimed. It has been found by the lower Court that the plaintiffs were not aware of the fact that the money had been paid over to Motilal prior to the institution of Suit No. 73 of 1916. Their allegation in the previous suit was that money was still in deposit, an allegation which was not denied by Motilal.

The finding regarding the plaintiffs' ignorance of the criminal Court having paid over the lease money to the defendant appears to me to be justified by the evidence on record, and I must accept this finding. It is, however, urged that the plaintiffs had notice of the payment, inasmuch as the slightest enquiry would have led to the discovery of this fact. This may be conceded. The lower Court has decided the case following a passage from the judgment of the Privy Council, and the argument before me has been practically confined to a discussion as to the meaning of the passage. In Amanat Bibi v. Imdad Husain (1) their Lordships say:

"the fair result of the evidence is that at the date of the former suit the respondent was not aware of the right on which he is now insisting. A right, which a litigant possesses without knowing or ever having known that he possesses it, can hardly be regarded as a portion of his claim" within the meaning of the section in question. For the applicants it is contended that by the use of the word "aware" their Lordships were referring to cases of both actual and constructive knowledge. I do not think so, for in a subsequent passage their Lordships speak of knowing. I hold that the view taken by the lower Court is correct. Reference is made to the provisions of S. 42, Specific Relief Act, and it is urged that the plaintiffs were entitled to the consequential relief in the former suit by way of injunction, if not also by way of an order for payment of the money. This may be true, and if the plea had been raised in Suit No. 73 the plaint would have been allowed to be amended or the suit dismissed in accordance with the provisions of S. 42. This cannot, however, in any way affect the present suit if it is not barred by O. 2, R. 2, as I have already held. The result is that the application for revision is dismissed with costs. I allow 15 rupees as pleader's fee in this Court.

Second Appeal No. 304-B of 1917, Decided on 15th April 1918 from the decree of Dist. Judge, Akola, dated 2.4.1917.

Civil P. C. (1908), S. 91—Suit for removal of public nuisance by private person—Special damage must be proved.

The fact that a person suffers in a special degree experienced the inconvenience by the public arising from a public nuisance cannot be said to cause him special damage and does not give him any right to sue for the removal of the nuisance must prove that it causes him damage in a way different from the general public.

M. R. Bolde—for Appellant.

Judgment.—It is urged in second appeal that the lower Courts were wrong in holding that the plaintiff could not maintain the suit in respect of Panhals A and B and window C, as they did constitute a private nuisance to the plaintiff and caused him special damage. It is said that the plaintiff has to use the lane into which the Panhals A and B and the window C open more than the rest of the public, she, therefore, suffers in a special degree from the inconvenience caused to the general public by their existence. The fact that a person suffers in a special degree the inconvenience felt by the general public cannot be said to cause him special damage. It is not alleged that the nuisance is specially aimed at or intended to cause damage to the plaintiff, or that the plaintiff suffers damage in a way other than the general public. It is impossible to see how the window C can in any sense constitute a nuisance. I agree with what the lower appellate Court has said in para. 5 of that Court's judgment. The appeal fails and is dismissed under O. 41, R. 1, Civil P. C.

Second Appeal No. 266 of 1917, Decided on 8th April 1918, against decision of Dist. Judge, Raipur, in Civil Appeal No. 6 of 1917, D/- 5th March 1917.

(a) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 6, R. 17—Amendment of pleadings should not be allowed after a case is closed for judgment.

Plaintiff brought a suit for possession of a site on the ground of his having been the owner of the same. The case was closed for judgment for 30th November 1916. The plaintiff applied to the Court on 25th November 1916, praying that a right of way six cubits broad should be given to him. The trial Court held that the plaintiff was not the owner of the site, but it directed the defendant to remove his hut so as to allow a right of way as claimed by the plaintiff :

M. Chuckerbutty—for Appellant.G. R. Deo—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The plaintiff's case as stated in the plaint was that he was the owner of a site situated at Mouza Sooni-Khulan, Tasil Dhamtari, that he had lent it to the defendant to keep his husking machine on and that in 1916 defendant took exclusive possession of the site and built himself a new hut on it. Plaintiff's story as regards the ownership of this particular plot has been held not to be proved by both Courts. The case was closed for judgment in the trial Court on 23rd November 1916 it being then fixed for 30th November 1916. On 25th November 1916 the plaintiff appeared with his pleader, defendant being in person, and the pleader presented an application saying that if plaintiff's possession over the site and hut were not proved he prays that

"the way of six cubits in breadth, as it was previously, may be given to me so that I may not be put to any inconvenience in going and coming."

On this the defendant was examined ; he denied having encroached on the lane which he admitted was used by the plaintiff. He further said: "I do not want to produce any fresh evidence on this point." The Munsif thereupon framed the additional issue, "whether defendant had encroached upon the lane in question ; if so, to what extent." He found that there had been encroachment to the extent of three feet and decreed that defendant should remove his new hut so as to restore the lane to its former breadth. On appeal the District Judge, Raipur, finds that there had been no proper amendment of the plaint and that the relief given could not have been granted and looking to the time when the relief granted was asked for, finds that the first Court should have refused it and not allowed the plaintiff at the last stage of his case to make out a fresh case. He therefore allowed the appeal.

Here it is contended that the trial Court's decree as to the lane should be restored. It seems to me that the plaintiff should not have been allowed to ask for this further relief after the case had been closed for judgment. The defendant on that day was not represented by a pleader and it is doubtful if he understood exactly what the effect of his calling no further evidence meant. Various questions would have to be gone into, for instance, whether the lane was a public or a private one and if the former, what particular damage had been suffered by the plaintiff, i. e., damage beyond what was suffered by others entitled to use the same lane. Special damages for obstruction of a highway have to be established in a case of this nature : see Bansilal Abirchand v. Atmaram Bapuji (1). This matter must be fought out in a separate suit for I decline to allow the plaintiff to pitchfork this claim into the case at the stage he did. I, therefore, uphold the decision of the District Judge dismissing the appeal. The appeal falls and is dismissed with costs.

S. Ramdas—for Appellant.

P. S. Kotwal—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The suit out of which this second appeal arose was brought to recover possession of 1 acre 13-1/2 gunthas of land, which the plaintiff alleged to be at the eastern end of that portion of Survey No. 83 which he bought from one Saru (P. W. 2) by a sale-deed Ex. P-2 on 22nd November 1906. On Ex. P-2 the total area of the field appears as 28 acres 33 gunthas, but in the Record of Rights recently drawn up the figure is 29 acres 5 gunthas, of which 12 acres 17 gunthas are shown as in the plaintiff's and 16 acres 17 gunthas in the defendant Laxmi Narayan's possession. The field was originally the property of Shrawan and Dawan. Dawan was succeeded by his daughter Saru (P. W. 2) and Shrawan by a female heir named Bhini. Saru and Bhini partitioned the field sometime before 1902 and Bhini sold her share to one Mahumji, who on 13th May 1902 conveyed it to the defendant Laxmi Narayan. The allegation in the plaint is that in the month of July 1917 defendant 2 Nago Rao, who held under the defendant Laxmi Narayan, destroyed the plaintiff's crops standing on the strip of land in dispute and cultivated the land himself thus wrongfully ejecting the plaintiff.

Nago Rao put in no appearance except as a witness, for his co-defendant Laxmi Narayan pleaded that ever since his purchase he has been in possession of the land which he now holds. The Courts below have concurred in finding that the allegation in the plaint is not proved. Laying the burden on the plaintiff to show that he had been in possession of the strip claimed within the last 12 years, they found that no such possession was made out. The lower appellate Court has further come to the conclusion that the defendant has been in possession of the land in dispute ever since he purchased his part of No. 83 in 1902 and that it belongs to that part. That the field was not divided into two exactly equal parts is stated by Muhammad Bakar D. W. 3; who owned one of the adjoining fields. The claim of the plaintiff having been dismissed, he has preferred this second appeal and the only point pressed in his behalf is that inasmuch as his sale deed gives the area of the entire field as 28 acres 33 gunthas and conveys half of it (i. e.) 14 acres 16-1/2 gunthas, the burden should have been laid upon the defendant to show that he is entitled to hold more than half of the total area. No authority is cited for this proposition, which is opposed to the well settled rule that where the plaintiff seeks to recover possession as upon dispossession, the burden is on him to prove possession at sometime within 12 years before the commencement of the suit. In all actions for ejectment the plaintiff must recover by the strength of his own title not by the weakness of his adversary's, as laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Mohima Chunder Mozoomdar v. Mohesh Chunder Neoghi (1) and again in Basant Singh v. Mahabir Pershad (2). That the appellant's case is really rested on nothing better than the discrepancy between the areas in actual possession of the parties respectively appears from his own deposition as P. W. 7, where he admitted that though the alleged encroachment took place before the Record of Rights was prepared, he took no steps to bring his claim to the notice of the officers who made the preliminary inquiry.

It is common ground that the road to Amraoti passes through the south-eastern corner of the defendant's portion, and quite possibly this furnished a reason for dividing the field unequally at partition. However this may be, the contention of the appellant is without foundation in law. His appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs. In the lower Courts costs will be paid as already ordered.

Second Appeal No. 230-B of 1917, Decided on 22nd February 1918, from decree of Dist. Judge, Amraoti, D/30th April 1917, in Appeal No. 193 of 1916.

Berar Land Revenue Code, S. 78 (2)—Anti-ijara tenancy—Failure to Prove conditions requisite—Presumption cannot be drawn.

It is the tenant who wants to remain on the land in spite of the landlord's wishes to the contrary that has to prove the circumstances which entitle him to do so. He has, therefore, to prove, in the case of an anti-ijara tenancy in Berar, that no satisfactory evidence of the commencement of his tenancy and of the period agreed upon between the landlord and tenant for its duration is forthcoming. If he fails to do so no presumption under S. 78 (2) of the Berar Land Revenue Code can be made in his favour.

M. R. Bobde—for Appellant.

M. V. Joshi—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The plaintiffs sue, after service of notice to quit, defendant 2 whom they allege to be an annual tenant. Defendant 2 pleads that he purchased his field orally from one Rao, who was an anti-ijara tenant, and is not liable to ejectment. In this Court it is argued that defendant 2 is a tenant of antiquity and is entitled to remain on the land under the provisions of S. 78 (2), Berar Land Revenue Code. The lower appellate Court has found that the origin of Rao's tenancy is not obscure, but that it commenced somewhere about 1872. This finding is not challenged, but it is argued that the defendant having carried back his tenancy to that year a presumption should be made that he was a tenant of antiquity and the burden should have been held to have shifted to the plaintiffs to prove that the defendant is not a tenant of antiquity but only an annual tenant. I do not think any such presumption can be raised and the burden shifted in consequence to the plaintiffs. It is the tenant who wants to remain on the land in spite of the landlord's wishes to the contrary that has to prove the circumstances which entitled him to do so. He has, therefore, to prove that no satisfactory evidence of the commencement of his tenancy and of the period agreed upon between the landlord and tenant for its duration is forthcoming. If he fails to do so the presumption under S. 78 (2) will not be made in his favour. Apart from this, however, the lower appellate Court has found that the defendant has not shown that he can claim under Rao, so as to take advantage of the period of Rao's tenancy, as he has failed to prove his alleged purchase from Rao 25 or 30 years ago. The notice given in this case is dated 12th November 1913 and asks the defendant to vacate by 31st March 1914, and appears to be quite proper and legal. It is to be noted that in his pleadings defendant 2 only denied that any notice was given to him. He did not plead that it was not a valid notice. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

There is nothing in the Hindu law which prevents the Sovereign as guardian from appointing more persons than one as guardians of the person of a minor. [P 163 C 2]

M. Bhawanishankar—for Appellant.

V. V. Chitale—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The respondent Punam Chand applied under the Guardians and Wards Act to be appointed guardian of the person of his step-sister Mt. Anandi, a minor of the age of about ten. Shortly after the death of Ganga, father of Punam Chand and Mt. Anandi, Ganga's widow Mt. Chironji re-married. The girl has been living with her mother for the last eight years in the house of Gangat, her step-father. The application was resisted by Mt. Chironji. Punam Chand, it has been explained to me, does not want to have the girl removed from the custody of her mother but claims to have the right to select a bridegroom for the girl, and in this connection he alleges that there was a betrothal in the lifetime of the father with one Bhagwan. The lower Court in its judgment appears to be under a misapprehension in stating that Bhagwan has been since married to another girl. This is denied before me, and there is no evidence to establish it. However, the point to decide is whether the half brother or the natural mother who was re-married out of the family has the preferential right to give the girl in marriage. This question has been answered by the lower Court in favour of Punam Chand, but the actual order passed does not appear to me to be a happy one. The order appoints both Punam Chand and Mt. Chironji to act as the joint guardians of Mt. Anandi, the latter being free to live with either, and directs that a husband for her shall be chosen by the common consent of both, and if they disagree, by the Court. There is no appeal by Punam Chand against the order. I have, therefore, to consider upon Mt. Chironji's appeal whether the order of the lower Court, so far as it recognizes the claims of Punam Chand, is wrong.

Under the cover of an application for the guardianship of the person the parties are really seeking a decision as to the right to give the girl away in marriage. I agree with the lower Court that the mother's natural right to be preferential guardian of the minor's person is lost by reason of her re-marriage, though she may be appointed by the Court as any stranger; see Ganga Prasad v. Ramasree Shahu (1). The duty of settling a minor girl married devolves upon the male relations of the family and as the mother has ceased to be in the family by her re-marriage, the preferential right seems to be in Punam Chand. Punam Chand and his father were joint, although none does not appear to be any party properly left so far as the evidence goes. The order of the lower Court, so far as it respects the right to select a husband for her daughter, might possibly have been successfully impeached by Punam Chand if he had appealed. Mt. Chironji cannot complain of Punam Chand's rights declared by the order. It is urged that the appointment of two persons contravenes the provisions of s. 15, Guardians and Wards Act. There is nothing in the Hindu law, so far as I know, which prevents the Sovereign as guardian from appointing more than one person as guardians of the person of a minor. In any case Mt. Chironji is not aggrieved by the order passed by the lower Court. The appeal is, therefore, dismissed with costs. Rs. 10 as pleader's fee in this Court.

Civil Revn. No. 45-B of 1917, Decided on 26th January 1918, from the judgment passed by Small Cause Court Judge, Akola, in Suit No. 1531 of 1915, D/-4th November 1916.

Civil P. C. (1908) S. 11—Decision of the Subordinate Judge is res judicata in subsequent suit of small cause nature.

The decision of a Subordinate Judge in a previous suit is res judicata in a subsequent Small Cause suit between the same parties inasmuch as the inability of the Subordinate Judge to entertain a claim of a small cause nature arises not from incompetence but from the existence of another Court with a preferential jurisdiction. [P 164 C 2]

G. L. Subhedar—for Applicant.

Bipin Krishna Bose—for Non Applicant.

Order.—The defendant Amrit Rao had money dealings with the plaintiff Madhorao, and for the debts due on account of the money dealings he had executed three rajas in favour of the latter. These rajas were:

	Rs.	s.	p.	Dated
1 for	3,397	8	0	26-3-1912.
2 "	262	0	0	21-8-1912.
3 "	300	0	0	28-10-1912.

The plaintiff had filed Suit No. 32 of 1915 in the Court of the Junior Sub-Judge, Akola, for Rs. 3,821-14-6 on the ruju for Rs. 3,397-8-0, having admitted a payment of Rs. 1,000. The defendant in that suit had pleaded three more payments of Rs. 1,000, Rs. 1,262 and Rupees 1,000, and had said that these four repayments had been made on account of not only the ruju then sued upon but also of the two other rajas for Rs. 262 and Rs. 300. The first issue framed in that suit referred to the three additional payments pleaded by the defendant which had been denied by the plaintiff. The Sub-Judge found that all these three re-payments had been made in addition to the one admitted by the plaintiff. The plaintiff has now filed the present suit in the Small Cause Court, Akola, for Rs. 855-1-6 on the two rajas for Rs. 262 and Rs. 300. The defendant's plea in the present suit is substantially the same as in the suit before the Subordinate Judge. He claims that he has re-paid altogether Rs. 4,262 towards all the three rajas, and he admits that Rs. 107-12-0 are due to the plaintiff after receiving credit for the balance of Rupees 4,262 after deducting the amount due to the plaintiff on the ruju for Rs. 3,397-8-0. In both cases the point substantially raised is: what was the total amount paid to the plaintiff on account of the dealings in respect of which the three rajas were executed. This point was decided in defendant's favour by the Subordinate Judge, and the defendant pleads that it is now res judicata, and I think his contention is correct, provided the Sub-Judge was competent to decide the present claim. It is, however, urged for the plaintiff that the Sub-Judge was not competent to decide the present suit as he was not exercising the jurisdiction of a Small Cause Court. The reply to this is furnished by the judgment of Jenkins, C. J. in Ghulappa v. Raghvendra (1). It was there held, in a like case, that the inability of the Subordinate Judge to entertain a claim of a Small Cause Court nature arose not from incompetence but from the existence of another Court with preferential jurisdiction and the Subordinate Judge's decision was held to be res judicata with regard to the claim in the Small Cause Court. This application for revision is dismissed with costs.

Second Appeal No. 561 of 1915, Decided on 2nd January 1918, from decree of Dist. Judge, Chhindwara, D/- 30th June 1915, in Appeal No. 57 of 1915.

C. P. Tenancy Act (11 of 1898), S. 2 (3)—Tenancy of undefined share of land is not permissible.

There can be no tenancy within the meaning of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act of a share of land, if that share is not defined by metes and bounds. [P 166C 1]

M. Gupta and S. Ramdas—for Appellant.

P. G. Misra—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The plaintiff Sumera, appellant, brought the suit out of which this appeal arises in the Court of a Subordinate Judge who was a Revenue Officer to recover possession of land from which he had been ejected, alleging that he was the ordinary tenant of the land in suit and that he had illegally been dispossessed by the defendants who were his landlords. The first Court held that the perpetual lease on which the plaintiff based his tenancy was not for the benefit of defendant 1, Pemchand, who was a minor at the time of the execution of the lease by his mother Sunderia, defendant 2, and dismissed the suit. The learned District Judge dismissed the plaintiff's appeal on the sole ground that the plaintiff's suit as framed does not lie since, whatever rights the plaintiff may have as against the defendants, he is not the ordinary tenant of the land in suit. The only question raised in appeal to this Court is whether the District Judge was right in holding that the plaintiff is not a tenant. The plaintiff based his claim to tenancy on a deed, dated 6th April 1908, executed by defendant 2 on behalf of herself and of her minor son, defendant 1, the consideration mentioned in the deed being Rs. 1,500. The deed purports to be a perpetual lease.

It states that the lessors have 7 sir fields with an area of 23.29 acres and 3 khudkasht fields with an area of 13.99 acres. The area of each field is also given. But the whole of the fields are not leased out; of the total area of 37.28 acres, 24.42 are given on lease, i. e., 15.55 acres of the 23.29 acres of sir and 8.87 acres of the 13.99 acres of khudkasht. The area leased in each individual field is also given, amounting, as the District Judge observes, to about two-thirds of each field. The deed recites:

"We have for the above nazrana of Rs. 1,500 leased 24.42 acres of the undermentioned fields in perpetuity to Sumera on an annual rental of Rs. 9 and have put him in joint possession with us. The tenant has the right either to allow the 24.42 acres of sir and khudkasht to remain in joint possession with us, or to get the same partitioned."

It is not alleged that a partition was effected, and dispossession complained of is dispossession from joint possession.

The learned District Judge has dealt with the subject as follows:

"The question regarding tenancy is the real crux of the case. The plaintiff bases his claim to tenancy rights upon the lease of 24.42 acres. No definite piece of land was leased out, but only a certain undivided area out of a larger area. The terms of the lease gave the lessee two alternatives. Either he could apply for partition, in which case the area leased would be defined and by metes and bounds, and he would become an ordinary tenant of the land so delineated, or he could remain in joint possession of the whole with the lessors. As already stated there is no evidence that such a partition was effected. We must, therefore, assume that, if effect was given to the lease at all, Sumera remained in joint possession with the defendants of the entire home-farm. No single square yard of land did Sumera hold from the defendants, but in respect of each and every square yard of the home-farm he was in cultivating partnership with them. Sumera may have been in physical possession of the entire home-farm, but if so he was in possession partly as manager of Pemchand and Sunderia and partly on his own behalf as partner.

Be this as it may, it is clear that he was never in possession of the area mentioned in the plaint as a separate entity. It follows that there was a cultivating partnership of the sort contemplated in Kishan Sukat v. Jaisant Rao Misar (1) and Khashal Chaudhary v. Nanha (2) and that the plaintiff was not thereby constituted a tenant. There is a further question whether Pemchand as a 5 annas 4 pice co-sharer was competent to create a tenancy, into which it is not necessary to go. From what has been written above it is clear that no tenancy right was created in the plaintiff's favour. Whatever other rights he might have against the defendants, it follows that he could not maintain a suit in the Court of the Additional Subordinate Judge in the capacity of tenant who had been ejected by the landlord? The question whether the appellant has any, and if so, what remedy against the defendants is one with which I have now no concern. It suffices for the determination of this appeal to decide that the appellant had not the remedy of suing as a tenant to recover possession of a holding from which he had been dispossessed by the landlord."

It is to be noted that no notification under S. 62 (2), G. P. Tenancy Act, has been made for the Chhindwara District and the appellant does not contend that he is a tenant because he cultivated in partnership with the defendants. Nor is it argued for the respondents that the Court of first instance had no jurisdiction to entertain a suit of any character since, under the proviso to S. 97, Tenancy Act, while only a Revenue Officer can entertain a suit between landlord and tenant as such, the jurisdiction of a civil Court excluded over by a Revenue Officer is not expressly restricted to suits between landlords and tenants. The suit has been dismissed on the ground that the plaintiff claims as a tenant, and is not a tenant, and the sole question before me is whether the District Judge is right in holding that the plaintiff is not a tenant. It is agreed for the appellant that he was given 24.42 acres of 24.42 acres by the deed of lease, and that therefore he is an ordinary tenant of that area. The problem may be simplified without any essential alteration by considering only one of the fields. Khashal Chaudhary held No. 51 measures 20 acres, of which only an area of 11 auras was leased, or roughly speaking three-quarters. Does a lease of an unspecified 3/4 acre of a field constitute the lessee an ordinary tenant of that share within the scope of the Tenancy Act? To answer this question we must look to the definitions in the Act. With reference to the definition of tenant we have to see whether the plaintiff is a person, who, under the deed, holds "land" from the defendants. To be a tenant a person must be the holder of land, that is to say, the land of which he claims to be the tenant must be a "holding." A "holding" means a parcel of land held by a tenant from a landlord under a lease. I do not see how a share, not defined by metes and bounds, can be described as a "parcel" of land. A "parcel" of land must be a definite piece of land. To parcel means to divide into portions and what is not divided off cannot be a parcel. For these reasons I am of opinion that there can be no tenancy within the meaning of the Tenancy Act, of a share of land if that share is not divided off by metes and bounds, and that the learned District Judge has taken a correct view of the law. As the plaintiff claims to be a tenant within the meaning of the Tenancy Act, and as he is not such a tenant, his suit has rightly been dismissed. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

(a) Easements—Public way—Public rights of way are not easements—They originate from dedication—Dedication is inferred from custom or user.

Public rights of way are not easements. Public, differing from private, rights of way originate from a dedication to the public by the owner of the soil over which they pass. Dedication means a gift not necessarily by a deed or any written document, and it is more often implied from custom and user than from any definite act of the owner of the land. Even when no such overt act can be shown if the public use a way for some time to the knowledge of a land owner and without resistance, dedication will be inferred and a right gained. [P 166 C 2]

(b) Easement — Rights to — Indeterminate body of persons cannot claim.

There can be no right of easement in favour of an indeterminate body of persons. [P 167 C 1]

(c) Easement — Public path closed—New path allowed—Fresh grant should be presumed.

If a person encloses a public path over his land and allows a new one to be opened in its place he must be presumed to have made a fresh grant to the public of the new path. [P 167 C 2]

(d) Easement Act (1882), S. 24, III. (d)—Path rendered impassable—Right of deviation should be reasonable.

When the owner of the land renders a way impassable the persons entitled to use the way may deviate from it and pass over the adjoining land of the owner provided that the deviation is reasonable: Selby v. Nettlefold, (1874) 9 Ch 111; Fell. [P 167 C 2]

M. R. Bobde—for Appellant.

D. T. Mangalmurti—for Respondents.

Judgment.—Appeal by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff brings this suit against three persons, as representing the village of Hingni under O. 1, R. 8, Sch. 1, Civil P. C. to get an injunction preventing the use of a footpath through his field. The plaintiff's field lies between two villages and the plaintiff objects to foot-passengers going through his field. The first Court wrongly treated the case as one of easement, that is, of a private right of way. The District Judge has looked at the case from a right point of view. He has held that the evidence shows that the public have been passing through the plaintiff's field for many years by immemorial village custom. The law as to public rights of way has been summed up in the Encyclopaedia of the Laws of England: see Vol. 14, pp. 633 and 634 Edn. as follows:

"Public rights of way are rights belonging to the public and exercisable by every member of the community of passing over land. They are not easements, though they are sometimes so called in error. . . . These ways sometimes take the form of highways and public roads. . . . At other times they are merely footways or bridle paths leading across fields. . . . Public, differing from private, rights of way originate from a dedication to the public by the owner of the soil over which they pass. Dedication as the word implies means a gift not necessarily by a deed or any written document and it is more often implied from custom and user than from any definite act of the owner of the land. . . . Even when no such overt act can be shown if the public use a way for some time to the knowledge of the landowner and without resistance by him dedication will be inferred and a right gained."

It is a well-known fact that there are public footpaths through fields in the villages of the Central Provinces. On this subject I may quote an extract from the instructions recently issued by the Chief Commissioner under S. 62, Land Revenue Act, 1917, regarding the preparation of the wajibularz:

"Village roads, paths and rights of way. There are usually to be found in every village certain general principles which form part of the almost universal communal rights and liabilities of village life. These are the rights of every cultivator to pass along the boundaries of any field or area in the village taking with him his plough cattle and agricultural implements on the way to his own field and the obligation on the Malguzar and villagers to keep all village roads in order and the right of passage to and from ploughing and threshing, grazing and water. In some districts the custom prevails that at certain seasons of the year the field embankments are cut so as to allow access with carts across the fields. In some cases these communal rights are exercisable at all times and in some cases only during certain seasons of the year. Enquiry should be made into the customs which prevail regarding all these points and the result should be carefully recorded. A schedule showing the Khassra numbers of existing roads permanent or seasonal, or where such have no separate Khassra number, the Khassra numbers of the areas across which they pass should be included. All recognised public rights of way including foot-paths for assa culti where such paths are permanent and recognised should be entered and a note should be made where a special Goha or road for cattle exists showing which of the roads scheduled constitute the Goha. At the checking of the village map care should be taken that all roads are surveyed and shown not only where they cross areas occupied for cultivation, but also where they cross unoccupied areas and especially the village waste."

In this case there is no mention of the path in question in the village map. But no presumption against the defendants can arise from this as the instructions had not been issued at the time of settlement. The sole question in this case is whether the defendants have proved that there is a public path across the plaintiff's field by immemorial village custom. The District Judge has not expressly referred to the principles of law enunciated in the first of the above quotations but nevertheless his judgment proceeds upon correct lines. Given the plaintiff's averments that a public right of way can exist through a private field for his case is that the public right of way, the existence of which he does not deny lies not through his field No. 41, but through the neighbouring field No. 42 belonging to D. W. 1 Radhakisan. The learned District Judge has held on the evidence adduced by the defendants that there has been a public foot path through field No. 41 since time immemorial. This foot-path was obstructed by the plaintiff about 7 years ago and the direction of the path was, therefore, somewhat changed into the position which it occupied at the time the suit was brought.

The case having been decided on proper lines I will proceed to discuss the grounds of appeal. It is correctly contended in the first ground that there can be no right of easement in favour of an indeterminate body of persons but the case has not been decided on these lines by the learned District Judge who has dismissed the plaintiff's suit because the path is a public path.

The second ground that the question is one of license has not been argued. In the third ground of appeal it is urged that the defendants in their pleadings stated that the existing right of way had been in existence over 60 years while their evidence is that the direction of foot-path was changed 7 years ago and it is alleged that the findings are therefore not in accordance with the pleadings. On examining the record, I find there is no genuine cause of complaint on this score. The pleadings of the parties could not be understood until the Commissioner went to the spot to measure and the defendants made it clear in their representations to the Commissioner, which in these circumstances must be taken to be part of the pleadings, that the original path had been shifted 7 years ago into a new position because the then existing path was blocked by the plaintiff. The positions of the two paths are marked in the plans prepared by the Commissioner. In the fourth ground of appeal it is urged that even if the public had a right to use the old path, they have lost their right by abandonment and have no right to use the new path.

There is no doubt as answer to this contention. The first is that under the principles of law applying to public paths the plaintiff must be presumed by his action in enclosing the old path and allowing a new one to be opened in its place to have made a fresh grant to the public of the new path. Also under the principles recognized in Illus. (3), S. 24, Easements Act, when the owner of the land renders a way impassable, the persons entitled to use the way may deviate from it and pass over adjoining land of the owner provided that the deviation is reasonable. This principle has been clearly set out in Selby v. Nettlefold (1). The fifth ground says that the lower Court should have made a distinct finding as to exactly how many years the public had used the path. There is a finding that it has been in use for over 60 years. The sixth ground of appeal is not very clearly worded, but it has been argued on the assumption that it means that the defendants have not proved that the public used the path as of right. The nature of the evidence shows that the foot-path has always been recognized as a public foot-path.

A cultivator prima facie has a right to the exclusive use of his own field and very strong evidence is necessary before it can be held that other people have a right of way, public or private, over his land. This seems to have been recognized by the learned District Judge who has held that the evidence adduced by the defendants is insufficient. I may add that the suit appears to be the outcome of a quarrel between the plaintiff and Radhakisan. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

(a) Hindu Law—Reversioner—Suit for possession by—Onus is on him to prove that no nearer heir exists.

In a suit by the reversioners of a deceased proprietor for possession of the property left by the deceased, the onus lies on the plaintiffs not only to prove that they are the reversioners entitled to succeed but that they are the only nearest reversioners; at any rate they must satisfy the Court that to the best of their knowledge there are no nearer heirs. * (b) Evidence Act (1872), Ss. 32, 64 and 65—Entries in Book of genealogy kept by Bhat—Copy of original which is in existence is not admissible under Ss. 64 and 65—(Obliter) Books would in other case have been admissible under Ss. 32 (2) and (5).

In order to prove their relationship with a deceased proprietor the plaintiffs relied on a Bhat's book of genealogy. It was admitted by the Bhat who produced it that the book was largely a copy made by his father from an older book which was then in existence. It was not alleged that the old book was in such a state that it could not be produced or that the entries made therein were indecipherable owing to age or owing to other cause :

Held : that having regard to Ss. 64 and 65 the entries in the book could not be looked upon as independent and original ones, nor could they be admitted as secondary evidence inasmuch as the original entries which were in existence could have, but had not, been produced. [P 171 C 1]

Obliter :—If the book had not been held to be inadmissible under Ss. 64 and 65 it would have been admissible under S. 32, sub-Ss. Judgment.—The plaintiffs-appellants Hazarilal, Beharilal, Misrilal and Dhanrajsued the defendant-respondent Har Govind in the lower Court for possession of a 10 annas 8 pies share in three villages Khandara, Kutarik and Bodi with proportionate sir and khudkasht and also for a similar share in two houses and compounds situated in Khandwa and Badnur respectively. Their case was that Hazarilal and Beharilal were, together with one Mehangelil, the nearest reversioners of one Balaram, deceased in 1879, to whom the whole of the above property belonged, but as Mehangelil declined to join in the suit only a two-thirds portion was sued for. It was further alleged that after Balaram's death, his widow Mt. Jadao remained in possession of the property until her death in 1914 and that thereafter the respondent Har Govind had entered into illegal possession thereof. The plaintiffs-appellants Misrilal and Dhanraj are the purchasers under a registered sale deed, dated 23rd August 1915, of half the property in suit from the first two plaintiffs-appellants and hence they also joined in the suit. A detailed genealogical table showing the relationship between Hazarilal, Beharilal and Mehangelil was also included in the plaint. The defendant-respondent Har Govind admitted in the lower Court that Balaram had been the owner of the property in suit; his death, however, was placed by him in 1889, not 1879 : it was further admitted that his widow Mt. Jadao held the property until her death in 1914, Balaram having left behind him no lineal heirs. The correctness of the genealogical tree included in the plaint was, however, denied in the defendant-respondent's written statement, dated 20th December 1915, except to the extent that Balaram's wife was Mt. Jadao and his father Ghasiram.

Apart from an alleged will by Mt. Jadao dated 1914 in his favour, Har Govind pleaded that he was, with her deceased husband's consent, adopted by Mt. Jadao about 1900. The plaintiffs, on their part, denied the adoption. On these and connected pleadings, the lower Court framed issues and, finally held that the plaintiffs-appellants had failed to prove that Hazarilal and Beharilal were, with Mehangelil, the nearest reversioners of the deceased Balaram. In particular, on the large amount of oral and documentary evidence on record the Subordinate Judge found that Hazarilal's relationship with Balaram as shown in the plaint was established but that Beharilal's was not. The Subordinate Judge further held that the plaintiffs-appellants, apart from the failure to establish Beharilal's alleged relationship, had also failed to establish the fact that there were no other persons who, if alive, would have, as descendants of Balaram, excluded them from inheritance. He found it in these circumstances unnecessary to examine in detail into the defendant-respondent's title to hold the disputed property and accordingly dismissed the suit. In this appeal the plaintiffs have challenged the lower Court's finding that they had failed to establish Beharilal's relationship with Balaram. In the second place, they contested the lower Court's finding that it was incumbent on them to establish any further than they have attempted to do the fact that there were alive no other nearer or as near reversioners than Hazarilal, Beharilal and Mehangilal, and it was urged in this connection that the onus of proving the existence of any nearer heirs rested on the defendant respondent Har Govind. These are the two main positions of the appellants. The defendant-respondent, while supporting the lower Court's decree, challenged its finding that Hazarilal in particular had established his relationship with Balaram alleged in the plaint. The Subordinate Judge has written a careful and well considered judgment in the case and has examined the large mass of evidence on record in a clear, painstaking manner. We find it convenient to deal first with the second contention raised in appeal, viz., that the Subordinate Judge was wrong in holding that, even assuming that Hazarilal and Beharilal had established their alleged relationship with Balaram, it was incumbent on the plaintiff-appellant to definitely show further that there were no other possible nearer or as near heirs alive who were entitled to succeed to the inheritance.

An attempt has been made by the learned counsel for the appellants to urge that, in view of the allegation in para. 5 of the plaint that Hazarilal, Beharilal and Mehangilal were the nearest heirs of Balaram and of the defendant's reply in para. 4 (c) of his written statement, dated 20th December 1915, in which two steps in the descent of Hazarilal and Mehangilal from Radhakishan (vide the table in plaint) were challenged, the plaintiffs-appellants had sufficiently discharged the onus of proof which rested on them in this connection and that on the findings of the lower Court on the evidence, a presumption arose that there were no nearer heirs. The Sub-Judge has dealt with this matter in para. 53 of his judgment. It has been established, and is indeed admitted by the appellants, that the genealogical tree in the plaint is not complete or exhaustive. They themselves have proved that Radhakishan had, besides the four sons shown in the plaint, two other sons Baijpath and Dinanath, both of whom left issue and had in due course grandsons. There is absolutely no evidence on which we can assume that none of the descendants of Baijpath and Dinanath were alive on the death of Mr. Jadoo and it is, in our opinion, clear that the onus of proof rested in this connection on the appellants. They came to Court claiming that they were the nearest reversioners, and it is clear that the defendant-respondent denied their genealogical table except to a specified extent: vide para. 5 of defendant-respondent's written statement dated 20th December 1915.

In these circumstances the appellants had to exhibit records that they were reversioners entitled to succeed on Mr. Jadoo's death but the fact that they were the only, and nearest reversioners. The case reported as Kaveri Rao v. Kalliya Gaudan (1) in reality gives appellants no help; the circumstances there were entirely different and indeed the principle on which we think the question we are considering must be dealt with was there enunciated. It is the remark of Trotter and Seshagiri Aiyar, JJ., at p. 515 of 30 M. L. J., viz., that the appellants in this case were bound to satisfy the Court that to the best of their knowledge there were no nearer heirs. It must further go against the appellants that, in a case like the present where the utmost exactitude and precision in detail was necessary, they came to Court with a genealogical tree which in the course of the litigation their own evidence has shown to be incorrect and incomplete. We are asked to assume or presume that where the appellants have failed to show any branches of the family, such branches must be extinct. Such an argument however begs the whole question at issue and it is impossible to consider it seriously. It does not seem to us possible or necessary to decide whether these omissions were made bona fide or otherwise by the plaintiffs when they filed this suit: however made, they seem to us fatal to their case. It is clear in any event that the information as to the existence of branches not shown in the plaint was available to them had they sought it with diligence, for they themselves have in this suit produced much of the evidence on the point and that evidence is largely unfavourable to their contentions in this connexion. It is impossible even on the plaintiffs-appellants' own evidence, to feel satisfied that there are not alive descendants of Chandrabhan, Baijnath or Dinanath who are not as much or more entitled to succeed than the appellants are and it seems unnecessary therefore to labour this point further. No grounds have been shown on which we could question the propriety of the finding of the Sub-Judge in para. 53 of his judgment and it is in our opinion correct.

The learned counsel for appellants has in this connexion raised an incidental point, viz., that if we were unable, as we are to hold that the onus of showing there were nearer heirs rested on the defendant-respondent the case was one for remand for a detailed finding on the point involved. We cannot however see our way to accept this contention. The plaintiffs came to Court alleging they were the nearest reversioners of Balaram; we have already remarked that their position was directly challenged by the defendant-respondent in almost every respect, and issue 1 framed by the lower Court was broad and explicit enough to cover specifically the matter involved. This particular matter was indeed the pivot of the plaintiffs' case and we can in these circumstances see no reason for granting the prayer for a remand.

Our finding on the point of the appellants' failure to prove the non-existence of nearer or as near heirs necessarily governs this appeal, but it may be of interest to consider shortly the first ground urged in appeal. The contention herein involved is to the effect that Beharilal's connexion with Balaram, the last male holder of the estate, as alleged in the plaint has been sufficiently established on the pleadings and evidence and that the Sub-Judge was wrong in taking the contrary view. After a long and exhaustive analysis of the evidence produced, the lower Court has summed up its finding as regards Beharilal in para. 50 of its judgment. Everything turns in this connexion on the evidential value, if any, which may be attached to the Bhat's book of genealogy (P. W. 31) which has been produced by P. W. 1 Kesarilal. It is first of all necessary to consider whether this book was admissible in evidence at all, it having been pressed strongly in this Court on behalf of the respondent that this Exhibit was as a matter of fact totally inadmissible. The lower Court has dealt with the question of the admissibility or non-admissibility of this Exhibit in para. 8 of the judgment. The book contains the professed genealogical tree of many families including that of Radhakishan, the alleged common ancestor of the family. The first point urged on behalf of the defendant-respondent is that the book produced was not admissible as secondary evidence, in view of the admission by P. W. 1 Kesarilal that the present book is merely largely a copy made by his father from an older book of his which is still in existence. The critical portion of the evidence of the witnesses in this connexion is as follows:

"I have got another book, pothi also. It is old . . . I do not recollect exactly what that book contains, but it contains all the genealogies which are contained in this present book . . . This book is new book. My father told me that he made entries in this new book from the old book he had."

Now accepting these statements as correct, what is the exact concrete position? It is that there is in existence the original book containing not only the genealogical trees of this family but of many others also. It is not clear, nor does it seem to us material, whether the new book contains any entirely new matter or independent entries concerning other families. Concerning the family involved in this litigation, the position is that the entry we are concerned with is merely a copy—a copy, it is true, made by the original authority himself but still a copy—made long after the original entry made in the original book. This latter, although old, is still in existence and it has not been alleged that it is in such a state that it cannot be produced or that the entries made therein are indecipherable owing to age or other cause. We are of opinion, therefore, that, having regard to Ss. 64 and 65, Evidence Act, the entry in the present book cannot be looked on as an independent and original one, nor can it in the circumstances be admitted as secondary evidence of an original which is in existence and could have, but has not, been produced. So far as the genealogical entry we are considering is concerned, the statement of Kesarilal, if it means anything at all, means that this entry is a copy of the one in the old book. It has not been suggested that the father in compiling this new book added amending or independent matter regarding the old entries. On the contrary the new entries we are concerned with are mere copies of the original ones. The witness P. W. 1, is perfectly clear on that point and distinctly says that the new book contains all the genealogies which appeared in the old one and that his father told him he had made the new entries from those in the old one. For these reasons we are constrained to hold that the present Ex. P. 31 was not admissible in evidence; it is clearly not, so far as the genealogy of the present family is concerned, an independent creation by the author but a mere copy of the original, and the fact that this copy was made by the author himself does not materially affect the legal position. Cf. Sarjan Shank v. Sardar Singh (2). In view of this finding we need not discuss the question, whether the book was inadmissible under S. 32, sub S. (2), (5) or (6), Evidence Act, but we may say that, had we not been constrained to hold that it was inadmissible as being secondary evidence of an original which could have been and was not produced, the book would probably have been admissible in evidence under S. 32, sub-Ss. (2) and (5), because it is a recognized duty and pursuit of a Bhat to keep the genealogy of the families he is interested in and he has as a rule special means of knowledge in the matter. Whether, however, even if technically admissible, it would have had much evidential value in view of the many difficulties which arise on the evidence in connection with details of the family given therein and more particularly of the fact that the original fountain-head and source, viz., the old book, has not been produced at all, is, of course, entirely another matter which we need not discuss.

Ruling out, therefore, as we feel we must do, Ex. 31, there is, of course, practically no evidence worthy of the name on which we can base Kesarilal's relationship with Balaram, established. The real evidence of the family with names which has been mentioned originally by the Sub-Judge is demonstrably insufficient to establish the plaintiff's case on this point. There is, as compared with the question of Kesarilal's relationship with Balaram, a striking and almost total lack of other independent evidence, such as statements or admissions of parties now dead which would support plaintiff's case, and it is clear that Kesarilal's relationship is the weak or entirely missing link in the chain. These findings necessarily govern the appeal and we find it unnecessary, therefore, to give a finding on the question which has been urged strongly on behalf of defendant respondent that the Sub-Judge's decision that Kesarilal's relationship with Balaram has been proved on the evidence is unjustifiable. The appellants' failure not only to establish Kesarilal's connection but also to show that there are no other existing nearer or as near heirs besides Kesarilal, Kesarilal and Mahalingal, necessarily implies the failure of their suit. The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs on appellants.

K. K. Gandhe—for Appellant.

Judgment.—The suit out of which this second appeal arises was brought by the respondent Diwan as transferee of the malguzar Abdul Aziz Khan, defendant 2, to recover possession of a house site in the town of Balaghat from the present appellant Pralhad Singh, defendant 1. The malguzar supported the claim of the plaintiff as his transferee, alleging that the site was originally occupied by the house of one Sukhia, who left Balaghat over 12 years before the suit and had since been lying vacant and was therefore under the wajibularz the property of the malguzar. The present appellant pleaded that the land belonged to him and to his ancestors before him and that Sukhia, a relative, occupied it on his behalf. The conveyance (Ex. P 2) to the plaintiff is dated 1st November 1916. The trial Judge found that the land was first occupied by the house of Sukhia's mother Gajri who was succeeded in possession by Sukhia, that Sukhia abandoned the site more than 12 years before the suit, and that it became the property of the malguzar but lay vacant till occupied by the plaintiff. The claim for possession was therefore decreed. In appeal the Additional District Judge held that Sukhia left the house and its site 10 or 12 years before the suit; that in the absence of any evidence to establish the title of the plaintiff or any ancestor of his Sukhia must be deemed to have been the owner by reason of the presumption on which S. 110, Evidence Act, is based; that Sukhia abandoned the land which consequently reverted to the malguzar; and that the appellant made some show of occupying the site after Sukhia left it, but that being a mere trespasser his occupation, even if it exceeded 12 years in duration, could not afford a title as against the malguzar or his transferee. Narain v. Behare (1) was cited as negating any acquisition of title by the appellant. The appeal was accordinally dismissed and Pralhad Singh has now come to this Court. An entirely new point is taken in the first ground of appeal, viz., that as Balaghat is a Municipal Town the Municipality, not the malguzar must be the owner if the title of the original owner has been extinguished by abandonment. There is however no basis in the pleadings or evidence for the assumption that the site in question does not form part of the area settled with the malguzar. The wajibularz was relied upon by the plaintiff and the defendant Abdul Aziz Khan and I know no authority for the proposition that the land within the limits of a Municipal town must in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be taken to belong to the Municipal Committee. The contrary is clearly indicated by Ss. 52 and 53, C. P. Municipal Act, 1903, where the property which vests in and belongs to the Committee is described and the acquisition of land within the limits of the Municipality, under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, is contemplated. This ground is thus without substance. In the second ground it is said that having found the appellant to have exercised some sort of possession over the land, the presumption recognized by S. 110, Evidence Act, should have been made in his favour. To this the answer is that Sukhia having been the owner till she left Balaghat and the appellant not claiming through her there is in view of the terms of the wajibularz no room for any presumption in favour of the appellant, who set up an independent title and altogether failed to adduce evidence in support of it.

Thirdly, it is said that Narain v. Behare (1), the case cited by the lower appellate Court has no bearing, inasmuch as the point decided there was merely that a transferee from the occupant of a village site cannot claim a greater right than his transferor had. The appellant further relies on the fourth ground of appeal on adverse possession for more than 12 years as giving him a good title against the malguzar. There is however no finding that he enjoyed adverse possession for more than 12 years, nor was it part of his case that after Sukhia left Balaghat he had such possession as against the malguzar. The position he now seeks to take up was not even suggested in the grounds of appeal to the lower appellate Court, in fact one of the grounds of first appeal is that abandocument of title by Sukhia had not been made out. It appears that on leaving Balaghat Sukhia went to live with the appellant at Kanki, and it is said in this Court that she died at Kanki while still living with him some three or four years later. There is nothing in the evidence to show that the appellant took possession of the land in Sukhia's lifetime and set up independent title in himself, and if he made any show of occupation before Sukhia died that may well have been regarded as made with Sukhia's consent. A claim of title by adverse possession raises a mixed question of law and fact and should therefore be raised in the Court of the first instance so that the opposite party may plead to the claim and evidence may be adduced thereon.

The appellant to establish such a claim had to show that his possession was adequate in continuity, in publicity and in extent to extinguish the title of the true owner: see the judgment of the Privy Council in Badhamony Deb v. Collector of Khulna (2). I have read the evidence adduced by the applicant and am clearly of opinion that it cannot suffice for this purpose and even if it were regarded as sufficient, there would remain the objection that the plaintiff and the magistrate had no notice on the pleadings of a claim by adverse possession. In Sundari Dey v. Mulhoo Chunder Sircar (3) it was held that a plaintiff may be allowed to succeed on a title by adverse possession pleaded for the first time in a Court of appeal, provided such a case arises on the facts stated in the plaint and the defendant is not taken by surprise. A similar rule should, in my opinion, be applied to a defendant and in the present case the element of surprise cannot fairly be said to be absent. The appeal fails and is dismissed without notice to the respondent.

Order.—This is an application asking this Court to interfere in revision and set aside the order of the Subdivisional Magistrate, Bhandara, passed under S. 107, Criminal P. C., ordering the applicant to execute a bond for keeping the peace for one year on the grounds that there is no proof of any likelihood of a breach of the peace and that the materials on the record do not justify the order. Under S. 125, Criminal P. C., the District Magistrate has the power to cancel the bond on the grounds stated above. Emperor v. Abdur Rahim (1) and Emperor v. Dolt (2). Judgment.—The facts of this case are given in sufficient detail in the judgments of the Courts below. I therefore do not repeat them here, but proceed at once to deal with the grounds of appeal. I deal with the second ground of the memorandum of appeal first. It is contended that as the parties are malis, that is Sudras, the finding that the plaintiff was a married man at the time he was adopted by Mt. Sakai cannot invalidate it. It seems to me settled law that in those parts of the country where Mitakshara is interpreted according to the Benares School a married Sudra cannot be adopted.

Teja Bai v. Mohanlal Marwadi (1) and Jhunka Prasad v. Nathu (2). The finding of the Courts below is therefore correct and the plaintiff's adoption is invalid because he was a married man. In this view of the case it is unnecessary to consider the point raised in the first ground of appeal as to res judicata. It is contended that the ancestors of the parties migrated from Berar in which the Bombay rule of Hindu law of adoption prevails and brought with them their customary law. Now custom of the caste was pleaded as to the adoption of a married man, but it was nowhere pleaded that because the parties came from Berar therefore they were governed by the Bombay law that the adoption of a married man is not opposed to the doctrines of Hindu law. This plea also was not raised in the lower appellate Court. It is far too late to raise in second appeal questions of pure fact. As to the custom alleged, both Courts have held that it has not been established and that finding is conclusive.

Judgment.—The appellant, Bhaddu Gond of Mauza Mahura in the Niwas Tahsil of the Mandla District, has been sentenced to transportation for life along with three other persons for the murder of his fellow-villager Ranmat Gond. The co-accused are Bhaddu's brother Saddu, and Ram Sahai and Karuba, each of whom has married a sister of the other two. All have appealed and their appeals are disposed of by this judgment. Bhaddu, Saddu and Ram Sahai live in huts within single enclosure while Karuba's hut is a few paces distant. Saddu appears to be the youngest of the four, being only 20 years old, while the others are 25 or thereabouts, Ranmat being about the same age as Saddu. Ranmat lived with his mother and step-father Rowan (P. W. 4) about 200 yards from Bhaddu and for some little time before his disappearance had been sleeping at the house of Dola Gond (P. W. 9), who used to employ him as his ploughman. The case for the prosecution is that Ranmat was killed by the four appellants about midnight on Saturday 26th May last. As to what happened shortly before midnight there is no dispute, the facts being very clearly stated in para. 2 of the Sessions Judge's judgment. Lahwar Gond (P. W. 3) gave a feast to the whole village at which the appellant Bhaddu worked as cook.

The women and children were fed first and then left for home. Ranmat left before Bhaddu and took advantage of the opportunity to enter Bhaddu's hut and have sexual intercourse with Badhania (P. W. 10), Bhaddu's wife. He was still in the hut when Bhaddu returned and being unable to explain his presence was taken before the Mukaddam Nanho (P. W. 5). No stolen property being found on the intruder, Nanha made him over to Rowan and shortly afterwards Ranmat went to sleep at Dola's house. Dola was suffering from fever and unable to sleep: he deposed that two men whom he recognized by their voices to be Ram Sahai and Saddu came that night and took Rammat away. Neither Dola nor Rowan ever saw Rammat alive again. Early on the morning of Sunday 3rd June, Tiwari Gond (P. W. 1), a resident of Jharni, close to the boundary between the Jabulpore and Mandla Districts, saw a dead body floating face downwards in a deep pool in the river Sankul. He took the news to the Kundam station-house, 20 miles distant, arriving at midnight, and Sub-Inspector Punaji reached the spot about noon the next day. Meanwhile the news reached Mahura and Rowan and others came to Jharni. When the Sub-Inspector removed the body from the pool, Rowan among others identified it as Rammat's by the clothes and articles on the neck. At 4 o'clock the same afternoon Guthu (P. W. 6), Kotwar of Mahura, reported this discovery at the Shabarpura station house, 16 miles from Jharni, with the result that Sub-Inspector Sheo Prasad (P. W. 14) repaired to the latter village, where he arrived at 2 p. m. on 5th June.

On Sunday 27th May at 4 p. m. the appellant Bhaddu accompanied by Guthu had reported the intrusion of Rammat and his release by the Mukaddam. Ex. P. 5 is a copy of the entry made in the roznamcha of the day, while Ex. P. 4 is a copy of Guthu's report of 4th June as recorded in the offence register. Sub-Inspector Punaji thought the body too decomposed to be worth sending for post mortem examination and buried it on 4th June immediately after holding the prescribed inquest, the report of which is Ex. P. 3. From Jharni the two Sub-Inspectors, with the Circle Inspector of Niwas who has not been examined as a witness, went to Mahura, the incident of 26th May having clearly pointed to a possible explanation of Rammat's death. In consequence of a statement made by the appellant Karuha to Sub-Inspector Punaji the other appellants were questioned, with the result that at 6 a. m. on 6th June all four men were arrested. They were then sent in to Mandla, where they arrived on 11th idem and were placed early in the afternoon before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of the Niwas Tahsil. Bhaddu, Saddu and Karuha forthwith made in succession and in each other's presence detailed and precisely similar confessions. All were then remanded to jail and the following day at 4.30 p. m. the Sub-Divisional Magistrate recorded the confession of Ram Sahai, the record corresponding closely with that of the earlier confessions. The commitment proceedings began on 20th June and were held by a different Magistrate. On 29th July the accused were examined and retracted their confessions, attributing them to fear caused by threats of personal violence from the police. Meanwhile on 2nd July the corpse had been exhumed under the Deputy Commissioner's order and the remains which consisted of nothing but bones had been examined by the Assistant to the Civil Surgeon, Jabulpore. At the trial the following explanations of the confessions were offered:

Bhaddu.—The Circle Inspector and both the Sub-Inspectors said that if the confessions were made the appellant would be released and otherwise would be hanged.

Saddu.—He was actuated by fear of the police.

Ram Sahai.—The police had beaten him and he was afraid that they would beat him again if he did not say what they had told him to say.

Karuha.—He had been ill-treated by the police and was led by fear to make the statement.

In this Court all the appellants alleged that they were tortured by the police, Bhaddu, Ram Sahai and Karuha alleging further that the police tortured their wives also. Bhaddu and Saddu further contend that Rammat was known to be alive for 15 or 16 days after the 26th May, while Ram Sahai avers that the medical evidence does not show Rammat to have met his death by violence and that he was for six days at Mijhauri in the Rewah State. The 1st question for determination is whether it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Rammat is dead. Apart from the confession it seems to me that there can be no doubt upon this point. There is no reason to suppose that on the 3rd June there was any difficulty in recognizing that the body in the pool was that of a male, and it is so described in Tewari's information, Ex. P. 6. Again the combination of 3 clothes and 3 neck pendants is one by which identification is certainly possible to persons like Rowan and Dola who had close relations with Rammat. Further there is the extreme improbability that so young a man would have remained absent from home for the long period of six months which separated his disappearance from the trial in the Sessions Court. The real basis for the contention raised in this Court by the appellants Bhaddu, Saddu and Ram Sahai is evidently the story told by Guthu Kotwar in Ex. P. 4, the material portion of which may be translated thus:

"On seeing the cloth with which its (corpse's) hands were covered, Rowan Gond of Mahura said that it appeared to be the dead body of his son Ranmat Gond, aged 18 or 19 years, who left the house on Sunday the 27th May 1917 saying that he was going to Majhau in the Rewah State. On Tuesday the 20th May 1917 Lal Shah saw the deceased Ranmat in Mauza Paharna going to Mauza Saraswahi."

Guthu (P. W. 6) was pressed at the trial with this passage in his report and explained as follows:

"I told the police that Ranmat had gone off to Majhau on the Sunday, as I was afraid that I would get into trouble for not reporting sooner that Ranmat was missing, and as I and my father before me have been Kotwars of Mahura for a long time. Lal Shah had never told me that he had seen Ranmat going to Saraswahi on the Tuesday. I had never spoken to Lal Shah about Ranmat."

Lal Shah himself examined as D. W. 3 declared that he never saw Ranmat going towards Saraswahi or told any one that he had seen any person going in that direction. I find in the map a village named Saraswahi about two miles due south of Mahura, i. e. in quite the opposite direction to the Rewah State but close to Paharna where Lal Shah lives. The learned Sessions Judge is not satisfied with Guthu's explanation, but I am inclined to think that it may well be the truth or near the truth, as he would naturally fear punishment for having failed to report earlier that Ranmat had disappeared. With regard to the confessions they are corroborated by the evidence of Budhanis (P. W. 10). This woman has a small child (daughter, not son as recorded by the Sessions Judge) and I find it difficult to believe that a young Gondin would, in the circumstances, adhere in Court to a totally false story implicating her husband, the father of her child. Turning to the confessions which I have carefully read and considered, I can see no ground for refusing to accept them as truthful and voluntary. It was laid down by this Court in Empress v. Chulia (1) that there is no rule of law requiring a retracted confession to be supported by independent reliable evidence corroborating it in material particulars. The use to be made of such a confession is a matter of prudence rather than of law.

The Sub-Divisional Magistrate would, in my opinion, have done well to remand all four appellants to jail on the 11th May before recording any confessions, so that they might have had the respite for reflection which is contemplated as desirable in para. 6 of this Court's Criminal Circular 1—7. I observe also that he did not use the revised form for his records and must ask the Sessions Judge and the District Magistrate to see that this mistake, which frequently occurs, is no more repeated. Some corroboration of the confessions is afforded by the fact that in the pool where the corpse was found there lay a pole (article in evidence G). In their confessions Saddu and Ram Sahai mentioned that the deceased's body was hung to a piece of wood at the bari which belongs to Bhaddu and is close to his hut. A gap which corresponds to such a pole was indicated by the appellant Bhaddu on 6th June in the mandwa in his bari and all the appellants being taken back to the pool successively and independently indicated the floating pole as the implement used for transporting the corpse. There is also the evidence of Ram Sahai's wife Katia (P. W. 8) that Ram Shai did not return to his hut after Labwar Gond's feast until after sunrise next morning and that his loin-cloth was then wet. When cross-examined by all the accused at once she retracted this statement and said that she had been threatened by the Police with torture and had spoken under the influence of that treat. She had however merely repeated what she had said to the Committing Magistrate on 21st June, and I have no doubt that her retraction was merely the outcome of the appellants' attitude towards her in Court.

The Sessions Judge accepted as evidence against the appellants the statement of Karuha's wife Bhuri (P. W. 7) made to the Committing Magistrate on 21st June that Karuha did not return home till the morning of Sunday 27th May; this statement was retracted at the trial and if it was to be treated as evidence, it should have been brought on the record under S. 288, Criminal P. C. There is however enough to satisfy me that the confessions are true without relying upon Bhuri. I think then that the corpse found in the pool of Jharni was undoubtedly Ramnath's. The hands were tied behind the back and one of the articles of clothing in evidence was tied round the neck. These circumstances leave no room for doubt as to the nature of the death; it was homicidal, not suicidal. If the confessions are true, as I think they are, all the appellants have, in my opinion, been rightly found guilty of murder. Bhaddu took the leading part in that he throttled the deceased, but the parts taken by the other appellants included holding Ramnath down while the throttling went on, and this is not the line that would have been taken if the intention was merely to administer a beating. Bhaddu could certainly not have committed the crime single handed, for Nanka Mukyadon's house is only 30 yards distant, nor is it at all improbable that his brother and brothers-in-law gave him the aid required; on the other hand, it is unlikely that the brothers-in-law, the least concerned to administer punishment for the injury done to Bhaddu, would have been implicated if they were really innocent, for a theory that the killing and disposal of the body were carried out by two persons only would have been plausible enough. All the confessions agree in stating that Ramnath was dead when removed from Bhaddu's hut. The position therefore is that he was throttled to death by Bhaddu while the other appellants held him down. In view of the opinion of Stephen J. expressed in Emperor v. Nirmal Kanta Roy (2) there may be some room for doubt as to the application of S. 31, I. P. C., to circumstances like these, but in Emperor v. Nirghi Gond (3) S. 31 was actually applied in a similar case. The killing was really the result of a series of acts including not only the throttling but also rendering the victim incapable of resistance, and the common intention can only have been to kill. In this view the alteration of the charges by the Sessions Judge was uncalled for.

I, therefore, uphold the convictions for murder and dismiss all four appeals. The case however seems to be one in which some measure of clemency may be thought appropriate by the Crown and if the Sessions Judge thinks fit to make a recommendation in favour of any of the appellants, I shall be prepared to support it.

M. Mahomed Nankar—for Appellant.

Judgment.—This appeal has no force in it. The finding that the sale of 1897 by Nanka to the extent of a 2/3rd share in Survey No. 21 is not binding on the present plaintiffs is not challenged. It is admitted, therefore, that they are entitled to redeem the 1/3rd share of the field but is a separate suit and not in the present suit. The main point argued is that an amendment of the plaint of 1911 converting the suit as regards the present appellant from one of ejectment to one of redemption should not be allowed. Now there is authority showing that a Court can in its discretion pass a decree for redemption in a case in which the plaintiff sues for an ejectment: see Parshotam Bhanshanikar v. Kamal Zunjari (1), Kotilasari Dasi v. Mohuni Kudranand Goswami (2) and Mahomed Ibrahim v. Hamja Mahomedally (3). If ever a case existed in which this discretion should be exercised it is the present one. The fact that this would be done was foreseen in the remand order of the District Judge dated 1st December 1907 and was clearly dealt with in the remand order of the Additional District Judge dated 7th November 1913. No appeal was filed by the present appellant against those two remand orders. He lets the case proceed for another 5 years and then attacks the final decision on the ground that amendment should not have been allowed. The case had been pending

In my opinion the amendment was rightly allowed. I, therefore, dismiss the appeal with costs. Appellant will pay respondent's costs.

Second Appeal No. 288 of 1917, Decided on 31st January 1918, from decree of Divl. Judge, Nagpur in Civil Appeal No. 59 of 1916, D/- 30th March 1917.

(a) C. P. Tenancy Act (1898), S. 36—Surrender by tenant for valuable consideration—S. 36 does not deal with remedy of landlord.

Section 36 is only exhaustive as to what the claimant is liable to pay and does not deal with any remedy the landlord may have against the tenant who surrenders his holding for valuable consideration, and certainly does not say that he has no remedy. [P 180 C 1]

(b) C. P. Tenancy Act (1898), Ss. 35 and 36 (1)—Surrender of holding by occupancy tenant under S. 35—Nearest heir put in possession of holding under S. 36 (1)—Landlord can recover from surrendering tenant consideration he has paid less amount he has recovered under S. 36 (1).

When an occupancy tenant surrenders his holding for consideration under S. 35, C. P. Tenancy Act, and his nearest heir is put in possession of the holding by a Revenue Officer acting under S. 36 (1) of the Act, the landlord can recover from the surrendering tenant the consideration he has paid less the amount he has received under sub-S. (1) S. 36. [P 179 C 2]

(c) C. P. Tenancy Act (1898), S. 46—Surrender for consideration does not contravene S. 46.

A surrender of an occupancy holding for a consideration is not a transfer in contravention of the provisions of S. 46. [P 179 C 2]

(d) Contract Act (1872), Ss. 23 and 65—Surrender—Agreement that in case any one set up claim to fields surrendered tenants would be responsible for costs of landlord in defending suit—Agreement held to be unlawful under S. 23 being one as would defeat provisions of C. P. Tenancy Act (1898).

A deed of surrender of an occupancy holding provided that if any one set up a claim to the fields surrendered, the tenants would be responsible for costs incurred by the landlord in defending the fields against such claims. The surrender was set aside at the instance of the heirs of the tenants:

Held: that the heirs were legally entitled to make the claim, and the agreement to prevent them making a claim was of such nature that, if permitted, it would defeat the provision of the C. P. Tenancy Act and was, therefore, unlawful under S. 23, Contract Act, and that the landlord could not, therefore, recover the costs incurred by him in the revenue proceedings in defending the surrender against the heirs. [P 179 C 2]

D. N. Khare—for Appellants.

W. V. Gharpure—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The main question that arises in this case is one which does not appear to have come before this Court before. It is this: When an occupancy tenant surrenders his holding for consideration under S. 35, C. P. Tenancy Act and his nearest heir is placed in possession of the holding by a Revenue Officer under S. 36 (1) of the Act, can the landlord recover from the surrendering tenant the consideration he has paid less the amount paid to the landlord under sub-S. (1), S. 36? In this case the defendants were the occupancy tenants of an occupancy holding and the plaintiffs are the landlords. The defendants surrendered the holding to the landlords in 1911 by a deed of surrender Ex. P-1 for a consideration of Rs. 1,500. Of this amount Rs. 900 were stated to be received in cash and Rs. 600 were stated to be due on bonds and for grain debt. The deed of surrender recites that the land was in bad condition and that the tenants could not get sufficient profits from it to pay the rent without incurring expenditure for improvements beyond their means. It was also stated that the tenants had other lands for which the whole of their plough bullocks were required. Defendant 1 Jairam was the recorded tenant and the other two defendants are his sons. After the surrender the wives of Jairam applied under S. 36 (1), Tenancy Act, for possession of the holding. The Deputy Commissioner rejected the application, on the ground that it was really that of the surrendering tenant as the three applicants were his wives. On appeal the Commissioner ordered as follows:

"The Deputy Commissioner has summarily dismissed their claim on the ground that the application is that of the surrendering tenant. I have little doubt that they have been put up by the original tenant, their husband, but as S. 36 (1) now stands, they are undoubtedly persons who would be entitled to inherit his right in the holding in the event of his death without nearer heirs. The order of the lower Court must, therefore, be set aside and the appellants will be allowed to have the transfer set aside on payment of arrears of rent and expenses of cultivation. What that payment should be has not been decided. The case is, therefore, remanded to the lower Court for the disposal of this point."

The landlords made a second appeal to the Financial Commissioner, whose order runs as follows:

"The only point to be decided is whether a widow can succeed to the holding of an occupancy tenant on his death under S. 46, C. P. Tenancy Act, failing other heirs. It is admitted that she does, and if so, she can apply to set aside a surrender under S. 36 of the Act. If no nearer heirs apply, all such heirs are assumed to be dead, and the widow can take the holding back. This is always the interpretation placed on the section and I am not prepared to depart from it. The appeal will, therefore, be dismissed."

The meaning and effect of sub-S. (4) S. 36, Tenancy Act, has been fully discussed by the Financial Commissioner in his order, dated 22nd August 1916, in the case of Shankar v. Ramfal, published at p. 239, Vol. 1, C. P. Revenue Manual. With the views expressed by the learned Financial Commissioner I respectfully concur. It appears from his order that it had been previously considered that the fact that consideration had passed was conclusive evidence that the surrender was not bona fide and was made with the object of evading the provisions of S. 46. The learned Financial Commissioner ruled that this was not a correct view, and the instruction to Revenue Officers have been modified in accordance with the ruling of the Financial Commissioner. The order of the Financial Commissioner rejecting the present plaintiffs' appeal was passed in 1914 and the right of the tenants' heirs to be put in possession was evidently treated as one to which they were entitled as a matter of course because there had been consideration for the surrender. It appears to me extremely probable that if the case had been decided after the above cited ruling of the Financial Commissioner, the decision would have been different. The deed of surrender contained provisions that the defendants and their heirs would refrain from setting up claims to these fields and that if any one set up a claim, the defendants would be responsible for costs incurred in defending the fields against such claims. The plaintiffs, the landlords, sued for the return of the purchase-money, less the Rs. 154 paid to them under S. 36 (1), Tenancy Act, together with the costs incurred by them in resisting defendant 1's wives' claim. They have been given a decree for both purchase-money and interest, and the costs claimed.

In my opinion the appeal of the defendants must succeed so far as it relates to costs incurred by the plaintiffs in the Revenue Courts. It has been found to be a fact that the defendants did instigate Jairam's wives to claim possession. But the wives as heirs were legally entitled to make the claim, and the agreement to prevent the wives making a legal claim was of such a nature that, if permitted, it would defeat the provisions of the Tenancy Act, and was unlawful under S. 23, Contract Act. The claim for repayment of the purchase money is on a different footing. The surrender for consideration was made in circumstances in which both parties knew there might be a failure of consideration by reason of the heirs making a successful claim under S. 36, Tenancy Act. Under the principles embodied in S. 65, Contract Act, where there is a failure of consideration, the party who has received advantage must make compensation, measured in this case by the amount of the purchase money, less the deduction mentioned above. It is argued for the appellants that the Revenue Authorities have decided that the surrender was transfer made with the object of evading the provisions of 46, Tenancy Act, within the meaning of 36 (4), that the contract of transfer was, therefore, against public policy, being made to defeat the provisions of the law, and the decision of the Revenue Authorities is final under S. 95. But all that is really meant by S. 36 (4) is that a surrender which is not illegal cannot be remedied if it would be against the provisions of S. 46, if it were not a surrender but a transfer. The Financial Commissioner in the ruling cited says:

The first point to be noticed is that the fact that there has been some consideration for a surrender does not alter the nature of the transaction, which remains still a surrender and does not thereby become a transfer. This has been decided both by the Judicial Commissioner in civil appeals and by the Chief Commissioner and the Financial Commissioner in revenue cases."

He goes on to say that a surrender should not be considered as bona fide for the purposes of S. 36 (5) if its intention was to deprive the heirs of their right and if its effects would thus be the same, as regards the heirs, as a transfer in contravention of S. 46 (3). In view of this ruling, with which I have already said I respectfully concur, it cannot be said that a surrender to the landlord can ever be in actual contravention of the law, though in certain circumstances it may be remedied just as a transfer in contravention of S. 46 may be avoided. If the heirs make no application under S. 56 the surrender remains good. I am for these reasons of opinion that there has been no decision, that the surrender was such as would defeat the law, and the parties are in a position where the consideration offered by one of them has failed. The plaintiffs are thus entitled to get back their purchase-money less the aforesaid deduction. The above remarks dispose of the first four grounds of appeal. The 5th ground is to the effect that the civil Court has no jurisdiction to try the suit, and that S. 56, Tenancy Act, must be looked to for any remedy that the plaintiffs may have. As to this S. 56 is only exhaustive as to what the claimant is liable to pay and does not deal with any remedy the landlord may have against a tenant who surrenders for valuable consideration, and certainly does not say he has no such remedy. The 6th ground relates to interest. There was no agreement for interest, no demand for the refund of the purchase-money is proved and at the time of the surrender both parties were aware that the surrender might be defeated by the heirs. In these circumstances I disallow the claim for interest. The result is that the amount decreed is reduced to Rs. 1,346. Costs in proportion in all Courts.

Second Appeal No. 500 of 1917, Decided on 23rd September 1918, from decree of Dist. Judge, Raipur, D/- 27th July 1917 in Appeal No. 27 of 1917.

Easements Act (5 of 1882), S. 60—Licensee cannot be revoked if work of permanent character is allowed to be executed by licensee.

Under S. 60 (b) a license may be revoked by the grantor, unless the licensee acting upon the license has executed a work of permanent character and incurred expenses in the execution.

Plaintiff, out of gratitude, allowed the defendant who was his medical adviser to occupy a certain house. The defendant erected a compound wall, fixed up a water pump, flagged the floor with stones and erected two huts:

Held: that the improvements executed by the defendant were of a permanent character and that therefore the license was not revocable during the lifetime of the defendant. [P 180 O 2]

M. R. Bobde—for Appellant.J. C. Ghose—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The Courts below have found that the defendant-appellant was given a license to live in a house belonging to the plaintiff. It would appear that the plaintiff was under the medical treatment of the defendant and the house was given to live in out of gratitude. There was no written agreement as to the terms on which the defendant was to occupy it. It has been held by the Courts below that the defendant was a mere licensee. The point raised in this second appeal is that the case is covered by S. 60, Cl. (b), Easements Act. Under that section a license may be revoked by the grantor unless the licensee acting upon the license has executed a work of permanent character and incurred expenses in execution. The first Court found that the defendant had spent Rs. 600 in what may be described as improvements. The finding of the lower appellate Court is that only Rs. 200 was spent by the defendant. The lower appellate Court finds that the improvements consist of a compound wall, the fixing up of a water pump, the flagging of the floor with stones and the erection of two huts. Having recorded these findings, the learned District Judge thinks these are nothing more than what an ordinary licensee paying no rent would make for adding to his comforts. I am unable to agree with him in his view that a licensee would spend so much as Rs. 200 for his own comforts when the license can be determined at any moment. These findings substantially comply with the terms of the Statute and I think that the license should have been held not revocable. The first Court properly dismissed the suit, holding that the license was not revocable during the lifetime of the licensee. The appeal is decreed. The decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside and the decrees of the first Court restored. Each party will bear his own costs of the two appellate Courts.

Mohamed Azimulla Khan — Plaintiff — Respondent.

Misc. Appeal No. 40 of 1917, Decided on 4th February 1918, from decree of Divl. Judge, Saugor, in Civil Appeal No. 1 of 1917, D/- 25th April 1917.

(a) Contract Act (1872), S. 23 — Object of agreement to cause withdrawal of application to sanction prosecution — Agreement is not valid.

A trial for an offence need not actually be in progress to make an agreement for stifling a prosecution in respect of that offence improper for the purposes of S. 23, Contract Act. The section applies if the object of the agreement is to cause the withdrawal of an application to sanction the prosecution under S. 195, Criminal P. C. [P 183 C 1]

(b) Criminal P. C. (1868), S. 345 (7) — Prohibition in S. 345 (7) is general.

The prohibition contained in S. 345 (7), is a perfectly general one, which governs the composition of offences whether any steps are prosecuted the alleged offender have been taken or not. Jones v. Meromithitree Permanent Benefit Building Society, (1892), 1 L.N. 172, Rel. on. [P 183 C 2]

(c) Penal Code (1860) Sec. 213 and 214 — Commission of offences screened must be proved.

To establish the commission of offences punishable under S. 213 and 214, it is essential to prove commission of the offences screened: 23 Cal. 120 and 37 Bom. 638, Full. [P 184 C 1]

(d) Contract Act (1872), S. 16 — Mere fear of punishment in criminal case does not constitute undue influence.

A mere fear of punishment in a criminal case does not constitute undue influence, and the law as to obtaining a refund of money or a release of security given under an agreement not to prosecute is that the transaction cannot be set aside unless the circumstances disclose pressure or undue influence: 42 Cal. 236, Full. [P 184 C 2]

(e) Contract Act (1872), S. 23 — Application by defendant for sanction to prosecute plaintiff — Application withdrawn on plaintiff paying large sum to defendant — Suit by plaintiff to recover amount — Plaintiff held not entitled to money — Agreement was void as against public policy — Maxims — In pari delicto, potior est conditio defendantis.

Defendants applied for sanction to prosecute plaintiff for giving false evidence in a judicial proceeding. While the application was pending plaintiff paid Rs. 2,000 to the defendants and the latter thereupon represented to the Court in which the application for prosecution was pending that they did not desire to proceed with the application as they had no evidence in support of it. The application was dismissed. The plaintiff then sued to recover the Rs. 2,000 paid by him:

Held: that the money having been paid for an illegal object and the object having been executed, the maxim in pari delicto, potior est conditio defendantis applied and the plaintiff was therefore not entitled to recover the money, that the object of the agreement being to stifle a criminal prosecution and to compound a non-compoundable offence, the agreement was void as being against public policy and on that ground too the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the money. [P 181 C 2]

G. Z. Sakhedar — for Appellants

H. S. Gaur — for Respondent.

Judgment.—The plaintiff in the case out of which this appeal arises was convicted by the District Magistrate of Saugor on 4th September 1912 of being a gangster in a forged document and sentenced under S. 475, I. P. C., to rigorous imprisonment for a year. His appeal to the Sessions Judge was dismissed, and on 12th February 1914 he moved this Court in revision with the result that on 31st March following the unexpired portion of his term of imprisonment was set aside and in lieu thereof a fine of Rs. 3,000 was imposed. Previously to all this the plaintiff had sued the defendants in the Court of a revenue officer to evict them from certain six fields, 11.10 acres in area and situated in his town near village of Mahakhers. On 11th December 1912 he obtained a decree for possession but in appeal on 24th June 1914 the District Judge set aside the decree holding, that the suit, being brought against trespassers, was not triable by a revenue officer and returned the plaint for presentation to an ordinary civil Court. Eventually the suit was dismissed on 7th January 1914, the plaintiff having failed to pay the court-fee for service of a summons on one of the defendants.

On 10th February 1914 the defendant Muntaz Ali moved the revenue officer, who had first dealt with the plaintiff's suit, to sanction his prosecution for perjury on the ground that he had falsely denied the genuineness of his signature on a certain document filed by them in that case. Notice of this application was given to the plaintiff and three legal practitioners, including one of the leaders of Saugor Bar, appeared to oppose it on his behalf. The application was dismissed on 12th May 1914, the defendants having represented to the Court in writing (Ex. P 7) that they had no evidence and did not wish the inquiry to proceed. Meanwhile on 9th May 1914 the plaintiff had executed a lease (Ex. P-5) in favour of the defendants giving them for 25 years at a rent of Rs. 20 per annum 50.67 acres of sir land in Mauza Mahuakhara.

Before proceeding to set out the pleadings in the present case, it seems desirable to mention that on 6th July 1914 the defendant Mumtaz Ali applied to the Court, which had dismissed the plaintiff's suit for ejectment, for sanction to prosecute him for an offence punishable under S. 209, I. P. C., the allegation being that the claim was false and made with intent to injure the defendants. This application was dismissed on 30th August 1915 by the Munsif of Saugor, who held that the claim for ejectment had not been proved to be false and that the object of the application was to harass the plaintiff and extract money from him. The District Judge dismissed on 13th January 1916 an appeal preferred from the Munsif's order, holding that there had been great and unexplained delay in applying for sanction and generally agreeing in the view taken by the Munsif. The plaint in the present litigation was filed on 21st September 1915. After briefly stating most of the acts prior to the defendants' application for sanction to prosecute the plaintiff for giving false evidence, it goes on to allege that owing to illness and worry the plaintiff was unable to attend the Court and oppose the application and that the defendants taking advantage of his circumstances used undue influence to obtain from him the aforesaid lease. It further alleges that the defendants in the same manner and at the same time obtained from him Rs. 2,000 in cash and that the rent fixed for the land was inadequate (khafif). Cancellation of the lease and recovery of Rs. 2,000 were prayed for.

The defendant Mumtaz Ali put in a written statement in which he demanded further particulars of the undue influence alleged in the plaint and denied that the plaintiff was otherwise than in good physical and mental condition on 9th May 1914. He also denied receipt of Rs. 2,000 and alleged that there was no connection whatever between the lease of 9th May 1914 and his application for sanction to the prosecution of the plaintiff. He further pleaded that even if Rs. 2,000 were paid and the lease granted by way of consideration for dropping the proceedings under S. 195, Criminal P. C., the plaintiff could not recover the money or have the lease cancelled, the object of the transaction being to stifle a prosecution in respect of a non-compoundable offence. The other defendant adopted this defence. In an oral reply the plaintiff explained that undue influence was used, inasmuch as the defendants dealt with him when he was physically and mentally incapacitated by illness and mental distress and threatened to harass him if he did not cause them to withdraw the application for sanction by paying the money and granting the lease. The following are the issues material for the purpose of this appeal:

"(1) (a) Did the defendants recover Rs. 2,000 and get the patta by undue influence under the circumstances stated by the plaintiff? (b) Were the defendants in a position to dominate the plaintiff's will? (2) Were these transactions made for stifling a prosecution? If so, how is the claim affected? (3) Is the plaintiff entitled to any of the reliefs claimed?"

The trial Judge found that the Rs. 2,000 were paid to the defendants on 9th May 1914, but that the defendants were not then in a position to dominate the plaintiff's will, also that the consideration for the agreement leading to the payment of Rs. 2,000 and the lease was the compounding of a non-compoundable offence and, therefore, void being illegal and opposed to public policy. Finally the plaintiff was treated as in pari delicto with the defendants and his claim was dismissed in toto. In appeal both sides admitted that the lease was given with the object of having the application for sanction to prosecute the plaintiff dropped. Two contentions were pressed on behalf of the plaintiff, namely, that the compromise between the parties was not void for unlawfulness and that defendants brought about both the payment of Rs. 2,000 and the execution of the lease by the exercise of undue influence. The decree of the trial Judge was set aside and the case was remanded for fresh findings and decision with regard to the question embodied in an issue to which no reference need be made in this judgment.

The findings of the District Judge are in effect: (1) that the contract under which Rs. 2,000 were paid and the lease executed is voidable at the plaintiff's option, having been induced by undue influence on the part of both defendants; (2) that both defendants joined in taking the money and the lease; and (3) that the transaction is not opposed to public policy and, therefore, not void. This appeal has been preferred by defendants. The first question to be decided is whether the agreement between the parties is opposed to public policy as found by the trial Judge. For the opposite view the lower appellate Court gave no reason except that to arrange for dropping an application for sanction to prosecute for a non-compoundable offence does not amount to compounding such an offence. The learned District Judge appears to have thought that a trial for an offence of the kind mentioned must be actually in progress to make an agreement for stilling a prosecution improper for the purposes of S. 23, Contract Act. I do not think this view is correct. In Jones v. Merionethshire Permanent Benefit Building Society (1) no prosecution was ever undertaken and the whole object of the agreement which the Court had to consider was that there should be no prosecution. On the subject of such agreements Bowen, L. J., remarked as follows (at p. 183):

"The duty to prosecute or not to prosecute is a social and not a legal duty, which depends on the circumstances of each case. It cannot be said that it is a moral duty to prosecute in all cases. The matter depends on considerations which vary according to each case. But the person who has to act is bound morally to be influenced by no indirect motive. He is morally bound to bring a fair and honest mind to the consideration and to exercise his decision from a sense of duty to himself and others. What is it that the law requires about the exercise of this moral duty? It is that it shall not be made a matter of private bargain."

In the case just cited the offence which has been committed was embezzlement and Bowen, L. J., (at p. 181), considered it impossible to deny that this crime was one committed against the public as well as against the individual, and in deciding what steps should be taken to punish it, the person who has to deal with the case must, if he is to discharge his moral duty, conscientiously consider the public as well as himself. To my mind this view is even more applicable to the offence of intentionally giving false evidence in a judicial proceeding. In the present case the parties arranged to drop a proceeding which by reason of S. 195 (1) (b), Criminal P. C., is an essential precedent to a prosecution for giving false evidence and I do not think that any distinction can reasonably be drawn between this position and what would have obtained if after grant of sanction a complaint had actually been filed. Moreover the prohibition in S. 345 (7), Criminal P. C., seems to be a perfectly general one, which governs the composition of offences whether any steps to prosecute the alleged offender have been taken or not. What is required is, as stated in Kishanlal v. Aman Singh (2), a collusion between the parties affecting the due course of the criminal law. If the accused person is innocent the law is abused for the purpose of extortion; if guilty, the law is eluded by a corrupt compromise screening the criminal for a bribe: see Keir v. Leeman (3).

It is urged for the respondent that it is not open to a Judge to invent a new head of public policy or to condemn an agreement simply because in his opinion it is not consistent with public interest, and in this connection Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines Ltd. (4) and Hyams v. Stuart King (5) are cited. But in the latter case it was laid down that the Courts will not shrink from acting on public policy if the contract sought to be enforced leads to immorality or crime. For cases in which the rule of public policy has been extended to new circumstances I may refer to Wilson v. Carnley (6), in which a promise of marriage made by a man who to the knowledge of the promisee was at the time of the making of the promise married, was held void, and to Beard, In re, Reversionary and General Securities Co., v. Hall (7), where a similar view was taken regarding a condition divesting the interest of a devisee or legatee if he enters into the naval or military services of the Crown. It is not however, necessary to rely upon invention in the present case, as the authorities already mentioned suffice to show. It is desirable before passing on to refer briefly to an argument on behalf of the appellants that the agreement is unlawful because the defendants and the plaintiff committed offences punishable respectively under Ss. 213 and 214, I. P. C. In this connection I hold on the strength of Queen Empress v. Saminatha (8), Girish Myle v. Queen Empress (9) and Emperor v. Sanatal (10) that to establish the commission of these offences it is essential to prove the commission of the offence screened. The next question for determination is whether the bargain between the parties has been rightly held to have been induced by undue influence. In this connection the lower appellate Court has failed to notice that the plaintiff has not attempted to establish the threat which he alleged in his pleadings. R. 4, O. 6, Sch. 1, Civil P. C., requires particulars to be given where undue influence is relied upon and it is for a plaintiff to make out his case as laid. That the plaintiff was really influenced by any threat used to him by the defendants is negatived by his own evidence as P. W. 4, in the course of which he deposed as follows:

"The big criminal case in the Court of the Judicial Commissioner was decided in April 1914. The fact that the case before the Judicial Commissioner was pending was causing me great anxiety, and the application for sanction quite frightened me on that account. Each criminal case would frighten me. I do not mean that if case before the Judicial Commissioner had been decided in my favour, I would not have been in fear of the case before Mr. Mia Bhai. My Pleaders had told me that in no case could defendants get sanction to prosecute me in Mr. Mia Bhai's Court. My Pleaders always gave me this assurance. Nothing was done on the application beyond reading of pleadings. The defendants came to my house in May 1914 but I cannot say in which part of the month. They came to me at about 12 noon. I was seated alone when the defendants came. Defendants said: 'It will be well for you to return our village otherwise we shall file other cases against you.' I told them plainly that they might file any number of cases but that I would not return the village to them. I cannot say how long after this the settlement took place. Mr. S. C. Mukerji is my Pleader and I often go to him. I went to him some time after the defendants had talked to me. Mr. S. C. Mukerji himself started the talk and gave me the friendly advice that I should pay Rs. 2,000 and give a patta of 50 acres as demanded finally by the defendants. He said that it was possible sanction might be given. I did not quite agree with this advice and I said, Yo mahaz jabran hai magar abru ka mamla hai ap ya tai karaden."

This passage too refutes the allegation in the plaint that the plaintiff was unable to attend the Magistrate's Court and oppose the application for sanction to prosecute him. The plaintiff appears to have made the settlement partly because, to use his own words, he was apprehensive for his honour and partly at the suggestion of the Pleader Mr. S. C. Mukerji (P. W. 5), who conducted the negotiations and himself paid on the plaintiff's behalf to the defendants. The lower appellate Court has not found that the bargain was unconscionable, nor can I agree with its view that the false denial of Rs. 2,000, leads almost irresistibly to the conclusion that they exerted undue influence. Such evidence, as there is shows merely that the plaintiff was neither afraid of the defendants nor guided by his legal advisers, but acted on the suggestion of Mr. Mukerji and I hold accordingly. In Amjadnessa Bibi v. Rahim Bakas Sikdar (11) it was held that mere fear of punishment in a criminal case does not constitute undue influence, and the law as to obtaining refund of money or return of security given under agreement not to prosecute was laid down to be that the transactions could not be set aside unless the circumstances disclose pressure or undue influence. In the present case the illegal purpose of the parties had been executed and they being equally in fault the defendants must succeed in accordance with the maxim in pari delicto, potior est conditio possidentis. This appeal succeeds, the order of the lower appellate Court is set aside and the decree of the trial Judge restored. The appellants will have their costs in this Court and in the lower appellate Court but inasmuch as they falsely denied the payment of rupees 2,000 I direct that they bear their own costs in the Court of first instance so far as they arise out of that part of the claim.

Judgment.—The appellant obtained a decree against the husband of defendant 2 and attached the house in suit. The plaintiff, who is the father of defendant 1 filed an objection to the attachment on the basis of a sale-deed dated 27th August 1914, executed by the daughter in favour of the father. The objection was unsuccessful, and the present suit has been brought for a declaration that the sale was valid and that the house in suit is not liable to attachment. The defence of the appellant was that the sale was a nominal transaction intended to defeat and defraud the decree-holder. Both the Courts below have found that there was consideration for the sale-deed and that the transfer was a real transfer not intended to defeat the decree of the decree-holder. It is first contended that as the consideration money Rs. 700, was not paid to the vendor but to the creditors of the deceased husband of the vendor, the transaction was not a sale but one creating a security. I cannot agree with this. There was a sale for Rs. 700 and the purchaser, instead of paying the money to the vendor paid to her husband's creditors. The suggestion is a novel one, and it is consistent with the main defence put forward in the Court below.

It is contended that the vendor is in possession and hence the sale is nominal. This argument is based upon a misapprehension. The house itself has been leased, but the plaintiff and his daughter are, however, living in another house. This is a fact which has been noticed by the Courts below as one giving rise to no suspicion. It certainly does not justify my holding that the house in suit is not in the possession of the vendee. The appellant's decree has not been paid off, but the vendee made himself responsible only to the extent of Rs. 700 and he has proved to the satisfaction of the lower Court that he has paid the amount. No question was raised as to the adequacy of the consideration. Preference shown to other creditors is not a ground for holding that the transaction comes within the scope of S. 53, T. P. Act. The case cited in the lower Courts [Musahar Sahu v. Hakim Lal (1)] fully supports this view.

Judgment.—The suit from which this appeal arises was filed on two mortgage loans, dated respectively 7th May 1912 and 18th March 1914. The foreclosure decree asked for has been obtained. In this appeal I am concerned with the question of costs. The lower Court, following the stipulations in the two documents sued upon, has given the plaintiff a personal decree for costs of the suit against the present appellant. It is contended for him that this should not have been done. A preliminary objection is raised that no appeal lies. Sidha Gopal Brahmin v. Purni (1) is quoted in support of the objection. This authority does not seem to me applicable, for the decree in the present case cannot be said to be final. It seems to me that an appeal does lie. On the merits, however, I am of opinion that the appellant has no case. There is no valid reason why the mortgagee in the present case should not get his costs and as both mortgage-deeds contain personal convenants to pay, the lower Court was in its discretion justified in directing that such costs should be recovered from the appellant personally. That a Court may award costs personally is clear from Civil Revn. No. 104 of 1917, Decided on 5th October 1918, to revise order of Dist. Judge, Amraoti, in Misc. Probate Case No. 1 of 1901, D/ 9th May 1917.

Will — Administrator — Public Officer should not be appointed administrator.

In the absence of a statute authorising such an appointment, a public officer and his successors-in-office should not be asked to undertake the duties of an administrator, which are outside their official duties. [P 186 C 1]

One of the executors appointed under a will retired with leave of Court and the other became an insolvent whereupon the Court appointed the Deputy Commissioner of the District to act as administrator of the estate:

Held: that the order appointing the Deputy Commissioner to act as administrator was ultra vires and must be set aside. [P 186 C 1]

G. V. Deshmukh—for Non-Appllicants.

M. V. Joshi and V. D. Sathey—for Opposite Party.

Order.—Of the surviving executors appointed under the will of Mr. Jog one has become insolvent and the other retired with the permission of the Court. The District Judge has now appointed the Deputy Commissioner, Amraoti, to act as administrator. This order is ultra vires. In the absence of a statute authorising such an appointment, a public officer and his successors-in-office cannot be asked to undertake duties outside their official duties. Before inviting the Deputy Commissioner to become administrator, the District Judge should have fully realised the situation in which he was placing him. The administrator has to collect debts, pay legacies and carry out the terms of the will, and these duties may be prolonged indefinitely during the lifetime of the legatees and the testator's widow Sitabai.

Suits will have to be filed by the administrator and it is difficult to see how funds are to be supplied to him. He may be held responsible for the costs of litigations if eventually the appeal now pending before the Privy Council is successful, I hold that the order was ultra vires and it is accordingly set aside. My attention has also been called to a previous order to be found in the order sheet dated 30th April 1917, in which it is recited that the appointment of Mr. Jog as guardian is cancelled. This is not correct. So far as I can find, there is no such order either in these proceedings or in the proceedings under the guardianship case. Each party will bear the costs of this petition of revision in both Courts.

Second Appeal No. 607 of 1917, Decided on 25th April 1918, from decree of Dist. Judge, Bhandara.

Section 176 requires a notice only when the pawnee wishes to exercise his option of selling the pledged goods. If he chooses to bring a suit upon the debt, no notice is required by that section. [P 186 C 2]

G. R. Pradhan—for Appellant.

Judgment.—In view of the finding of the lower appellate Court that the plaintiff had verbally asked the defendant to re-pay the loan several times, I cannot see my way to interfere with that Court's decision. S. 176, Contract Act, requires a notice only when the pawnee wishes to exercise his option of selling the pledged goods. If he chooses to bring a suit upon the debt no notice is apparently required by that section. As to ground 1 it seems me that the whole case was here opened up on record, and it was open to the lower appellate Court to reconsider its finding arrived at the ex parte hearing. The finding may have been adverse to the appellant on that hearing, because he may have thought it unnecessary to prove his case fully on the point involved in the finding, hoping to succeed on the other points. At any rate the finding referred to in the ground 1 makes no difference to the result of the appeal before the lower appellate Court.

Plaintiff malguzar sued the defendants for arrears of rent, the amount of which was less than Rs. 100. The defendants pleaded that they were not liable for rent as they had relinquished their share in the holding in favour of their nephew J.

Held: that no second appeal lay, inasmuch as the amount claimed was less than Rs. 100, and the case did not fall under Cl. (b), S. 81, C. P. Tenancy Act, J. not being a party to the suit and the defendants and J. not having conflicting claims with regard to the tenancy. [P 187 C 1]

P. S. Kotwal—for Appellant.

Gangadhar Sitaram—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The plaintiff-appellant, who is the malguzar of the village, sues the defendants for arrears of rent. The defence was that by a compromise they have relinquished their share in the holding in favour of their nephew one Jodha and have therefore ceased to be liable for rent. The defence has prevailed in the Court below, and this second appeal has been filed by the landlord. The preliminary point for decision is whether having regard to the provisions of S. 98, Tenancy Act, there is a second appeal. The amount claimed was less than Rs. 100. Admittedly there will be no second appeal unless the case comes under Cl. (b), S. 81, that is,

"unless a question relating to a title to land or some interest in land has been determined as between parties having conflicting claims thereto."

The plaintiff's title to the land has never been disputed. But it is urged that a decision has been arrived at regarding the rights to the tenancy as between the defendants and Jodha. Jodha was not a party to the suit, nor can the defendants and Jodha be said to have had conflicting claims with regard to the tenancy. The defendants admit Jodha's right and do not dispute it. To bring the case under Cl. (b) it is necessary that there should be an adjudication as between persons impleaded as parties to the suit and having conflicting interests. Hempaj As-karan v. Kankhalal (1). Neither of these conditions is fulfilled in this case. The appeal is dismissed with costs, on the ground that no appeal lies in the case.

First Appeal No. 45 of 1917, Decided on 23rd February 1918, against judgment of Dist. Judge, Bhandara, in Civil Suit No. 33 of 1915, D/- 31st January 1917.

(a) Minor—Decree against—Setting aside—Though gross negligence of guardian in conducting suit is ground for minor suing for setting aside decree still mere bad management of suit or omission to raise money by further encumbering estate to prevent final decree being passed is not ground for setting aside decree unless guardian's conduct amounts to fraud.

Gross negligence on the part of a guardian or next friend in conducting a suit on behalf of a minor is a good ground for the minor to bring a suit for setting aside the decree. [P 189 C 2]

But mere bad management of a suit by the guardian or an omission to raise money on behalf of the minor by further encumbering the estate, in order to prevent a final decree in a mortgage suit from being passed, is not a sufficient ground for setting aside a mortgage decree unless the conduct of the guardian amounts to fraud or gross negligence: (1894) A. W. N. 141. Foll. [P 189 C 2]

(b) Interpretation of Statutes—Audi alteram partem—Applicability of.

There is no exception to the rule audi alteram partem unless such an exception is made by legislation. [P 190 C 2]

(c) Civil P. C. (1908), O. 17, R. 2—Non-service of summons on minor's guardian—Ex parte decree passed—Minor's remedy is under R. 13, O. 9 and not by separate suit unless absence of guardian amounts to gross negligence on his part—Civil P. C. (1908), O. 9, R. 13.

The mere non-service of summons on a party to a suit is not a sufficient ground for setting aside the decree in a fresh suit unless it is part of a scheme of fraud. [P 191 C 1]

If an ex parte decree is passed against a minor under O. 17, R. 2, Civil P. C., the remedy of the minor acting through his guardian lies in the provisions of O. 9, R. 13 of the Code, and he cannot obtain relief in a separate suit unless the absence of the guardian has resulted in such an injustice to the minor as would amount to gross negligence on the part of the guardian.

[P 191 C 1]

(d) Minor—Minor represented by guardian—Ex parte decree—Minor does not cease to be represented owing to absence of guardian.

A minor once represented by a guardian does not cease to be so represented merely because an ex parte decree is passed against him owing to the absence of his guardian.

M. Gupta, S. Ramdas and R. B. Waghare—for Appellants.

B. K. Bose, V. Bose, V. M. Jakatdar and M. Bhawani Shankar—for Respondents.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit filed as a sequel to the case disposed of in Miscellaneous Appeal No. 30 of 1913 disposed of on 6th February 1915. The minor defendants in Suit No. 50 of 1908, Sego and Jagan, have now brought a suit for a declaration that the decree final in that suit is null and void and for possession of the mortgaged property, alleging that the mortgage debt has been fully satisfied by the usufruct of the property since it has been in the decree-holder's possession. In the alternative they ask to be allowed to redeem in case any balance of the mortgage debt remains unsatisfied. The District Judge has granted a decree that the final decree passed against the plaintiffs in Suit No. 50 of 1908 does not bind them and is null and void as against them. He has not, however, granted a decree for possession or redemption but has relegated the parties to the position they were in before the decree final was passed. It is admitted by both sides that if the District Judge is right in holding that the decree final does not bind the plaintiffs, the form of the decree in this suit is a correct one. The plaintiffs claim that relief should be granted on three grounds. The first is fraud on the part of the decree-holders; the second is negligence on the part of Budhu, the guardian ad litem of the plaintiffs in the former suit; thirdly, it is said that the decree final is void against the plaintiffs as they were not properly represented by a guardian ad litem when the decree was passed. The learned District Judge has held that none of the allegations of fraud made against the decree-holders have been proved, and this finding has not been challenged in argument by the learned counsel for the respondents. The nature of the fraud alleged is, however, closely bound up with the charge of negligence directed at Budhu.

The facts of the case as regards the circumstances in which the decree was made final have been fully set out in the former judgment of this Court and the judgment appealed against and need not be repeated fully here. It is sufficient to say that Budhu is the full brother of one appellant and stepbrother of the other appellant and was their guardian ad litem. When the decree-holders applied for a final decree for foreclosure, a notice was issued to the minors in which they were described as minors by guardian Sakham, Sakham being their father. Sakham was not their guardian ad litem, but it has been found that the notice was drawn up incorrectly not through anybody's fraud but by a pure mistake Sakham having been nominated as guardian ad litem by the plaintiffs in that suit at the commencement of the proceedings. He declined to act as guardian of his sons and then Budhu was appointed guardian ad litem. Even Sakham was not served as guardian of the minors but the notice was served on the minors personally. Subsequently on 25th September 1910 service was made on Sakham and Budhu, defendants 1 and 2 in the case, in their own names and not as guardians of the minor defendants. The notice was to appear on 8th October 1910, but they did not appear, and the notices were held to have been duly served on them. What happened was, and this is the version adopted by the plaintiffs in this suit, that Sakham and Budhu, when they saw the process server appear, concealed themselves inside the house and the notices were affixed to the house.

In the lower Court the charges of fraud made against the decree-holders have been broken down and no attempt is made to sustain them in this Court. The specific acts of negligence alleged against Budhu are: (1) that he made no attempt to raise the mortgage money before 15th April 1910, the date named for payment in the preliminary decree; (2) that he did not apply on the minors' behalf to set aside the ex parte final decree against the minors; and (3) that he did not appeal against the final decree on behalf of the minors on the ground that it had been passed behind their backs. In estimating the negligence, if any, on the part of Budhu we must see what the allegations made by the plaintiffs are, and these are contained in the main charge of fraud against the decree holders. The plaintiffs allege that on 25th September 1910, when Budhu and Sakharan concealed themselves within the house from the process-server, a compromise was effected inside the house between the parties, and the defendants stated to the mothers of the plaintiffs that they would not get the decree made final for the full 5 annas 4 pies mortgage, but would give up the minors' share of the property and accept the other half of the property in full satisfaction of the decree. According to the plaintiffs' case therefore what they would have argued if they had appeared through their guardian as from on 8th October 1910, is that the decree-holders had released their share of the property. The story about the alleged compromise on 25th September 1910 has on very good grounds been found to be a tissue of falsehoods and this finding is accepted in this Court. I do not understand how the plaintiffs can complain that their guardian did not appear for them and tell a story which has now been found to be absolutely false. There can be no negligence in omitting to come forward and tell a false story. It is nowhere alleged in the plaintiffs' pleadings that if they had appeared through a diligent guardian they would have asked for an extension of time. According to their case what they would have pleaded would have been something perfectly different. Presumably any appeal made on behalf of the plaintiffs would have put forward the story that has now been put forward and is found to be false. I do not see how we can ignore the plaintiffs' pleas in the present case and suppose that a different case might have been put forward for them than the one they have advanced now. But even if we ignore the specific allegations made by the plaintiffs, it remains to be seen whether Budhu can be said to have been negligent in not raising the money, in not applying to have the ex parte decree set aside on the ground that the minors have not been served and in not appealing against the decree on the same ground.

As to the alleged negligence in not raising the money, the plaintiffs' plea is that the other cosharer of Mouza Pallonguri was willing to advance the money on easy terms, that is to say, that the money might have been raised by further unumbering the property. Budhu and Sakharan did not raise the money in their own interest and an omission to raise the money on behalf of the minors by further unumbering the estate is not such an act of gross negligence as would entitle the plaintiffs to set the decree aside as a nullity. It is not a fact that the money was available on 8th October, the date on which the decree was made final, and in these circumstances it cannot be imputed as an act of gross negligence that Budhu failed to appear or failed to take steps to set aside the ex parte decree. No money was deposited on account of the plaintiffs until 25th August 1912. No doubt gross negligence on the part of a guardian or next friend in conducting a suit on behalf of a minor is a good ground for the minor setting aside the decree: vide Lalla Sheo Churn Lal v. Ramnandan Dohy (1), Ram Sarup Lal v. Shah Lalajit Hosain (2), Golepati Sabhara v. Golepati Narasamma (3). But mere bad management of a suit by the guardian is not a sufficient ground for setting aside a decree unless it amounts to fraud or gross negligence: vide Daulat Singh v. Raghubir Singh (4). The time for payment expired on 15th April 1910, and the decree was made final on 8th October 1910. The minors through their guardian could have asked for an extension of time quite independently of any application by the decree holders for making the decree final. No such application was ever made on their behalf. In the circumstances of the case it was not gross negligence on the part of the guardian to abstain from seeking to set aside or appealing against a final decree merely on the ground that the minors had not been noticed. It was an omission on his part which may well have been the wisest course in the circumstances of the case. It would have been gross negligence not to appeal or apply for restoration if the money had been paid or if the alleged compromise had really taken place, but it was not necessarily negligence to abstain from doing so when all that could be hoped was that the Court might possibly grant an extension of time, which had not been asked for up to the date of the hearing of the application to make the decree absolute.

We next come to the most important question in the case namely, whether the final decree is a nullity against the minors because they were not noticed when the decree-holders applied to have the decree made final. The District Judge seems to think that this point has been settled by my remarks in the former case. This is not so. I held and I still hold that the minors' guardian was not noticed, and, therefore, the minors were not represented at the hearing when the decree was made final. I did not intend to say nor could I say, that the minors were entirely unrepresented so that the proceedings against them were void. Nothing I said in the former appeal can possibly make this question res judicata. I will first dispose of three arguments raised on behalf of the appellants. It is first of all urged that on an application being made for an order under O. 34, R. 3 (2), for a final decree the non-applicant party concerned is not entitled to notice thereof or to appear and be heard in answer thereto. It is urged that the ruling in Seth Bagandas v. Shridhar (5) is no longer to the point, since under the present Civil Procedure Code all proceedings up to the granting of a final decree are proceedings in the suit. I am of opinion, however, that the principles of that ruling are still in force. The proceedings started by an application to make a foreclosure decree final are no doubt proceedings in the suit, but they are a fresh stage in the proceedings which are opened by the application. The mere mentioning of a date for payment in the preliminary decree cannot possibly be a notice of the re-opening of the fresh stage of the proceedings beginning with an application to make the decree final.

Where there is no possibility of giving the parties a date for further hearing, then the other side must be given a notice when the proceedings are re-opened by one party or the other. To ignore this rule would be to neglect the maxim audi alteram partem. Under O. 21, R. 22, it is provided that in execution cases notice to the judgment-debtor need be given only if the application is made more than a year after the date of the decree. This seems at first sight to be an exception to the rule laid down by the maxim, but it is not really so. If nothing at all were said about noticing the other side then a notice would have to issue. What R. 22, really means is that the rule is that the other side should be noticed, but that rule need not be observed if the application is made less than a year after the date of the decree. This is not an execution case but I have mentioned the point in order to show that there is no exception to the rule audi alteram partem, unless such an exception is made by legislation. It is next urged for the appellants that the service on the minors personally was a valid service. No serious argument has been addressed in support of this contention, which I consider to be unsustainable. This plea certainly does not obtain adequate support in some remarks of Wilson, J., in Suresh Chander Wum Chowdhry v. Jagat Chander Deb (6). It is also suggested that the fact that Budhu was personally served was a sufficient service on the minors of whom he was the guardian, though he was not served as their guardian. I am not prepared to say that the service on a guardian personally as a party to the suit can never be a good service on the minors of whom he is the guardian, but I adhere to my opinion that in this case the service on Budhu cannot be regarded as a proper service of the notice to the minors through their guardian inasmuch as Budhu never subsequently acted in the capacity of the minors' guardian. When he applied in Ex. P 10 to set aside the ex parte decree, he did so on his own behalf and not on behalf of the minors.

The main contention on behalf of the appellants is that the final decree is merely an ex parte decree in the ordinary sense of that term, liable to be set aside in the prescribed manner, and not a mere nullity not requiring to be set aside or liable to be set aside only by a separate suit. On the one hand we have a class of cases dealt with in Rashid un-nisa v. Muhammad Ismail Khan (7), Sham Lal v. Ghasita (8), Hanuman Prasad v. Muhammad Ishaq (9), Khairaj Mal v. Daim (10) and Purna Chandra Kumar v. Bejoy Chand (11). These were all cases in which either no guardian at all was appointed at any stage of the suit or in which the guardian appointed was not legally competent to be a guardian or next friend. On the other hand we have a class of cases instanced by Raghubar Dyal Sahu v. Bhikya Lal Misser (12), where throughout the suit the infant has been duly represented by his guardian. In such a case where the infant after attaining majority seeks to set aside that decree by a separate suit, he can succeed only on proof of fraud or collusion on the part of his guardian. In the present case the plaintiffs were duly represented by their guardian and that representation undoubtedly extended until the termination of the suit by the passing of the final decree. After studying the cases, Narsing Das v. Bibi Rafi-kan (13), Pran Nath Roy v. Mohesh Chandra Moitra (14), Radha Raman Shaha v. Pran Nath Roy (15), Khages-dra Nath Mahata v. Pran Nath Roy (16) and Puran Chand v. Sheo Dal Rai (17), it seems to me clear that the mere non-service of summons on a party to the suit is not a sufficient ground to set aside the decree in a fresh suit, though where the non-service is a part of a scheme of fraud the decree might be set aside.

There are no rulings exactly on all fours with the present case. The first question that arises is whether a minor who is duly represented by a guardian is in a better position than an adult. He would certainly be in a better position if he was not served because no guardian was appointed for him. If an ex parte decree is passed against a minor under O. 17, R. 2, it appears to me that the remedy of the minor acting through his guardian lies in the provisions of O. 9, R. 13, and he cannot obtain relief in a separate suit unless the absence of the guardian has resulted in such injustice to the minor as would amount to gross negligence on the part of the guardian. In other words, a minor once represented by a guardian does not cease to be so represented merely because an ex parte decree is passed against him owing to the absence of his guardian. The further question remains whether the minors in the present case can be said not to have been represented because no notice was served on their guardian at the opening of the fresh stage of the suit. After some consideration I am of opinion that the minor cannot be said not to have been represented by a guardian. They were represented, but an ex parte order was passed against them in circumstances which would have entitled their guardian to apply to have the ex parte decree set aside under O. 9, R. 13. The Court took steps to have the minors served but owing to a mistake of procedure they were not served. It appears to me that they are exactly in the same position as if their guardian had been served but had been unavoidably prevented from attending in circumstances which entitled him to have the ex parte decree set aside. In such circumstances I do not think it can be said that the minors were not represented at all.

The lower Court has held that there was no fraud, and I have held that there was no gross negligence on the part of the guardian, and I am of opinion in the special circumstances of the case that while the minors could have applied to set aside the ex parte decree under O. 9, R. 13, they cannot set aside the decree under a fresh suit since the decree was not a nullity but an ex parte decree within the ordinary meaning of that term. To hold otherwise would, in my opinion, be to hold that when a defendant is entitled to get a decree set aside under O. 9, R. 13, he is always, as a matter of course, entitled to set aside the decree by a separate suit if he is a minor. I do not find anything in the circumstances of this case to entitle the plaintiffs to any special consideration. For the above reasons, I set aside the decree of the District Judge and dismiss the suit with costs in both Courts.

Judgment.—The parties to this case occupy contiguous premises in the town of Saugor. Between their houses runs a lane which forms part of the plaintiff's property, and he sued to obtain an injunction restraining the defendant from passing dirty water from a latrine over his lane. In appeal the District Judge on 9th December 1914 gave the plaintiff a decree in the following terms:

"It is hereby ordered and decreed in favour of plaintiff that the defendant do build a cesspool for the reception of the dirty water flowing from his house and latrine on his own ground in order to prevent its outflow on to the plaintiff's kulla and be further restrained from causing the water to pass and flow over the kulla. The decree shall be subject to the reservation in favour of the defendant that should it be found that the cesspool cannot be made at any place in defendant's ground other than at a point between X and Y in order to prevent the outflow of filthy water of the defendant's house it may be built at this point."

From the wording it would naturally be inferred that the spot between X and Y, which letters are to be found in a plan annexed to the plaint, is itself within the defendant's premises, but the parties are agreed that this is not the case, the spot being in fact on the plaintiff's side of the boundary. On 7th September 1915 in the course of proceedings taken upon the plaintiff's application for execution of the decree, it was agreed that the decree-holder should construct the cesspool at the judgment-debtor's cost and a receptacle was accordingly made on the judgment-debtor's premises. On 10th January 1916 the judgment-debtor complained that in executing the work the decree-holder had improperly interfered with an existing latrine and that the directions in the decree had not been complied with. This complaint was dismissed by the executing Court, but in appeal a further inquiry was ordered by the District Judge. Further pleadings were then recorded and the following issues were framed on 2nd February 1917:

"1. Whether there were latrine seats in the lane in which the cesspool is made and whether the judgment-debtor was using them? 2. Whether the decree-holder in constructing the cesspool removed those seats and they cannot now be conveniently placed there and used as before? 3. Whether the cesspool in question produces bad smell and causes nuisance to the members of judgment-debtor's house?"

"4. What is the length of this cesspool? 5. Was there an old cesspool as shown in judgment-debtor's map between X and Y and whether it will be convenient to make a cesspool there instead of at its present site?"

On 12th March the parties moved the Court for an order of reference to arbitration, naming two arbitrators and praying the Court to nominate a third. The Court appointed a third arbitrator and selected him as umpire. In its order of reference the Court directed a copy of the issue to be supplied to the arbitrators and stated the question for decision as follows:

"Whether the cesspool as at present made is convenient to the parties, or whether it would be convenient to make a cesspool between X Y as shown in the applicant's map."

The arbitrators named by the parties having differed in opinion, the umpire decided on 19th April 1917 that the new cesspool caused serious inconvenience to the judgment-debtor and that X Y is the most convenient site for the required structure. The decree-holder objected to the umpire's decision on several grounds, with which we are not now concerned as they are admitted to be without substance. On 29th June the Munsif overruled all the objections and directed the decree-holder to construct a new cesspool at X Y. The decree-holder then appealed to the District Court, which held the award to be invalid and directed the executing Court to continue its proceedings according to law. The learned Additional District Judge overruled an objection that no appeal lay from the lower Court's order based upon the award, and citing Kewal Lodhi v. Baijnath (1) decided that the order of reference was invalid by reason of the omission to raise the question whether the cesspool could not be built at some place on the judgment-debtor's land and that the award based on such a reference is invalid. The judgment-debtor has now moved this Court contending that no appeal lay, inasmuch as the decision of the executing Court is not in excess of or otherwise than in accordance with the award and I am clearly of opinion that this contention must succeed. In the decision of this Court relied upon below no reference is made to the decision of the Privy Council in Ghulam Khan v. Muhammad Hassan (2), where it was laid down (at p. 183) that to hold that an appeal lies from a decree pronounced under S. 522, Civil P. C., 1882, except in so far as the decree may be in excess of or not in accordance with the award, would be doing violence to the plain language and the obvious intention of the Code. In Chairman of the Purnea Municipality v. Siva Sankar Ram (3) decided in the same month as Kewal Lodhi v. Baij Nath (1), the effect of the decision of the Privy Council was considered by Maclean, C. J., and Mookerjee, J., and the view was accepted that a decree made in accordance with an award cannot be challenged by way of appeal on the ground that there is no valid or legal award. That view was approved by a Divisional Bench of the Madras High Court in Kanaka Nagalinga v. Nagalinga (4), where also the effect of S. 522, in the 1882, Civil P. C., fell to be considered. That this view has been accepted by the legislature seems to me placed beyond the reach of doubt by the insertion of the words "or being otherwise invalid" in sub-para. (1)(c), para. 15 Sch. 2, Civil P. C., 1908. Authority in support of this opinion will be found in the Full Bench decision of the Allahabad High Court in Lutawan v. Lathiya (5), in Batcha Sahib v. Abdul Ganng (6) and in Khundiram Mahto v. Chandi Charan Mahto (7).

I would also observe that on the ground upon which the Additional District Judge held the order of reference, and therefore the award to be invalid was not put before the executing Court at all and that it might not unfairly be inferred from this omission that the parties assumed, as the executing Court evidently did, that if the present site is really unsuitable X Y would necessarily be selected. In this connection it is important to notice that on 12th March 1917 when the order of reference was passed, each of the parties was represented by a pleader who signed the order sheet. The respondent has endeavoured to support the Additional District Judge's order by citing Bindesuri Pershad Singh v. Jankoo Pershad Singh (8) and pointing out that the application for an order of reference does not state the matter in difference between the parties, though particulars in this respect are made essential by para. 1 (2), Sch. 2, Civil P. C., and the connected form in the appendix thereto. In the case relied upon, the agreement of submission to arbitration was indeed held to be vague and indefinite, but it further failed to clearly lay down the power of the arbitrator in dealing with the subject matter in dispute—a defect which cannot be said to exist here. Moreover the learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court interpreted under S. 522 of the 1882 Code while in the Privy Council case above cited a revision was deprecated as even more objectionable than an appeal. Interference by way of revision was refused in Batcha Sahib v. Abdul Ganng (6) above cited on the strength of the plain general policy of the legislature that in a matter of arbitration the judgment in accordance with an award should be final. I am quite unable to think that in the present case a discretion in favour of the decree-holder should be exercised if indeed the law permits of any discretion being exercised in the matter.

Holding that the order of the executing Court, pronounced under para. 16 (1), is final under para. 16 (2), Sch. 2, Civil P. C., I allow this appeal and setting aside the order of the Additional District Judge restore that passed by the executing Court on 29th June 1917. All costs hitherto incurred will be paid by the decree holder.

Judgment.—The suit out of which this appeal arises was one to enforce a mortgage executed by the three defendants, who are now appellants, on 25th February 1898. The properties mortgaged were at the date of the mortgage under the management of the Collector in execution proceedings taken by one Magniram Tansukrai to realise a decree obtained by him against the appellants. The Additional District Judge, without going into the merits of the case, dismissed the suit on the preliminary ground that the mortgage was taken without the written permission of the Collector and was void under S. 325-A, Civil P. C. 1882. On appeal by the plaintiff it was held by a Bench of this Court that the transfer was not void, and although for want of the Collector's concurrence it was at its inception inoperative, just as in the case of a conveyance by a person with a defective title, it did not necessarily follow that it was open to the transferors to repudiate it when the management of the Collector was over and they were in a position to make good their contract. The question for determination was, in the opinion of the Bench, not so much whether the transfer was void or voidable, but whether, though inoperative, it might not give rise to an equity. The case was on 23rd January 1914 remanded to the 1st Court for a trial on the merits. That Court after trying the case on the merits has on 31st October 1916, decreed the plaintiffs' claim and the present appeal is from that decree. Although a number of grounds were taken in the memorandum of appeal attacking the findings of the first Court on the merits, they have not been pressed before us, and the learned counsel for the appellants has frankly admitted that he has no case on the merits. He, however, relies on a decision of a Full Bench of this Court published as Salu Bai v. Bajat Khan (1), wherein the view taken in the remand order of the Bench in the present case has been overruled, and asks us to reconsider that order and to uphold the original decree of the first Court dismissing the suit.

The respondent has urged that S. 105, (2), Civil P. C. 1908, debars the appellants from disputing the order, as it could have been appealed from to His Majesty in Council as a final order under S. 109, (a), and no appeal was preferred. In Miscellaneous Petition No. 16 of 1914, for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council from First Appeal No. 19 of 1912, a Bench of this Court, following Ahmad Husain v. Gobind Krishna Narain (2), and Venkataranga Row v. Narasimha Rao (3), has held that, under S. 109, Civil P. C., an appeal does not lie to His Majesty in Council against an order of remand under O. 41, R. 23, as it is not a final order within the meaning of S. 109 (a), and also that S. 109 (c), is not applicable. We are not prepared to differ from that decision and hold that S. 105, (2), does not debar the appellants from disputing the order of remand. In asking us to reconsider the order of remand two arguments are advanced; first, that the case having come up again in appeal the whole of it is opened up for our consideration; second, that we are bound to exercise our inherent power under S. 151, Civil P. C. and for the ends of justice reverse the order of remand. With reference to the first argument reliance is placed by the appellant's learned counsel upon the following rulings; Ganendra Nath Roy v. Surja Kanta Roy (4), Thakur Sheo Narain Singh v. Thakur Bishunath Singh (5), Hira Lal Pal v. Etbar Mandal (6), and Debi

Baksh Singh v. Habib Shah (7). The Allahabad case cited last is a case where their Lordships of the Privy Council held that the course adopted in the Court of the Judicial Commissioner in applying rules or orders dealing with the case of the non-appearance of a suitor to the situation which arises when the suitor is dead amounted to abuse of the process of the Court, and it is such abuse that the Court had inherent power to prevent under S. 151, Civil P. C. and that apart from the Code any Court has an inherent power to rectify a mistake inadvertently made. This decision deals only with the question of a mistake inadvertently made in applying rules of procedure which result in abuse of the process of the Court. That is not the case here. The Calcutta Weekly Notes cases are all cases where the Appellate Court had remanded under O. 41, R. 25, and it was held that it was open to the appellate Court, after the receipt of findings after remand, to reconsider any point which it had already considered and expressed an opinion on in its order of remand. The ratio decidendi of these rulings is that in a remand under O. 41, R. 25, the case remains pending or undisposed of on the appellate Court's file, and the Judge may yield to conviction and change his mind at any time before he has pronounced a final judgment. In Ganendra Nath Roy v. Surja Kanta Roy (1), however, at p. 466, (of 17 C. W. N.) the Judges appear to be of the opinion that even in such a case they would be slow to go back upon any final opinion expressed by another Judge in an earlier stage of the case. No case has been cited before us where a remand order under O. 41, R. 23, has been reconsidered in a subsequent appeal from the decision of the first Court after remand. In the present instance the remand order was under O. 41, R. 23, and the appeal cannot be said to have been pending or undisposed of on this Court's file. In our opinion, the whole case is not opened up on the present appeal from the decree after remand, and it is not open to us, therefore, to reconsider the remand order. We, moreover, consider that the opinion expressed by the former Bench was final and we refuse to go back upon it.

The second argument is to this effect. As the view of the law taken by the former Bench is now found to have been erroneous by the Full Bench, whose decision is binding on us, the remand order must be deemed to have resulted in a grave miscarriage of justice. In such circumstances, it is argued, it is our duty to exercise our inherent power under S. 151, Civil P. C., and reverse the remand order for the ends of justice. We are bound by and accept the view of the law laid down by the Full Bench, but we do not think that our interference in this case is necessary for the ends of justice. The appellants had filed an application for review on a 2 rupee court-fee stamp. This has been dismissed on the grounds of delay and non-payment of the proper court-fee, namely, Rs. 500. Where the Code has specifically provided for a review, and the appellants have failed to avail themselves of it by a proper application, we do not think they have a right to appeal to, or the Court would be justified in exercising its inherent power to help him to get over the consequences of his default. On the merits the appellants have no case. They have received the benefit of a large sum of money advanced by the plaintiff at a time of stress, and we do not think that justice or equity requires that we should come to their aid under such circumstances. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Second Appeal No. 201 of 1917, Decided on 21st June 1918, from decree of Dist. Judge, Bhandara, D/- 6th January 1918, in Appeal No. 118 of 1916.

C. P. Tenancy Act (1899), S. 60—Sub-lease by occupancy tenant—Notice to eject given to sub-tenant—Sub-tenant, after notice, is trespasser and can be ejected through civil Court.

Under S. 60 a sub-lease of occupancy land cannot be made from year to year, it can only be made for a term of one year. If before the end of the year no notice is given, there may be a presumption that the parties intend to make a fresh lease for the ensuing year, but where a notice is given by the occupancy tenant to his sub-tenant that he does not intend to renew the sub-lease, the sub-lease comes to an end with the end of the agricultural year, and the sub-tenant is thereafter in the position of a trespasser and can be ejected through a civil Court. [P 196 C 1]

S. C. Dutta Chowdhury and K. K. Gandhi—for Appellants.

G. L. Subhedar—for Respondent.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by an occupancy tenant to eject a sub-tenant who refused to vacate the field after the end of the agricultural year, although a notice was given to him before the end of the agricultural year that the sub-lease would not be renewed. In appeal it is urged for the defendants that the Munsif had no jurisdiction to try this suit because the suit was one between landlord and tenant, and that the notice of ejectment was not valid because it was not given sufficiently early. Under S. 60, Tenancy Act a sub-lease of occupancy land cannot be made from year to year, it could be only made for a term of one year. No doubt if before the end of the year no notice is given, there may be a presumption that the parties intend to make a fresh lease for the ensuing year, but in this case notice was given by the occupancy tenant to his sub-tenant that he did not intend to renew the lease. The lease, therefore, came to an end under S. 60 with the end of the agricultural year and after that date the defendants in the circumstances were trespassers. The Munsif had jurisdiction to try this suit and the notice was given in sufficient time. I may add that it would have been a sufficient notice even if the land had been an absolute occupancy tenancy, since it was given over 5 months before the end of the agricultural year. For these reasons the appeal is dismissed.

Second Appeal No. 508 of 1917, Decided on 6th April 1918, from decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Saugor, in Civil Appeal No. 45 of 1917, D/- 24th August 1917.

(a) C. P. Land Revenue Act, (1881), S. 69 — S. 69 does not apply to disputes as to proprietorship of land.

Section 69 relates to disputes as to whether or not land admittedly belonging to one particular proprietor is sir land or not. It has no application whatever to disputes as to whether A or B is the proprietor of a plot of land. [P 196 C 2]

(b) C. P. Land Revenue Act (1881), S. 69 (4) — Limitation—Rule of, in S. 69 (4) does not apply to correction of entries in settlement records.

The special rule of limitation laid down in S. 69 (4) has no application whatever to a suit brought for the correction of a settlement entry in which the defendant has been recorded as a proprietor instead of as an occupancy tenant of sir land. [P 196 C 2]

G. L. Subhedar—for Appellant.

Judgment.—The lower Courts in this case have dismissed the suit solely on the ground of limitation, holding that the special period of one year laid down in sub-S. (4), S. 69, Central Provinces Land Revenue Act is applicable to the case.

Section 69 relates to disputes as to whether or not land admittedly belonging to one particular proprietor is sir land or not sir land. Section 69 has no application whatever to disputes as to whether A or B is the proprietor of land. In this case the plaintiff's claim is that they are the proprietors of the land and that the defendant is only their occupancy tenant. They complain that at the settlement defendant 1 was recorded as proprietor instead of as occupancy tenant. The mistake alleged to have occurred is that whereas defendant 1 was formerly the proprietor of the land as his sir and he has now ceased to be proprietor and has now become occupancy tenant, he is still wrongly recorded as proprietor of sir land instead of as occupancy tenant of the land which was formerly sir. If the plaintiffs fail in their case, they can have no possible objection to defendant 1 being recorded as sir proprietor instead of ordinary proprietor. The question whether the land should be recorded as sir or not, does not arise in this case. The sole question is whether or not plaintiff is the proprietor and defendant 1 the tenant. The special rule of limitation laid down in S. 69 (4), Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, has therefore no application whatever to the case. The case has been decided on wrong grounds and is remanded to the lower appellate Court for further trial with reference to the above remarks. It is to be observed that the plaintiffs complain that the settlement entry is incorrect but they have filed no copy of the settlement entry to which they object. Before the suit can be properly decided, the plaintiffs must be called upon to file a copy of the entry to which they object and which they say is wrong.

A refund certificate will issue. Other costs will be costs in the suit.

Criminal Revn. No. 7-B of 1918, Decided on 26th January 1918, against an order of Sub-Divl. Magistrate, Darwah, in Misc. Criminal Case No. 20 of 1917, D./ 31st October 1917.

(a) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 145 (1)—Condition precedent is likelihood of breach of peace.

The condition precedent authorising a Magistrate to issue an order under S. 145 (1) is that he should be satisfied that a dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace exists. [P 197 C 1]

(b) Criminal P. C. (1898), S. 145 (1)—Complainant out of possession for over two months—Proceedings under S. 145 are not vitiated.

The fact that the complaint shows that complainant was not out of possession of the property in dispute for over two months does not vitiate the proceedings under S. 145. [P 197 C 1]

C. B. Parakh—for Applicant.

Order.—It is urged that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to start the proceedings, when the complaint made to him on the face of it showed that the complainant was out of possession for over two months and in consequence he could not get an order in his favour. This contention is based upon a misapprehension of the conditions, the existence of which authorises a Magistrate to issue an order under S. 145 (1), Criminal P. C.

The Magistrate can issue the order if he is satisfied that a dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace exists. He was so satisfied in this case from the police report, dated 6th April 1917. He could therefore make the order and therefore decide the question of possession in favour of either party to the proceeding. It is next urged that there is no finding that there is a danger of a breach of the peace, but such finding is involved in the order under S. 145 (1) and the applicant's plea admits that no plea was raised under S. 145 (5). The proceedings do not appear to be open to objection on the score of want of jurisdiction. This application is dismissed.

Provincial Insolvency Act (3 of 1907), S. 28—"Debt provable under Act" does not cover obligation incurred after adjudication—Suit is maintainable to recover same.

An obligation incurred by an insolvent after the date of his adjudication is not debt provable in the insolvency proceedings within the meaning of S. 28, Provincial Insolvency Act and a suit in respect of such obligation is not governed by S. 16 (2) of the Act. [P 197 C 2]

G. B. Salghedar and N. R. Alekar—for Appellant.

Atmaram Bhagwan and S. C. Dutt Chowdhury—for Respondent.

Judgment.—There can, in my opinion, be no question but that the lower appellate Court has erred in excluding Rs. 60 relief on account of rent given by the first Court. The learned District Judge failed to notice that this item of rent was not an item which fell under the category of debts provable under this Act alluded to in S. 16 (2), Provincial Insolvency Act. What are debts provable under the Act is laid down in S. 28 idem. Now the order of the District Judge declaring the defendant an insolvent, was passed on 27th September 1913, Ex. A-1, while the rent note shows that the obligation of debt was incurred on 15th November 1913. This obligation, therefore was not an obligation incurred before the date of the adjudication, vide S. 28 of the Act, and it follows, therefore that the claim in question is not a debt provable under this Act. S. 16 (2), therefore did not exclude the lower appellate Court from allowing the decree for rent to stand. The result is that the appeal succeeds and the lower appellate Court's decree will be modified to the extent of restoring the decree of the original Court as regards the payment of Rs. 60 on account of rent. The respondent must bear the appellant's costs in this appeal as well as his own.

C. P. Courts of Wards Act (1899). S. 16(2)(b) —Contract by guardian, not for benefit of minor, cannot be specifically enforced.

The words "for the preservation and benefit of such property" in S. 16(2)(b) should be interpreted in the light of the usual powers of guardians to bind the estates of minors. No decree for specific performance of an agreement for transfer made by his guardian should be passed against a minor unless the Court is quite certain that the agreement was for the benefit of the minor and that it would be for his benefit that it should be enforced.

Judgment.—In this case while the plaintiff was a minor, the Court of Wards let out the land in suit for a term of ten years in renewal of a previous lease for 20 years. The lease has now expired and the defendants claim to remain in possession on the ground that they had the right specifically to enforce a contract for an unspecified term of years. The main ground of appeal on which the District Judge has dismissed the defendant's appeal is that even if the contract for a renewal of the lease were sufficiently precise to be capable of specific enforcement if the contract had been made between adults, yet the contract is one which cannot be specifically enforced against the minor as it is not for the preservation or benefit of such property that a fresh lease be entered into. The words "for the preservation or benefit of such property" are taken from S. 16(2)(b), Courts of Wards Act, applicable to these Provinces. In interpreting these words regard should be had to the usual powers of guardians to bind the estates of minors. There are a large number of decisions collected together by Trevelyan at p. 167 of his "Law Relating to Minors," Edn. 5. The effect of these rulings is that the Court will not decree against a minor for specific performance of an agreement for transfer made by his guardian unless it be quite certain that the agreement was for the benefit of the minor and that it would be for his benefit that it should be enforced. It is impossible to hold that it would be for the benefit of the minor that this contract for specific performance should be decreed against him, and it is equally difficult to imagine that there was any necessity for inserting such conditions in the renewal of the lease for ten years.

It is perfectly feasible to get a tenant for 30 years without making any promise to give a fresh lease at the termination of that period. To enforce the contract, if it be a contract for specific performance against the minor would be to act directly contrary to his interests. It is not necessary to refer to the grounds of appeal which deal with other points. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Criminal Appeal No. 4 of 1918, Decided on 25th January 1918, against the decision of Sess. Judge, Jubbulpore, D/- 23rd November 1917, in S. T. No. 26 of 1917.

Criminal Trial—Confession—Court can disregard any statement in confession which it disbelieves.

Although a confession must be taken as a whole and considered along with the admitted facts of the case, the accused being judged by his whole conduct, the Court is at liberty to disregard any statement contained in the confession which it disbelieves; Case-law discussed [P 200 C1]

G. P. Dick—for the Crown.

Judgment.—The appellant Kamoda Gond aged 25 years and his fellow-villager and co-accused Samni Gond aged 19 or 20 have been convicted and sentenced to transportation for life for the murder of Jonhu Baiga. The assessors considered that the conviction should have been for causing hurt only. Samni as well as Kamoda has appealed and both appeals are disposed of by this Judgment.

Jonhu Baiga was 25 years old and according to the Sub-Assistant Surgeon, who conducted the post mortem examination on 24th July last, was stronger than either of the appellants. His dead body was found tied to a bamboo with his own dhoti early on the morning of Monday the 23rd July. He had been missed on the previous evening and the fact was reported at the Mahadwani station house, three miles away, at mid night. Early next morning before the Police arrived, both the appellants confessed to the mukadam Bhuru (P. W. No. 3) and showed not only the dead body but also the spot in the field of one Nihali where Jonhu was killed: the distance between the two places is about 435 yards. Bhuru was not cross-examined by either appellant and when examined by the Sessions Judge they both admitted that Bhuru had told the truth. Even at this early stage Kamoda asserted that Samni's father Ganga had taken part in the murder while Samni denied this. On the arrival of the Police Ganga as well as the appellants was arrested, and on the afternoon of the 28th July each of the appellants made a detailed confession to the 1st Class Magistrate who subsequently committed them for trial. The confessions were repeated on 22nd August when the Committing Magistrate examined the accused; these later statements include a new detail, namely, that Jonhu was dragged from Nihali's field to the Norbudda. In neither statement did Kamoda implicate Ganga and that person was discharged by the Committing Magistrate. At the commencement of the trial both the appellants pleaded not guilty, but after the Public Prosecutor had opened the case they withdrew these pleas and substituted the following:

Kamoda.—"Ganga and Samni came for me in my field and got me to join them and we three killed Jonhu with our fists, and we three carried his body to the Norbudda and threw it away there."

Samni.—"Only I and Kamoda were concerned in the murder of Jonhu. We killed him with our fists, and the two of us carried the body to the Norbudda. My father was not concerned in it."

When examined by the Sessions Judge Kamoda repeated his allegation that Ganga took part in the murder. Both he and Samni denied that they tied Jonhu's corpse to the bamboo which was found with it. Kamoda repeated his explanation of the murder, but Samni made no further statement on the point. When required to enter upon their defence, each said that he killed Jonhu but did not mean to kill him. The medical evidence shows that death was due to dislocation of several cervical vertebrae and indicates that the neck had been violently twisted. The assessors accepted the confessions in full and considered that the appellants must have beaten Jonhu with their fists on being attacked by him with his parana (ox goad); the injuries to the neck they attributed to dragging from the scene of murder to the river. The learned Sessions Judge declined to believe that Jonhu assaulted the appellants with his goad, as alleged in their confessions and considered that the injuries to the neck indicated conspiracy and deliberation.

In appeal Kamoda declares that he has been falsely accused and has no reason to kill Jonhu, but attempts no explanation of his confessions. Samni's ground of appeal are not clear, but he apparently intends to admit that there was a quarrel between Kamoda and Jonhu in which he (Samni) was present without taking any part. That the appellants took Jonhu's life cannot, in my opinion, be doubted. They have confessed on 5 distinct occasions, namely, on 23rd July, the 28th July, the 22nd August and twice on 22nd November. The only question for determination seems to be whether the Sessions Judge was justified in refusing to believe the confessions in their entirety. The ordinary rule is that a prisoner's confession must be so taken: Queen v. Sheikh Doodhoo (1) and Queen v. Nityo Gopal Dass Byrango (2). It was, however, held in Rex v. Higgins (3) that one part of a confession may be credited and not another. In Rex v. Clow (4) Littledale, J., charged the Jury in a case of murder that if the prosecution wished to make out that the prisoner did more than was stated in his confession there should be some evidence of that, and also held in the course of the trial that though a confession made by the prisoner must be taken altogether, and it is evidence for the prisoner as well as against him, still the Jury were at liberty to believe one part of it and disbelieve another. In Rex v. Jones (5) the law was thus laid down:

"There is no doubt that if a prosecutor uses the declaration of a prisoner, he must take the whole of it together, and cannot select one part and leave another, addit there be either no other evidence in the case, or no other evidence incompatible with it, the declaration so adduced in evidence must be taken as true. But if, after the whole of the statement of the prisoner is given in evidence, the prosecutor is in a situation to contradict any part of it, he is at liberty to do so; and then the statement of the prisoner, and the whole of the other evidence, must be left to the Jury, for their consideration, precisely as in any other case, where one part of the evidence is contradictory to another."

Similarly it was laid down by Chady, J., in Queen-Empress v. Dada Ana (6) that though a confession must be taken as a whole and considered along with the admitted facts of the case, the accused being judged by his whole conduct, the Court is at liberty to disregard any self-exculpatory statements contained in the confession which it disbelieves. The learned Judge cited Reg v. Amrita Govinda (7) where, however, there was evidence besides the statement of the accused. The story told in the confession is that while the appellants were smoking with Jonhu in Nihali's field, he threatened to make their wives his mistresses and enraged by their remonstrances attacked them with his parana, whereupon they seized and beat him with their fists. The Sessions Judge considered this story inherently improvable. His view is thus expressed:

"I cannot believe that a single man would deliberately taunt two Gonds in a lonely field about their wives, and wantonly attack them. The conduct is overheating beyond belief, and is also extremely rash. Further, no goad stick was found on the spot, but an axe was. I hardly think that the police would suppress a goad-stick and produce an axe, if there was any chance whatsoever of a plea of self-defence being put up. Lastly, the accused have implicated themselves clearly enough, but their confessions are not entirely disincenuous. There are still at loggerheads about Ganga's share in it, and I am inclined to think that Ganga was one of the murderers. Yet in their confessions both accused omit the name of Ganga. They have told a great deal of truth, but not the whole truth by any means."

It is true that an axe was found 24 yards away from where Jonhu was killed and that the mukaddam Bhuru has identified it as Jonhu's. But it does not appear that either of the appellants had any weapon whatever and if Jonhu was armed with an axe, he may have considered himself safe. It is not open to us at this stage to treat Ganga as having been with the appellants. The fact that no goad is proved to have been found on the spot may be explained by an omission to look for one. According to the appellants Jonhu had been ploughing and it is quite likely that he had a parana with him as well as an axe. It seems to me not improbable that Jonhu calculated on impunity and was overwhelmed by a sudden assault, which deprived him of an opportunity to use his weapon or weapons. The axe may have been seized and flung to a distance, while the parana owing to its length would be too clumsy to use at close quarters. In the circumstances I think the Sessions Judge was wrong in refusing to accept the appellants' story. He has relied to some extent upon the statement of the appellant Kamoda's wife Bhagi (P. W. 1), who is Bhuru's daughter, that Kamoda told her on the night of the 22nd July that he had killed Jonhu on suspicion of having improper relations with her. This communication should not have been admitted in evidence without obtaining the previous consent of Kamoda: see S. 123, Evidence Act. The point is not of much importance, inasmuch as at the close of Bhagi's deposition both the appellants declared that she had spoken the truth, but the express provision of law should not have been contravened. Nor is the communication inconsistent with the appellants' story. The Judge regarded the appellants as having "boasted" to Bhagi and Aklo (P. W. 2) respectively that they had killed Jonhu, but their depositions are not indicative of any boasting. He also drew an adverse inference from the fact that the appellants made no attempt to conceal the murder when the villagers turned up to search for Jonhu early on the 23rd July, but surely they would be more likely to confess to the killing if they had some excuse than if they had committed a coldblooded and premeditated murder.

In my opinion the appellants are entitled to the benefit of sub-S. (1). S. 300, I. P. C. They used no weapon upon the deceased and unless there is some truth in their statements about his behaviour to Bhagi and Aklo we are without any motive for the killing. That they intended to cause death must be inferred from the fatal injuries actually caused and I agree with the Sessions Judge that if mere castigation was intended, the course of twisting the neck would not have been adopted. I set aside the finding that the appellants are guilty of murder and convict them instead under the part, S. 304, I. P. C. The sentences of transportation for life are set aside and in lieu thereof I direct that Harprasad—Plaintiff—Respondent.

Second Appeal No. 510 of 1916, Decided on 13th March 1918, from decree of Dist. Judge, Raipur, D/- 12th July 1916, in appeal No. 155 of 1913.

C. P. Tenancy Act (1898), S. 94—Disposition by non-lambardar mortgagee—S. 94 does not apply.

One K who was the owner of a 13-annas 4-pies share in a village mortgaged the share on 18th February 1895 with the defendant who obtained a sale decree and put the mortgaged property to sale and having himself purchased it obtained possession thereof in 1909. The plaintiff who was the owner of the remaining share, had already sold it to B on 7th May 1907. The plaintiff filed the present suit on 4th May 1912 to recover possession of the land on the ground that by the transfer of his 2-annas 8-pies share he became an occupancy tenant of the village sir and ordinary tenant of the khudkasht. It was contended for the defendant that the right of the plaintiff as an occupancy tenant, if any, had become extinguished under Ss. 35 (1) and 94.

Held: that as the defendant took possession in 1909 qua mortgagee and not qua lambardar, S. 94 which has reference only to relations between landlords and tenants did not apply to the case. [P 202 U 1]

H. S. Gour—for Appellant.

K. K. Gandhi—for Respondent.

FACTS. will appear from the following extract from the judgment of the lower appellate Court. The dispute related to 127 odd acres of sir land of Mouza Khamaria. The village was owned by Nagbadia and he transferred a 13-annas 4-pies proprietary share in favour of his brothers Sobhit and others, who sold the share acquired by them to Kesholal, father of the plaintiff on 8th May 1894. Nagbadia on 16th July 1894 mortgaged the entire 16-annas share to Balmukund who assigned the mortgage to Kesholal and who obtained a foreclosure decree on 28th February 1899 and in pursuance of the decree Kesholal obtained possession of the village and home farm. Kesholal mortgaged the 13-annas 4 pies share with the appellants on 18th February 1895, who obtained a sale decree and put the mortgaged property to sale and having purchased the share obtained possession on 24th May 1909. The plaintiff who was the owner of the remaining 2-annas 8-pies share of the village, sold the share to Bansilal. Plaintiff says that by the transfer of the 2-annas 8-pies share of the village, he became an occupancy tenant of the village sir and as the defendants took possession of the entire home farm in 1910 he has sued to recover possession of 127.95 acres of sir land of which he became an occupancy tenant and of 4.90 acres of khudkasht of which he became an ordinary tenant. In fact the plaintiff claimed possession of the entire sir and khudkasht lands of the entire village alleging that the home farm belonged to the 2 annas 8 pies share which was foreclosed by the father of the plaintiff and that the said lands did not appertain to the 13-annas 4-pies share of the village mortgaged to the defendant and purchased by them and that the said lands were not mortgaged to the defendants. The first Court decreed the claim of the plaintiff in respect of the entire sir lands and so the defendants appealed to this Court. My predecessor reversed the decree of the Court and dismissed the suit of the plaintiff. The plaintiff appealed to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner. The appellant practically gave up his right to claim anything more than 2-annas 8-pies share in the sir lands, so his appeal was limited to the share mentioned above. The decree of this Court was reversed and the appeal was remanded for re-trial to this Court.

Judgment.—The facts leading to this second appeal by the defendants Bhikamchand and Gekulchand are sufficiently clear from the judgment of the District Judge, Raipur, appealed against as well as from the earlier judgments in the case and it is unnecessary to recapitulate them here. I proceed at once therefore to a consideration of the matter raised in the second appeal. The first contention urged on behalf of the appellants is that the plaintiff-respondent had no right of suit inasmuch as he had already sold his 2-annas 8-pies share of Mouza Khamaria to Bansilal on 7th May 1907 and that the suit having been filed on 4th May 1912, his right as an occupancy tenant, if any, had become extinguished under Ss. 35 (4) and 94, C.P. Tenancy Act. This matter of limitation is dealt with in para. 12 of the lower appellate Court's judgment and in para. 6 of that of the Sub-Judge. It is in particular urged in second appeal that the lower appellate Court has failed to notice that the defendant appellant 1 was a lambardar and could therefore eject a tenant and thus the shorter period of limitation set up by S. 94, would come into operation. This latter provision has obviously reference only to relations between landlord and tenant and it is sufficiently established that when the appellants took possession in 1909 they took possession qua mortgagees and not qua lambardar. Indeed until the appellants got possession, neither of them could in the nature of things be lambardar. Still further, their action in taking possession as mortgagees was in a sense an action adverse to that of the other cosharers and it took place not for the benefit of the proprietary body as a whole but as the result of a mortgage in which the other cosharers had no interest. There seems to be, therefore, no good ground on which the limitation prescribed by S. 94, Tenancy Act applies to this case.

An attempt has, however, been made to urge on behalf of the appellants that even if the ordinary rule of 12 years' adverse possession were applicable to this case, the present suit was time barred. I cannot find, however, that this pleading was ever specifically put forward in the lower Courts and if it had been I do not think there was any chance of its success. The sale to Bansilal by plaintiff-respondent in 1907 excluded cultivating rights in sir and he remained in possession of at least a 2 annas 8 pies share of the sir land until he was dispossessed in 1909. The statement of Mr. Barat, Pleader, recorded on behalf of the plaintiff-respondent at an early stage of the case on 26th September 1912 must, I think, be read in the light of the judgment of Batten, A. J. C. dated 15th April 1915 who pointed out the confusion that had been introduced into the case by the extravagant claim originally put forward by parties to this litigation to the effect that the whole sir land of the village fell into their respective share. In the peculiar circumstances of this case it is impossible to hold that plaintiff was not in juridical possession until 1909 and the presumption necessarily is that he was. I can see no reason, therefore, for holding that the present suit was barred by the ordinary rule of 12 years' adverse possession. The point of limitation was the only one that has been seriously pressed in this Court. As regards ground 5 of the petition of appeal I need only say that the District Judge's finding that a 13-annas 4-pies share of the sir in the village was mortgaged is one for the disturbance of which no good grounds have been shown in this Court. These findings govern the appeal which is dismissed with costs on the appellants.

Second Appeal No. 308-B of 1917, Decided on 24th June 1918, against decree of 2nd Addl. Dist. Judge, Akola, in Civil Appeal No. 10 of 1917, D/- 14th May 1917.

Evidence Act (1872), S. 114—Notice, registered, sent through post—Refusal must be proved by examining post-peon as witness.

Where a defendant denies the receipt of notice alleged to have been sent to him through registered post, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to call the post-peon to prove that the registered post-card was tendered to and was refused by the defendant. [P 202 C 2]

M. V. Joshi—for Appellant.

G. V. Kukde—for Respondent.

Judgment.—This second appeal and Second Appeal No. 310-B of 1917 have been disposed by the lower appellate Court in one judgment, and this judgment will therefore govern the disposal of both the second appeals. The plaintiff sues for ejectment of the defendants on the allegation that their tenancy has been determined by a notice to quit under S. 79, Berar Land Revenue Code. The suit has been dismissed on the ground that service of the notice has not been sufficiently proved. The defendants denied having refused the notice sent by the plaintiff by registered post. There is an endorsement of refusal on the back of the registered post-card. The dak-peon has not been called as a witness. The address of the addressee given on the post-card is vague. The lower Court has held that as the defendants deny the notice it was incumbent upon the plaintiffs to call the post-peon to prove that the registered post-card was tendered and refused by the defendants. This view is supported by the judgment in Gobinda Chandra Saha v.

Dwarka Nath Patita (1). On this finding the suit has been rightly dismissed and I can see no error of law in this finding. The lower appellate Court has also held that the plaintiff has failed to prove his title by proper evidence. It is however unnecessary to examine the correctness of this finding. The decree of the lower appellate Court is confirmed and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Second Appeal No. 118 of 1918, Decided on 30th September 1918 against decree of A.H. Dist. Judge, Seoni, in Civil Appeal No. 60 of 1917, D/- 18th December 1917.

Limitation Act (9 of 1908), S. 19 (1)—Endorsement of payment implying liability for balance amounts to acknowledgment.

An endorsement of payment on the back of an instalment bond in the handwriting of the debtor, impliedly acknowledging his liability for the balance of the debt due under the bond, amounts to an acknowledgment of liability for the purposes of S. 19 (1); 33 Cal 1917 (P.C.), P.H. 1914 C 11.

Erakshah—for Appellant.

G. L. Subhedar—for Respondents.

Judgment.—This second appeal arises out of a suit brought on 9th May on foot of a bond (Ex. P 1), dated 18th February 1908. By this document the defendants who are respondents in this Court, promised to pay Rs. 1,000 due to the plaintiff-appellant by 5 instalments of Rs. 200 each. The payments were to be made in the month of Baisakh of each of five consecutive vimbhat years beginning with 1907 so that they were due as follows:

1. Between 25th April and 24th May 1910. 2. Between 14th April and 13th May 1911. 3. Between 2nd April and 1st May 1912. 4. Between 21st April and 20th May 1913. 5. Between 11th April and 9th May 1914. The first instalment was paid in full on 16th May 1910. Two other payments were made, namely, Rs. 186-4-0 on 10th November 1912 and Rs. 57-5-0 on 30th October 1913. All these payments were evidenced by an endorsement written on the back of the bond by the defendant Ganesh

Ram and signed both by him and by his co-defendant Ranchand. The endorsement has been translated thus:

"Repayments made.

Rs. a. p.

200 0 0 Baisakh Sudi 8, 1907.

First instalment paid.

243 0 0 Second instalment, Baisakh Sudi 15, 1908.

Paid on account of the third instalment, P.C. 229-0.

Rs. 186-4-0 Katak Sudi 1, 1909.

Third instalment paid to the extent of Rs. 186-4-0.

Rs. 57-5-0 Gadh Sudi 1, 1910.

Fourth instalment paid to the extent of Rs. 57-5-0.

343 0 0

The bond contains a stipulation that if any instalment remained unpaid wholly or in part on due date, the balance should be paid along with the next instalment falling which the entire balance should become exigible in lump. Interest at 8 annas per cent. per mensem was made payable on each defaulted instalment from the date of default. It is common ground that the cause of action arose on 1st May 1912 and in the plaint reliance is placed upon the defendant's endorsement on the bond, which bears date 10th May 1914. The defendants pleaded limitation, and the trial Judge dismissed the suit after finding on a single preliminary issue that the endorsement did not give the plaintiff a fresh period of limitation from the time of its being signed. His view was that the writing did not of itself import any acknowledgment of existing liability and that S. 19 (1), Lim. Act, had therefore no application to the case. In appeal S. 19 was not relied upon for the plaintiff, but the lower appellate Court took the same view as the trial Judge of the terms of the endorsement. In this Court S. 19 (1), Lim. Act, is again relied upon for the plaintiff appellant and the following authorities are cited: Bheemangowda v. Eeranah (1), Janki Prasad v. Ghulam Ali (2) and Pamulapati Venkatakrishnaiah v. Kondamudi Subbrayudu (3). None of these cases was referred to by either of the lower Courts. In the first the terms of the endorsement are not given in the report. In the second the debt was a judgment-debt and the judgment-debtor, after making payments out of Court, endorsed the decree in his own handwriting in words which were translated as follows:

"I Chulam Ali judgment-debtor of this decree have myself paid Rs. —and have endorsed this payment on the decree in my own handwriting."

It was held that the description of himself as judgment-debtor necessarily implied the admission of liability under the decree. In the third case the endorsement ran thus:

"Rs. 378 13th July 1905. Rs. 378 only have been paid towards this document by Subbarayudu. Rs. 22. Again on the same day, Rs. 22 only has been paid."

Both the learned Judges who decided the case had no doubt that these endorsements embodied an acknowledgment of liability. Srinivasa Aiyangar, J., remarked as follows:

"The debtor states in terms that he pays Rs. 378 towards the amount due on the bond and on the same day, made another payment of Rs. 22 and made another endorsement. I construe the endorsement as meaning that the debtor made a part payment of the amount due on the bond (on that day over Rs. 1,500 was due as shown on the face of the bond), which is certainly an acknowledgment that more money was due."

The circumstances of the present case are very similar to those in the recent Madras case and I am clearly of opinion that the endorsement amounts to an acknowledgment of liability. In Vithal v. Gopal Rao (4) I pointed out that S. 19, Lim. Act, does not require the exact amount of liability to be stated in the acknowledgment. The defendants expressly admitted by writing that they paid Rs. 43-9-0 on account of the third instalment, thus indicating that the balance of that instalment was still unpaid. Moreover, when the third payment (Rs. 57-5-0) was made, the fourth instalment had already fallen due and the reference to the 1st, 2nd and 3rd instalments only raises the implication that nothing had been paid against the fourth instalment. Similarly by the time the endorsement was written the fifth instalment also had fallen due and the necessary implication from the omission to show any payment as made against it is that it remained wholly unpaid. This view seems to be supported by the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Maniram v. Seth Rupchand (5), where a mere admission that the defendant had open and current accounts with the plaintiff was held to amount to an acknowledgment of liability to pay any sum which on taking of an account might be found due.

On behalf of the defendants respondents I am referred to Khwaja Mahomad Janula v. Venkatarayar (6). In that case the defendant who pleaded limitation had entered the payment in the plaintiff's account book; the body of the entry included the defendant's signature but no signature was appended. It was held that writing the name in any part of the document would suffice for a signature, provided the writer intended by entering his name to indicate that the acknowledgment was his own. The judgment of Scotland, C. J., shows that to obtain the benefit of a new period of limitation the plaintiff must prove that the party sued has in writing authenticated by his signature, either in express terms or by reasonable construction acknowledged and admitted that the debt or part thereof is due from him. The payment made in that case satisfied the debt in part only and it was held that the entry aforesaid might serve as a sufficient acknowledgment in writing. Being of opinion that the endorsement on the bond amount to an acknowledgment of liability for the purposes of S. 19, Lim. Act, I set aside the decrees of the lower Courts and remand the case for disposal on the merits to the Court of first instance. The court-fee paid on the memorandum of second appeal will be refunded and other costs in this Court will be costs in the cause.

Misc. Appeal No. 1-B of 1917, Decided on 30th April 1917, against the Decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Amravati, D. 13th October 1916, in A. No. 106 of 1916.

(a) Berar Land Revenue Code, (1896), S. 205.—Occupant of recognized division of survey number cannot pre-empt another division of same number.

An occupant of a recognized division of a survey number, within the meaning of S. 4 (5), Berar Land Revenue Code, has not right of pre-emption with reference to another recognized division of the same survey number. 9 N. L. R. 16, P. 11.

(P 205 C 2)

(b) Berar Land Revenue Code, (1896), S. 4 (5)—Recognized division of Survey number—Meaning of, stated.

A sub-division of a survey number made by agreement of parties but which has not been recognized within the meaning of S. 4 (5), Berar Land Revenue Code, is not a "recognized division of a survey number." (P 206 C 2) (c) Berar Land Revenue Code, (1896), S. 87—Survey number—Meaning of.

The words "survey number" in S. 87, Berar Land Revenue Code, include recognized divisions of a survey number. (P 206 C 1)

(d) Berar Land Revenue Code, (1896), Ss. 4 (5) and 86, 87—Record of Rights—Officer in charge of, cannot recognize division and his recognition is no bar to pre-emption.

The Officer-in-charge of the Record of Rights is not an officer authorised, under S. 4 (5), Berar Land Revenue Code, to recognize the division of a survey number. Therefore a recognition of a sub-division by him is no bar to pre-emption. (P 205 C 2)

N. M. Badakar—for Appellant.

G. L. Subhedar—for Respondent.

Judgment.—The plaintiff is the owner of a demarcated plot in Survey Number 200, which at the recent Record of Rights has been numbered as 200/2. He seeks to pre-empt what has been similarly recorded as 200/1. This right of pre-emption is based on S. 205, Berar Land Revenue Code. The parties are agreed, as held by this Court in Mt. Gangav

Chandu (1), that the occupant of a recognized division of a survey number has no right of pre-emption with reference to another recognized division of the same survey number. The point for determination is whether the plots, as they have been called, constitute "recognized divisions of a survey number" within the meaning of the Code. If they are, then on the authority of the case cited, there is no right of pre-emption and the plaintiff's suit must fail. If they are not, then the lower Court has rightly remanded the case for trial on the merits. Now S. 4 (5) lays down that

"Recognized division of a survey number recognised at the last preceding survey, or subsequently recognised as such by the Deputy Commissioner or any other officer recognised on his behalf."

Admittedly there was no such recognition at the last survey nor has it been subsequently recognised by the Deputy Commissioner. The question is whether the officer-in-charge of the Record of Rights, Berar, is an officer "authorised in this behalf." Under S. 86 (1), when two or more holdings are included in a single survey number, the Deputy Commissioner or the officer deputed to conduct any revenue survey may recognize such holdings without forming separate numbers. Holdings so recognized shall be "recognized divisions of survey numbers." Sub-S. (2) declares the provisions of the Code relating to survey numbers applicable, so far as may be, to recognized divisions of survey numbers. The effect of sub-S. (2) S. 86 seems to be that the recognized division of a survey number stands, for all practical purposes, on the same footing as a distinct survey number. The revenue recognized or fixed on the recognized division of the survey number now becomes revenue separately assessed. The separately assessed portion under S. 4 (10) is to be regarded as held under a separate title and is, therefore, a separate holding. For non-payment of revenue, this separately assessed portion, that is, the recognized division of the survey number, being a separate holding, alone becomes liable to forfeiture without any liability to forfeiture of the rest survey number. S. 36 occurs in a chapter relating to survey Settlement, and its object seems to be to enable the Deputy Commissioner or the Settlement Officer to revise the assessment, if necessary, at the revision of a Survey Settlement. Although the definition of a recognized division of a survey number contemplates the Deputy Commissioner recognizing such a division subsequently to the survey, there is no procedure provided for by the Code, unless S. 53 is held to apply to such a case. Probably the Deputy Commissioner will not recognize a division unless the revenue fixed by the agreement of parties represents a fair proportion of the total revenue. The recognition of the division is, in my opinion, for purpose of separate liability to revenue. There are, however, restrictions introduced by S. 17 on the power of recognition. A minimum area fixed by rules under the Code is essential for such recognition. I read "survey number" in that section to include a "recognized division of a survey number", and this appears to me to follow from Sub-S. (2) of the previous section. A Record of Rights can be prepared if a notification is issued under S. 83, for a survey

"with a view to the Settlement of the land revenue and to the ascertainment and Record of Rights and liabilities of every description connected with the land."

But a new Ch. 8-A has been added to the Code in 1913, which enables the Government to direct the preparation of a Record of Rights apart from any Survey Settlements. The Officer-in-charge, however, has no power to revise. He merely ascertains and records existing fact such as the amount of revenue ordinarily paid or payable by each person as the result of an agreement with his co-sharers. S. 96-J clearly lays down that no entry or entries in the Record of Rights or register of mutations shall affect the liability of any person to pay the land revenue of alienated or unalienated land under the provisions of this Code or other law for the time being in force relating to the recovery of land revenue. The Officer-in-charge of the Record of Rights gives a separate serial number to each portion of a survey number, however small (down to a limit of 1 ganth), which is separately owned or cultivated by a single person or by a group of co-sharers or co-partners. Although paiki numbers (recognized divisions) have been shown as ordinary sub-divisions, the relation of the present sub-divisions to the former paiki numbers is indicated in the Record of Rights in the remarks column.

The appellant asks me to hold that pre-emption is recognized only among co-occupants of the present sub-divisions made on the basis of existing facts, a sub-division in some cases not extending to more than 1 gantha of land. This is practically to repeal the law of pre-emption in Berar. No such intention could be deduced from the language of the Code and the recent amendment. The sub-division has been made only by agreement of parties and duly recorded but has not been recognized within the meaning of the Code. The ruling in Mt. Gangu v. Chandu (1) has, therefore, no application. I agree with the lower appellate Court that the plaintiff has a right of pre-emption subject to the decision of various questions left undetermined by the first Court. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs. I fix Rs. 15 as pleader's fee.

Pre-emption—Suit for—Trees standing on land and rights of easement go with land.

Judgment.—This appeal was filed before the judgment in Surya Bhan v. Renai (1) was published. The learned counsel for the appellant admits that the ruling in question governs this case. This disposes of the first ground of appeal. As to the second ground of appeal the trees would undoubtedly go with the land on pre-emption. So would a right of easement. It is urged that these rights were separately valued. But this is not so, as far as the sale-deed is concerned. Some statement was made to this effect in the first Court. The price of pre-emption decreed includes the value of the rights. There is no error of law pointed out by the appellant's counsel. The appeal is therefore dismissed with costs.

Second Appeal No. 589 of 1917, Decided on 1st July 1918, from decrees of Addl. Dist. Judge, Betul, D/- 20th August 1917, in Appeal No. 61 of 1917.

Hindu Law—Succession — Mother — Remarriage—She can succeed to property of deceased son of first marriage.

A remarried Hindu widow is entitled to succeed to the property left by a son of her first husband if the son dies after the re-marriage. (P 207 C 2)

N. Bhawani Shankar—for Appellants.

D. T. Mangalmooty — for Respondents.

Judgment.—This litigation relates to a house which belonged originally to one Firangi, whose family tree is as follows:

After the death of Firangi his son Kolhya died without issue so that Budhu became sole owner. 15 years before the suit was filed, i. e., in 1902, Budhu was succeeded by his sons both of whom died in 1908. In the meantime Budhu's widow Maina had remarried in 1906. Madho and Nandu each left a widow, but both those women remarried almost immediately after their husbands' deaths and Maina, having succeeded as mother of Budhu's sons, was in possession when the suit was brought. The plaintiffs are vendees from the defendant Damdha and having failed to obtain possession from Maina sued for possession, on the ground that she having remarried could not inherit her sons' property. The trial Judge, following Sammar v. Mt. Bhago (1) and referring to Sadhu v. Mt. Patwaga (2) and Jarman v. Gunolaji (3), dismissed the claim on the ground that a remarried widow is entitled to succeed to the property left by the son of her first husband if the son died after the re-marriage. The plaintiffs appealed on the strength of the decision of Sanyal, A.J.C., in Basorey v. Ballabhdass (4), where it was held that a Hindu widow who remarries becomes thereafter incapable of inheriting any property which, but for her remarriage, she would have inherited from a lineal successor of her former husband. The lower appellate Court considered the learned Additional Judicial Commissioner to have taken a different view in Kashirao v. Utarda (5) and concurring with the trial Judge dismissed the appeal. In second appeal it is pointed out for the plaintiffs that in the case reported as Kashirao v. Utarda (5) the propositus Pandharinath died in 1896 and his mother Manjai remarried in 1897 after inheriting the field in dispute.
